THE MONTH IN BARDOLI

I Sardar's Garden-Home

When Gandhiji consented to spend a month in Bardoli in accordance with his promise to spend a month there every year, he did not know what an atmosphere the Sardar had kept ready there to receive him. He was ready, he said, to accommodate the members of the Working Committee in the Ashram, he was ready to make all arrangements for a session of the A. I. C. C., if it was decided to hold it there, and he was ready to accommodate all the workers in the various constructive departments that came for talks and consultations with Gandhiji. The month was, therefore, full to overflowing with activity, and on an average about two hundred people a day received comfortable board and lodging. Elaborate arrangements had to be made for all this, but thanks to the Sardar's hold on Gujarat, everyone in Gujarat, rich and poor, co-operated with him in making Gandhiji's stay as full of repose as it was bound to be full of work.

And in giving him the needed response and a constant sense of well-being not a small part was played by the Sardar's garden-farm. Close to the lovely little flower-garden was a beautiful banana garden in place of the grass-land that it was three years ago when we went there. To say that it was a banana-garden is to say the least about it. For into the making of it had gone the Sardar's exquisite skill as an economic and expert agriculturist and his devoted care about every little detail. "I knew the Sardar's power of organisation," said Gandhiji on his return to Sevagram, "but I discovered for the first time that the Sardar was a skilled agriculturist. Every inch of space, in the banana-garden and every drop of water that was being given to it had been made careful use of. The banana yielded a yearly crop, but in between the plants at convenient distances were fruit trees like the mango and the lichhi and the chiku, and grape fruit, and on the ridges were various vegetables. Surrounding the garden had been planted permanent trees, and inside the garden were walks making it easy for the field-worker to take care of the trees and also providing enough space with velvety earth for those who desired to have their morning and evening constitutional. All this was enough to rest and please the eyes and the mind. The Sardar's labour had yielded the Ashram several thousand rupees and set an example to others. As a result dozens of people had taken to banana-growing."

The Working Committee's Decision

The Working Committee of the Congress met for days — unconscionably long as the carping critics said, but not too long for those who wanted to put themselves right with one another and with the world. From that point of view not a day was wasted, and Gandhiji had enough time to commune with himself and with his colleagues. I shall say nothing about the deliberations in the Working Committee — I have in fact neither the competence nor the right to do so. But I shall make an attempt to indicate broadly a few things that emerged from the discussions inside as well as outside and the talks that followed the decision of the Working Committee. Though the actual decision came to be made on the basis of the interpretation of the Bombay Resolution, what was of vital importance was the actual feeling in the minds of men. No matter how the Bombay Resolution was interpreted, were we clear about certain fundamentals? Were we clear that the policy of non-violence that we had followed, to the best of our ability, for twenty years was no religious creed or for no religious purpose, but a wholly political method for the achievement of the political independence of India? Gandhiji had no doubt on the question. The next question was — could we at this critical hour in our nation's history give up that policy even for the sake of proffered freedom? "So far as I am concerned," says Gandhiji, "even if I was given the utmost power conceivable, even if I was made the Viceroy of India today, would I ask the people of India to take up the sword to keep the Empire alive? I for one should feel that I was committing moral suicide in that I would be abandoning the faith of a lifetime, the faith which I had persuaded the Congress to accept for twenty years as a policy. The steady unflinching pursuit of that policy has brought us quite close to the achievement of the objective. Am I to abandon the very boat which has brought me quite close to the shore? Yudhishtira would not forsake his faithful dog and enter the gates of Heaven without him. For he knew that the Kingdom of Heaven would be as naught to him without the dog, i.e. his faith. Would the Arab (i.e. the Congress) give up towards the end of the journey the faithful steed (i.e. non-violence) that had made it possible for it to make that journey? It would be an act of betrayal or faithlessness on my part."

There is another question also. In his open letter to every Briton Gandhiji had advised him not to fight the enemy with the weapons of the enemy but to set an example to the world by abandoning violence and adopting intensive non-cooperation. He had advised the same course to the Abyssinians and the Czechs and the Poles. "Could I, when the war is at my door and when I am in the same predicament as they, forget the sovereign remedy I suggested to them and clutch at the method I have denounced and discarded? No matter what the country would say, what should be the attitude of individual Congressmen who had sworn by the method of non-violence?"

He was clear that, if it was felt that we had committed a mistake, that it was worth while bargaining a principle for what seemed to be a richer gain, they should declare their conviction, and if and when the objective was gained, they should convert the whole of India into a recruiting ground, ask every man and woman to contribute his or her share in the war effort, and even extinguish themselves in so doing. What was needed was downright honesty. He at any rate had never conceived this possibility. If he knew that some day India would have to engage in a violent war in order to win Independence, he would long ago have addressed every youth to go in for military discipline, and he would not have placed tireless emphasis, day in and day out, on the various items of the constructive programme.

An Eye-opener

The Sardar had called a meeting of the Provincial Congress Committee. Gandhiji was invited to address it. He first asked everyone if he had understood all the implications of the Bardoli Resolution. Several people did not raise their hands. "Then," he said, "let me put it to you in a nutshell. The resolution means that, if the Government gave a guarantee that full freedom would be given after the war, the Congress would help in keeping this Empire alive. It was not that the bargain had been actually made, but the terms had been agreed upon, whereas, if I did not want to enter into any bargain at all, I should plainly say so. If you feel that on your agreeing to offer full co-operation in the war effort, India will have complete independence after the war, that the British will thereafter remain in India at your mercy and sufferance, that even during the war you will run your own affairs provided of course that your Defence Minister will carry on the war to victory, you must confirm the Bardoli Resolution. The temptation is very great indeed. If for that sake you are ready to reverse the Congress policy and purchase Swaraj and pay as price thereof Ahimsa, you must confirm the resolution. Remember that the very greatest of our leaders are party to the resolution and they have not chosen to do so lightly. As against this there are those who think that Ahimsa is a pearl of great price and that it cannot be given up, that it can never be the price of Swaraj, then their position is different. But if you are in doubt, if you feel that in sticking to Ahimsa you lose both Ahimsa — because you are incapable of it — and Swaraj, that Gandhi is a good man but it would be prudent not to go the whole length with him, then you must accept the resolution. Only those will express their disapproval of it who are sure in their heart of hearts that prudence, political insight, policy, every consideration, demands that Ahimsa may not be sacrificed for Swaraj. Now let those who will vote for the Bardoli Resolution raise their hands." 36 raised their hands. "Good," said he. "Now let the acharyas (masters) of Ahimsa raise their hands." It was a perplexing challenge, but 27 plumped for Ahimsa. There were about ten neutrals who wanted to put questions, but Gandhiji said as the vote was quite informal the neutrals need not trouble themselves.

I am tempted to comment on the whole proceedings, but I must resist the temptation. Events that followed will be better understood in the light of them.

Khadi Vidyalaya

There were various other meetings. On the eve of our departure the A. I. S. A. opened the Gujarat Branch of the Khadi Vidyalaya — the opening ceremony being performed by Gandhiji. It is a small beginning, with only 15 students, but with willing work and faith it may grow into a big tree. Gandhiji in declaring it open said:

"Needless to say that it gives me pleasure to declare this Khadi Vidyalaya open. There should be many such Vidyalayas in Gujarat. As a matter of fact Khadi Vidyalaya may be said to have been opened when in 1921 we decided to prepare for launching Satyagraha. I had not then discovered the word 'Vidyalaya' and had at any rate not associated it with khadi, though I knew that khadi was a Vidya (Science), and a most important of sciences. But I had then not the courage to say it. But the beginning was made here, anything that was invented in the line took the name of Bardoli — as for instance, the 'Bardoli Pinjan' (Carding Bow). Then we had a big depot here for the manufacture of all our implements. Whilst, therefore, it is a pleasure to me to open the Vidyalaya, it is a matter of sorrow that we should be opening it at this late day.

"It needs no argument today to prove that the charkha is bound up with Ahimsa and therefore with Swaraj. What is going to be the part that crores of our people will play during the deadly carnage that is going on? We know the part that Government are playing, we know the part that some of us are playing at their behest, and to satisfy the pangs of hunger and starvation. They are rushing headlong to take part in the work of destruction. Millions are being collected from the rich and the poor, and yet the Government coffers are ever empty. But barring those that are thus directly and indirectly helping in the work of destruction, what are the rest going to do, what can they do? How are they to carry on? There is starvation and poverty everywhere. There is scarcity of water, and unlike in South Africa where there is every provision against droughts, there is none here, and we and our cattle die like flies for want of water. Those that go to war do so in the hope of returning alive after killing others, some may not return at all. But we? Shall we be content to die like flies? We have sworn by Ahimsa and pledged ourselves to win Swaraj by Ahimsa. What then is the thing that can enable us to work for Swaraj, and to stand erect and strong in face of this conflagration? It is the charkha and all it means. Land we have, but the land system, uneconomic holdings and methods have reduced us to the level of beasts of burden, it does not yield us enough to eat all the year round, and we are workless for almost half the year. We have, therefore, to be up and doing and fill our time with productive work. That work is the production of khadi, etc.

"I do not want to repeat the argument or go into the implications of the science of khadi. Let this Vidyalaya generate a force that may universalise the charkha in Gujarat. There are, I am told, seventy thousand Congress members in Ahmedabad. If all these were regular spinners, and if they gave their quota of yarn to the Congress? Congress soldiers should not forget that their arms are the charkhas and spinning regularly is their 'military' discipline. The military weapons and munitions today have proved futile. They have failed to keep Czechoslovakia, Poland and France free or alive, though they boasted of renowned soldiers. President Roosevelt says he and the Allied Powers are fighting the Axis Powers to make the nations of the world free, and that the Axis Powers are fighting to enslave the world. But to me both the parties seem to be tarred with the same brush.

"What shall we do in the midst of this mutual destruction which spells freedom for none? The charkha and all it means is the only thing that can enable us to live and to make us stand in honour and self-respect. This we can do if we can combine faith with understanding, for un-understanding faith will not carry us far.

"Don't think that you have come here just to learn the art of khadi. You have come here to bear the burden of the work for Swaraj. It is a tremendous burden to bear, and the very first lesson you have to learn is to know the qualifications of the soldiers of Swaraj. The very first is Restraint and Patient Labour. That is what the charkha will teach you. The renowned cities of the world are crumbling unto dust. London is changed out of recognition, the edifices which the builders thought would stand the ravages of time are no more, and our cities like Rangoon will share the same fate. The age of cities is thus coming to an end. The slogan of 'Back to the villages' was never so true as today. The mills will not be of any avail. They are producing cloth for the belligerents and may ere long cease even to do that work, and may have solely to engage in producing munition. We have therefore to produce all our cloth and to make our villages self-sufficient in all respects. That you cannot do without a life of Restraint and Patient Toil. The course you have to prepare for is not simple. It will require all your energies and your faculties, for it is an all-comprehensive one. Every one of us, men and women, have to lend their hands and their minds and their hearts to the work of building our nation and Swaraj."

THE NEXT PHASE

Gandhiji issued the following statement from Bardoli on the 7th inst. :

My being relieved of the direction of Congress Civil Disobedience does not reduce my responsibility but increases it manifold. For one thing, my official disconnection with the Congress itself increases my detachment; but since detachment never means indifference, my attachment to every Congressman increases and I must speak to him more than before. The voice of silence was enough to direct the campaign of Civil Disobedience, but it is not enough to explain and interpret in terms of non-violence the day-to-day puzzles that arise in the minds of Congressmen and others by reason of the overwhelming events happening near us.

Rangoon was naturally and culturally part of us before Burma years ago became part of British India and, therefore, it remains part of us though now sundered. What has happened there, has had its repercussions all over India.

So far as I can see, Civil Disobedience in the sense in which it was launched is not likely to be revived on behalf of the Congress till the war has ended. In a purely symbolic manner it may have to be kept up not in the name of the Congress but on behalf of resisters of all war on the pure ground of non-violence, no matter how few they are. It will be kept up for the sake of asserting the right of resisters to carry on propaganda against all war. They dare not keep still in the midst of the unhuman slaughter that is going on. They must not only speak and write against it, they must, if need be, sacrifice themselves in the attempt to stop the torrent of blood. Whether they are a few or many they have to live their mission.

Before taking any step in the direction of Civil Disobedience I propose to restart the three weeklies and understand the reaction of Government to the new orientation. I hope that they will have no objection to propaganda, naturally non-violent, against all war. It would be non-embarrassing in the sense that there cannot be, as there never was, any idea of surrounding or picketing munition factories or recruiting offices.

If the right is not conceded, there must be token Civil Disobedience by the fewest possible, even one or two known believers in resistance to all war. I must not select many, because every worker is wanted to educate the people in the art of non-violent behaviour in the face of impending danger.

Strange as it may appear, I suggest that ceaseless occupation in constructive programme is the best preparation to face danger. For it means concentration in villages of the city people and their being occupied and occupying the villagers in productive and educative work.

This removes unemployment and with it fear. Such movement on a large scale at once inaugurates a new social order. It will constitute the greatest contribution to internal peace, and should render nugatory formidable panicky ordinances just issued.

PEACE ORGANISATION

(By M. K. Gandhi)

If the Congress were an organisation with a military bias, there is no doubt that today it would be a full-fledged military unit, every member becoming trained to be an efficient soldier. Fortunately for India and humanity, the Congress is not such an organisation. No other purely national organisation is or can be in the India of today. Fortunately again for India and humanity, the Congress has pledged itself since 1920 to win India's freedom through non-violent means. But up to now it has been largely a debating society, offering Civil Disobedience at intervals and all the time only playing with its vital programme of construction. At one time every Congressman was expected to create something for the nation. He or she was to spin for the nation. Congressmen would not respond, and the clause about spinning was dropped. There were other items too which every Congressman was to work. But he has not done so to the extent expected. The moment has now come for him to make a definite choice. The only programme before him is to become a servant or soldier of peace. A soldier of peace, unlike the one of the sword, has to give all his spare time to the promotion of peace alike in war time as in peace time. His work in peace time is both a measure of prevention of, as also that of preparation for, war time.

If then I was a Congressman with a vote, I would vote, as an emergency measure, for requiring every Congressman now on the Congress register or to come hereafter to possess the minimum qualifications for working the constructive programme. It would be wrong to remind me that the Congress should retain its democratic character. It will not lose it because, of its own motion, it becomes an efficient working body which anybody undertaking to obey its discipline and conditions of membership may join. The Congress will cease to be popular, if it cannot deserve popularity in times of stress. If it cannot provide work for the workless and hungry, if it cannot protect the people from depredations or teach them how to face them, if it cannot help them in the face of danger, it will lose its prestige and popularity. No person or corporation can live long on his or its capital. The latter has to circulate and multiply itself.

The Congress has become popular because it has been foremost in fighting imperialism. Today the old way is of no avail. Nobody thinks of mass revolt at the present moment. The best, quickest, and most efficient way is to build up from the bottom. The psychological moment has come. "Back to the villages!" has become a necessity from every point of view. Now is the time to decentralise production and distribution. Every village has to become a self-sufficient republic. This does not require brave resolutions. It requires brave, corporate, intelligent work. As far as I know at the present moment this is common ground between the rulers and the people.

Let every Congressman answer for himself whether he will be a soldier or servant of peace or whether he will become a nonentity unwilling to take his place in building up Swaraj.

WHY?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

While I was engaged in organising and conducting the Civil Disobedience movement on behalf of the Congress I could not issue the three weeklies without noticing the doings of civil resisters and the general progress of the movement. That would have been to turn the weeklies into Civil Disobedience organs and to challenge the Government to suppress them. The Government in their turn could not but have accepted the challenge and suppressed the papers and even prosecuted me. Whilst I must always be ready to welcome imprisonment, I was not then ready to court it. Nor was it my plan to invite suppression when my avowed object was to organise strictly and only individual Civil Disobedience. Therefore, even at the price of sacrificing the pleasure of serving the people in various ways through the weeklies, duty demanded their stoppage. I feel that the step taken was correct in every way.

The reason for suspension now no longer exists. On the contrary I should fail in my duty, if I did not resume publication. As I have repeatedly said I am no enemy of Britain. I have many dear and personal friends among Britishers. I cannot wish ill to Britain. My resistance to war does not carry me to the point of thwarting those who wish to take part in it. I reason with them. I put before them the better way and leave them to make the choice.

But we have arrived at a stage where it is no longer merely a question of resisting war effort. There are questions which confront war-resisters as much as they confront war-mongers. And they can be decided only one way by both, though the approach must vary. Such are questions of dealing with scarcity of food and clothing, looting, and bread riots, etc. I have views on all these and like questions. Resumption of the weeklies is needed for the dissemination of my views on these and like matters. In the ability of the people to deal with them without fuss and even without Government effort lies the way to Swaraj whose basis is non-violence. Mere Government effort cannot deal with crises affecting millions of people unless there is voluntary response from them.

If we wish to achieve Swaraj through truth and non-violence, gradual but steady building up from the bottom upwards by constructive effort is the only way. This rules out the deliberate creation of an anarchical state for the overthrow of the established order in the hope of throwing up from within a dictator who would rule with a rod of iron and produce order out of disorder.

These columns will then deal with the day-to-day problems that face the people.

Notes

Sir Akbar Hydari

The late Sir Akbar Hydari was a rare combination. He was a great scholar, philosopher and reformer. He was a devout Muslim, but he saw nothing antagonistic to Islam in Hinduism. He was a student of various religions. He was catholic in the choice of his friends. On the return voyage from the second Round Table Conference we found ourselves in the same boat. He was a regular attendant at the evening prayers I used to have on board. He was so interested in the Gita verses and the bhajans we sang that he had got them all translated for him by Mahadev Desai. He had made me promise that we should tour together in India in the interest of communal unity. But God had willed otherwise. The late Lord Willingdon had a different programme for me. I was plunged into the Civil Disobedience fight. Sir Akbar and I could never carry out the programme. He had come under the influence of Shri Aurobindo Ghose. He was almost invariably in Pondicherry during the days when the sage of Pondicherry gave the quarterly darshan to his devotees. Sir Akbar's death is a great loss to the country. My respectful condolences to the deceased's family.

To the Subscribers

The Manager tells me that the subscribers of Harijan have appreciated the unavoidable suspension and exercised extraordinary patience. With a few understandable exceptions they have not recalled the balance of the unused subscription due to them. I am glad to be able now to say that they will have their copy again regularly. It will not be possible to retain the old rate for reasons they know. The subscriptions left over will be credited to the subscribers who will be notified when they are to be exhausted. I hope that the three editions will retain their old popularity. I expect even a visible increase, for I believe in the intrinsic value of the menu that will be served to the reader from week to week. The three weeklies are purely and simply media of service. Never have they been a business enterprise.

"Violence Is Disastrous"

Shri S. V. Thakar, the quiet but efficient worker in the Harijan and other causes, sends me a note drawing attention to a violent feud between two parties of Bhils which his intervention with Government assistance has just prevented. The late Gula Maharaj, himself a Bhil reformer, had by his earnestness and simplicity appealed to the Bhil imagination, and thousands of them inspired by him had abandoned drink and other evil habits. He died a year ago leaving a successor. There was a social boycott proclaimed by the reform party against those who would not give up bad habits. This bred bad blood. Violence seemed imminent. Shri Thakar's timely intervention referred to above stopped bloodshed. But the reform has suffered a set-back. The party of opposition is in the ascendant, and unless the pure ethical spirit again pervades the movement, it may collapse. Shri Thakar rightly wishes to draw the moral that violence even in a good cause will not answer, and that every reform must be broadbased on the willing and enlightened association of the people concerned. They cannot be coerced into good habits.

Adibasi

Thakkar Bapa complains that, whilst he likes the pamphlet dealing with the constructive programme, he misses in it mention of Adibasis or the so-called aboriginals, such as Sonthals, Bhils, etc. The complaint is just. Many other causes are included in the constructive programme by implication. But that cannot and should not satisfy such a humanitarian as Thakkar Bapa. The Adibasis are the original inhabitants whose material position is perhaps no better than that of Harijans and who have long been victims of neglect on the part of the so-called high classes. The Adibasis should have found a special place in the constructive programme. Non-mention was an oversight. They provide a vast field of service for Congressmen. The Christian missionary has been more or less in sole occupation of the field. Great as his labour has been, it has not prospered as it might have, because of his ultimate aim being the Adibasis' conversion to his fold and their becoming de-Indianised. Anyway no one who hopes to construct Swaraj on the foundation of non-violence can afford to neglect even the least of India's sons. Adibasis are too numerous to be counted among the least.

Hand-spun as Measure of Value

In my part of India shells and seedless dried almonds were used as coins accepted by the people and the State treasury. They had no intrinsic value. They were a measure of people's deep poverty. They could not afford the lowest metal coin. Five shells would buy them a little vegetable or a needle. I have suggested a measure which will not be a mere token but which will have always an intrinsic value which will also be its market value. In that sense it will be an ideal measure. For the present and by way of experiment I have suggested a warp length of a single thread of yarn as the lowest measure and to be used in dealings principally with the spinners and generally with khadi lovers. The spinners can have all their daily wants supplied as against fixed quantity of yarn. Stores will need to be maintained by the A. I. S. A. in combination with the A. I. V. I. A. and ultimately with those who will give their co-operation. As I conceive it the system can be worked only if it is decentralised. This is not its demerit but merit. The end to be sought is human happiness combined with full mental and moral development. I use the adjective moral as synonymous with spiritual. This end can be achieved under decentralisation. Centralisation as a system is inconsistent with non-violent structure of society. I have presented to khadi workers and those who are interested in the solution of the problem of India's poverty, the idea of a measure of value in its barest outline. Let them work it out and find for themselves flaws, if any, in the conception, and if they do not, let them enforce it where they can.

ON THE PATH OF AHIMSA

Physical Training and Ahimsa

About the time the Harijan had to cease, Gandhiji wrote a long article discussing the relation between physical training and Ahimsa. If that exhaustive article needed any elucidation, it is to be had from the lives of those who suffered and even laid down their life for a cherished mission. I was reading the other day the life of Dr. Pennel, the surgeon who worked among the frontier tribes for several years. Dr. Pennel's work, in my opinion, was weakened (to use a very mild word) by his proselytising zeal. He regarded medical missions as "the language of the church militant", and believed that part of the treatment of his patients consisted in preaching to them the gospel. Wherever he went he went with "an Afghan convert", and used all kinds of occasions (e.g. a horse-fair) for preaching the gospel, "undeterred by the hail-storm of stones and clods of earth which greeted him and his assistants." "At Hawed," says his biographer, "they at first encountered some opposition, for the people utterly refused all intercourse or medicine if there was also to be preaching. However, by dint of firmness and persuasion, they were induced to listen to a short non-controversial address and, afterwards later in the day, Dr. Pennel was able to preach three times without let or hindrance." On occasions one wonders which to admire more—Dr. Pennel's pathetic zeal in pouring his preaching down his patients' throats along with his medicines, or his patients who, in spite of terrible suffering, "refused to listen to a word more of our wicked religion and left us"; which to admire more—the surgeon who preached the gospel to unwilling patients, or the patients who "heard the gospel time after time but remained untouched, saying, as, alas, so many do, 'your medicine is very good, but your religion is very wicked.'"

But that is about the way the missionary spoils his good work. These prefatory remarks were necessary before I proceeded to describe the fearlessness of Dr. Pennel—the fearlessness which no physical training in the use of the sword or firearms gave him, but which came from his passion for his work. Indeed a reading of the various ways in which Gandhiji says a Satyagrahi should physically fit himself put me forcibly in mind of Dr. Pennel. He had certainly built up his body in his youth by gymnastic exercises, swimming, taking long treks, and so on, but never by sword-play or rifle-practice. But see what a wonderful example he has left for all Satyagrahis:

"After a treacherous attack on a British force by the Waziris, the officer in command of the troops at Bannu wished the Mission to have a guard of soldiers, a precaution of which Dr. Pennel distinctly disapproved as he maintained that the surest way of calling forth the kindness and protection of the tribes, was by showing them that he did not rely upon material arms for his defence. For this reason he never carried arms of any description himself, and on more than one occasion it was this fact which saved him from assassins who deemed it cowardly to attack an unarmed man."

He had trained himself by hard discipline. Starvation, he thought, was part of the daily lot of a missionary, and he used to collect crusts of bread till they were dry enough to satisfy his Spartan taste. He gave up most of the comforts that one may lawfully enjoy; he had none of the "petty vices"; never smoked; walked miles on end without tiring; travelled all night in tongas, ekkas, and on horseback; "in a tonga he generally slept sitting upright, with his long legs curled over the luggage; in a tum-tum he found it less risky to sleep in the net under the seats, his head at the driver's feet and his feet sticking out over the footboard at the back; and as the driver generally kept the horses' grass in this net, he found it a very comfortable bed! An ekka did not afford such good sleeping accommodation, so he would unwind his turban, and plaiting it about the poles of the awning, would draw his knees up to his chin, and thus leaning against the back-rest made by his puggri or turban would sleep peacefully until his journey's end." Once while paying a visit to Esa Khel District, he found the river Kurram very much swollen, "so, dismounting from his riding camel he swam across and got some men to go back for the beast. On reaching mid-stream the animal lost its footing and turned over and over in the river. With great difficulty they got the saddle off, and with the help of some more men pulled it to the land half-drowned." Again, while on his pilgrimage as a sadhu on a cycle, "we had to ford the river several times. We lost ourselves in a jungle of tamarisk bushes. These grew denser and denser till we had to lift our machines at arm's length and over our heads and struggle through, while our lower garments got torn to shreds and our legs badly scratched."

He had thus learnt to accustom himself to physical endurance, but what made him an utter stranger to fear was his passion for his mission.

"When he heard that a certain Mullah had preached of his murder as a sure road to Paradise for the Ghazi who accomplished it, he forthwith set out unarmed and unescorted to visit the house of his adversary. If a road were known to be beset by raiders, his intrepid spirit would find exhilaration in traversing just that way. It was this spirit of fearlessness that not only won him friends among the manly Pathans but more than once was the means of saving his life."

As I write this I am reminded of Shri Ravishanker Vyas, the life and soul of the reform movement among the 'criminal tribes' of the Kheda district. No physical drill or sword-play has given him the remarkable capacity for physical endurance and fearlessness that he has. He can walk miles on end, dare death and devilry, and when in jail he used to grind 45 seers of ata (the maximum hard task) in less than the time ordinary criminals used to take over it.

The Minimum Test

And as for the concrete test of belief in Ahimsa. I am reminded of a conversation between Gandhiji and a would-be Satyagrahi in an Indian State. It indicated that Gandhiji expected a much higher standard of qualification from the would-be Satyagrahis in Indian States than from those in British India; but it also indicates the minimum test of belief in the charkha as the pivot of constructive work. The would-be Satyagrahi said he was a believer in Ahimsa.

"How much do you spin—5 yards or 50 yards?" Gandhiji asked him.

"Never more than 50, and sometimes even less than 5," was the answer.

"Do you spin every day, or once every week, or every month?"

"I don't spin more than 50 or 100 yards in a month."

"Do you make your own slivers?"

This last question was hardly justified after the answers the previous questions had elicited, but Gandhiji went on in an almost ruthless way.

"No, Mahatmaji," was the reply.

"Then where do you get them from? Get them by post?"

"No, I get from the khadi bhandar, and when I do not get them there, I get them through friends coming from places where slivers can be had." I have a suspicion that the reply was prompted by the question which indicated a rebuke if the slivers were got by post. Poor man! He might have said: "I spin so precious little that I have my year's supply at a time from the bhandar."

"Do you make your mal (string) yourself or do you purchase a reel from the market?"

It was no use pursuing this inquiry, and more questions would have landed him into more scrapes. His friend, therefore, intervened and said: "Mahatmaji, he is a believer in Ahimsa, and that, I thought, was the essential qualification. According to the test you now apply we are all likely to fail."

"Well then," said Gandhiji rather sternly, "it is better that none of you takes part in Satyagraha than that you should go without being properly qualified. My standard is inexorable. I want you to spin not only regularly but intelligently. I want you to know how to test your yarn, how to draw fine yarn and coarse yarn, to know the economics of khadi and so on. And when you will say to me, 'I know all these things,' I will ask you: 'What about your life?' Do you observe non-violence in your relations with the members of your family and in your daily affairs? Where is the good of your saying you accept non-violence in theory? Supposing you said you accepted the theory of khadi, but purchased and used foreign cloth, how would your acceptance of the theory help me? And please understand that, while in British India I am prepared to reconcile myself to belief in Ahimsa as a policy, I want you in the States to believe in it as a creed. Violence in many Indian States is greater than in British India, and we want the supreme purity and sacrifice of a Prahlad to meet the violence there. Give me a Prahlad, and I shall give him my blessings."

Begin at Home

In this connection let me reproduce here a part of a letter addressed by Gandhiji to Khan Saheb Abdul Ghaffar Khan. It will be remembered that the Khan Saheb believes in Ahimsa as a creed as he has unequivocally stated once again in his recent statement on the Bardoli decision, and he desires to train those who will follow him also as cent per cent non-violent

Satyagrahis. It is necessary to know this in order to understand the letter:

"I hope that all the conversation we had in Bombay has soaked into you. If it has, every problem could be solved by reference to those fundamentals which I tried to put before you. Our non-violence has to begin at home with our children, elders, neighbours and friends. We have to overlook the so-called blemishes of our friends and neighbours and never forgive our own. Then only shall we be able to right ourselves, and as we ascend higher, our non-violence has to be practised among our political associates. We have to see and approach the viewpoints of those who differ from us. We have to be patient with them and convince them of their errors and be convinced of our own. Then proceeding further we have to deal patiently and gently with political parties that have different policies and different principles. We have to look at their criticism from their own standpoint, always remembering that the greater the distance between ourselves and others, the greater the scope for the play of our non-violence; and it is only when we have passed our examination or test in these fields that we can deal with those against whom we are fighting and who have grievously wronged us.

This was one thing we talked about. The other thing I said was that a non-violent man has to keep himself engaged usefully during all waking hours, and therefore constructive work is for him what arms are for the violent man."

This last sentence sums up in the vividest manner the essential difference between a believer in violence and non-violence.

M. D.

WAR AGAINST DESTRUCTION

In one of his speeches Shri Vinoba contrasted the obvious expressions of violence and non-violence. "Constructive work is the obvious expression of non-violence, destructive work that of violence. Violence expresses itself in bombing, destroying buildings, hospitals, churches, and innocent women and children. Non-violence creates where violence destroys; it creates the wherewithal to clothe the naked and feed the hungry. Violence expresses itself in incendiarism; non-violence extinguishes not only physical fires but the fires of hatred and vengeance." It is this conviction that made him throw himself heart and soul into the movement for the spread of education through crafts, and even in his statement before the court he mentioned it as a principal item of the constructive programme.

In the present turmoil when our intellects are clouded by ever-increasing war propaganda and our vision blurred by the smoke-screen of passion and hate, we may not see the part education through crafts has to play in the future. But wise people in all lands know what is in store for us if we do not stem the tide of destruction. In an editorial article of the Holidays Number of the American School Arts the editor deplores the prospect and emphasises the increasing need for craft-education. "The world is witnessing today the supposedly greatest nations in cultural development, bending all their manhood and materials into building greater and better engines and transports for mass destruction of all that other men have built," says he, and adds: "Now as never before we should use all our energies towards creating more creative minds for building a new world for tomorrow's men, that they may have more creative minds and hands for creating the beautiful, rather than the destructive. This great art appreciation can only be established through actual doing, the actual handwork, rather than the mere book learning that has impeded for years our proper art growth." And this is how he inweighs against the wrong education with which we have clogged and corrupted the minds of our children: "For many years a false ideal has persisted that culture or genteelness consisted largely of not working with one's hands. Men with calloused hands were something uncouth, and the greatest desire of many a mother was to see her son capably placed in a 'white collar' job where he could accumulate wealth with a brain that would work only at a desk. This belief has brought its penalties upon each nation who made it an ideal, in lower standards of health, lesser art achievements, and social difficulties, and many leaders of our nation today are urging a greater return to the use of hands through many avenues of creative work. The seeming trend of the human minds, even evident in the mere child, is that of destroying or the breaking up of constructed objects. The tendency of destruction in the child mind will not grow as a trait in the adult, if he learns to use his hands in constructive art. He will too greatly respect all that goes into handicraft to ever approve the urge for destroying any part of the art crafts of his fellow men."

The editor also cites the statements of prominent American public men in support of "the learning which comes of doing things with the hands". William Knudsen, President of the General Motors Corporation, says:

"In pioneer days when book learning was rare, the man who made his living sitting at a desk was envied. But the pioneer's legitimate aspiration for learning has decayed into a kind of snobbery which considers it more honorable to handle a telephone than a wrench, more socially desirable to dictate to a stenographer than to direct a crew of skilled mechanics. In the years from 14 to 20, when the creative urge ought to be developing and flowering, most of a youngster's energy is devoted to cramming theories out of books. The young man then finds himself all dressed up with theoretical knowledge and no place to go. Psychiatrists in recent years have been treating nervous breakdowns by occupational therapy. Possibly, if these people originally had a useful sideline involving manual skill, the breakdowns never would have occurred. And brain training is likewise an essential part of hand training. The best man is one who combines the learning of books with the learning which comes of doing things with the hands."

Boris Blai, Director of Fine Arts, Temple University, says:

"During twelve years of teaching young people in arts, I have not found one student who did not possess a latent creative instinct that yearned for expression. I am convinced that every human being possesses a creative urge to make beautiful things, that this urge can be brought out and put to work with proper encouragement, and that suppression of it results in maladjustment of life. Furthermore, it is actually dangerous not to use your hands. Tests by neurologists at the Temple and other universities show that mental ability increases as the ability to use the hand increases. Manual work demands clear thinking, the working out of your own solutions to problems."

What can be a stronger argument than this last in support of our national plan of education through crafts? Against the training for the art of efficient destruction, the training which puts the musket on the shoulder of the child who has compulsorily to join the junior branch of the Hitler Jugend (youth) at the age of seven, there is the education which begins with a good grounding in creative work. Education through creative basic crafts can alone stem the tide of destruction that militarist education helps to swell every day.

THE MONTH IN BARDOLI

Sardar's Garden-Home

When Gandhiji consented to spend a month in Bardoli in accordance with his promise to spend a month there every year, he did not know what an atmosphere the Sardar had kept ready there to receive him. He was ready, he said, to accommodate the members of the Working Committee in the Ashram, he was ready to make all arrangements for a session of the A. I. C. C., if it was decided to hold it there, and he was ready to accommodate all the workers in the various constructive departments that came for talks and consultations with Gandhiji. The month was, therefore, full to overflowing with activity, and on an average about two hundred people a day received comfortable board and lodging. Elaborate arrangements had to be made for all this, but thanks to the Sardar's hold on Gujarat, everyone in Gujarat, rich and poor, co-operated with him in making Gandhiji's stay as full of repose as it was bound to be full of work.

And in giving him the needed repose and a constant sense of well-being not a small part was played by the Sardar's garden-farm. Close to the lovely little flower-garden was a beautiful banana garden in place of the grass-land that it was three years ago when we went there. To say that it was a banana-garden is to say the least about it. For into the making of it had gone the Sardar's exquisite skill as an economic and expert agriculturist and his devoted care about every little detail. "I knew the Sardar's power of organisation," said Gandhiji on his return to Sevagram, "but I discovered for the first time that the Sardar was a skilled agriculturist. Every inch of space in the banana-garden and every drop of water that was being given to it had been made careful use of. The banana yielded a yearly crop, but in between the plants at convenient distances were fruit trees like the mango and the lich and the chiku and grape fruit, and on the ridges were various vegetables. Surrounding the garden had been planted permanent trees, and inside the garden were walks making it easy for the field-worker to take care of the trees and also providing enough space with velvety earth for those who desired to have their morning and evening constitutional. All this was enough to rest and please the eyes and the mind. The Sardar's labour had yielded the Ashram several thousand rupees and set an example to others. As a result dozens of people had taken to banana-growing."

The Working Committee's Decision

The Working Committee of the Congress met for days — unconscionably long as the carping critics said, but not too long for those who wanted to put themselves right with one another and with the world. From that point of view not a day was wasted, and Gandhiji had enough time to commune with himself and with his colleagues. I shall say nothing about the deliberations in the Working Committee—I have in fact neither the competence nor the right to do so. But I shall make an attempt to indicate broadly a few things that emerged from the discussions inside as well as outside and the talks that followed the decision of the Working Committee. Though the actual decision came to be made on the basis of the interpretation of the Bombay Resolution, what was of vital importance was the actual feeling in the minds of men. No matter how the Bombay Resolution was interpreted, were we clear about certain fundamentals? Were we clear that the policy of non-violence that we had followed, to the best of our ability, for twenty years was no religious creed or for no religious purpose, but a wholly political method for the achievement of the political independence of India? Gandhiji had no doubt on the question. The next question was — could we at this critical hour in our nation's history give up that policy even for the sake of proffered freedom? "So far as I am concerned," says Gandhiji, "even if I was given the utmost power conceivable, even if I was made the Viceroy of India today, would I ask the people of India to take up the sword to keep the Empire alive? I for one should feel that I was committing moral suicide in that I would be abandoning the faith of a lifetime, the faith which I had persuaded the Congress to accept for twenty years as a policy. The steady unflinching pursuit of that policy has brought us quite close to the achievement of the objective. Am I to abandon the very boat which has brought me quite close to the shore? Yudhishtira would not forsake his faithful dog and enter the gates of Heaven without him. For he knew that the Kingdom of Heaven would be as naught to him without the dog, i.e. his faith. Would the Arab (i.e. the Congress) give up towards the end of the journey the faithful steed (i.e. non-violence) that had made it possible for it to make that journey? It would be an act of betrayal or faithlessness on my part."

There is another question also. In his open letter to every Briton Gandhiji had advised him not to fight the enemy with the weapons of the enemy but to set an example to the world by abandoning violence and adopting intensive non-cooperation. He had advised the same course to the Abyssinians and the Czechs and the Poles. "Could I, when the war is at my door and when I am in the same predicament as they, forget the sovereign remedy I suggested to them and clutch at the method I have denounced and discarded? No matter what the country would say, what should be the attitude of individual Congressmen who had sworn by the method of non-violence?"

He was clear that, if it was felt that we had committed a mistake, that it was worth while bargaining a principle for what seemed to be a richer gain, they should declare their conviction, and if and when the objective was gained, they should convert the whole of India into a recruiting ground, ask every man and woman to contribute his or her share in the war effort, and even extinguish themselves in so doing. What was needed was downright honesty. He at any rate had never conceived this possibility. If he knew that some day India would have to engage in a violent war in order to win Independence, he would long ago have addressed every youth to go in for military discipline, and he would not have placed tireless emphasis, day in and day out, on the various items of the constructive programme.

An Eye-opener

The Sardar had called a meeting of the Provincial Congress Committee. Gandhiji was invited to address it. He first asked everyone if he had understood all the implications of the Bardoli Resolution. Several people did not raise their hands. "Then," he said, "let me put it to you in a nutshell. The resolution means that, if the Government gave a guarantee that full freedom would be given after the war, the Congress would help in keeping this Empire alive. It was not that the bargain had been actually made, but the terms had been agreed upon, whereas, if I did not want to enter into any bargain at all, I should plainly say so. If you feel that on your agreeing to offer full co-operation in the war effort, India will have complete independence after the war, that the British will thereafter remain in India at your mercy and sufferance, that even during the war you will run your own affairs provided of course that your Defence Minister will carry on the war to victory, you must confirm the Bardoli Resolution. The temptation is very great indeed. If for that sake you are ready to reverse the Congress policy and purchase Swaraj and pay as price thereof Ahimsa, you must confirm the resolution. Remember that the very greatest of our leaders are party to the resolution and they have not chosen to do so lightly. As against this there are those who think that Ahimsa is a pearl of great price and that it cannot be given up, that it can never be the price of Swaraj, then their position is different. But if you are in doubt, if you feel that in sticking to Ahimsa you lose both Ahimsa — because you are incapable of it — and Swaraj, that Gandhi is a good man but it would be prudent not to go the whole length with him, then you must accept the resolution. Only those will express their disapproval of it who are sure in their heart of hearts that prudence, political insight, policy, every consideration, demands that Ahimsa may not be sacrificed for Swaraj. Now let those who will vote for the Bardoli Resolution raise their hands." 36 raised their hands. "Good," said he. "Now let the acharyas (masters) of Ahimsa raise their hands." It was a perplexing challenge, but 27 plumped for Ahimsa. There were about ten neutrals who wanted to put questions, but Gandhiji said as the vote was quite informal the neutrals need not trouble themselves.

I am tempted to comment on the whole proceedings, but I must resist the temptation. Events that followed will be better understood in the light of them.

Khadi Vidyalaya

There were various other meetings. On the eve of our departure the A. I. S. A. opened the Gujarat Branch of the Khadi Vidyalaya — the opening ceremony being performed by Gandhiji. It is a small beginning, with only 15 students, but with willing work and faith it may grow into a big tree. Gandhiji in declaring it open said:

"Needless to say that it gives me pleasure to declare this Khadi Vidyalaya open. There should be many such Vidyalayas in Gujarat. As a matter of fact Khadi Vidyalaya may be said to have been opened when in 1921 we decided to prepare for launching Satyagraha. I had not then discovered the word 'Vidyalaya' and had at any rate not associated it with khadi, though I knew that khadi was a Vidya (Science), and a most important of sciences. But I had then not the courage to say it. But the beginning was made here, anything that was invented in the line took the name of Bardoli — as for instance, the 'Bardoli Pinjan' (Carding Bow). Then we had a big depot here for the manufacture of all our implements. Whilst, therefore, it is a pleasure to me to open the Vidyalaya, it is a matter of sorrow that we should be opening it at this late day.

"It needs no argument today to prove that the charkha is bound up with Ahimsa and therefore with Swaraj. What is going to be the part that crores of our people will play during the deadly carnage that is going on? We know the part that Government are playing, we know the part that some of us are playing at their behest, and to satisfy the pangs of hunger and starvation. They are rushing headlong to take part in the work of destruction. Millions are being collected from the rich and the poor, and yet the Government coffers are ever empty. But barring those that are thus directly and indirectly helping in the work of destruction, what are the rest going to do, what can they do? How are they to carry on? There is starvation and poverty everywhere. There is scarcity of water, and unlike in South Africa where there is every provision against droughts, there is none here, and we and our cattle die like flies for want of water. Those that go to war do so in the hope of returning alive after killing others, some may not return at all. But we? Shall we be content to die like flies? We have sworn by Ahimsa and pledged ourselves to win Swaraj by Ahimsa. What then is the thing that can enable us to work for Swaraj, and to stand erect and strong in face of this conflagration? It is the charkha and all it means. Land we have, but the land system, uneconomic holdings and methods have reduced us to the level of beasts of burden, it does not yield us enough to eat all the year round, and we are workless for almost half the year. We have, therefore, to be up and doing and fill our time with productive work. That work is the production of khadi, etc.

"I do not want to repeat the argument or go into the implications of the science of khadi. Let this Vidyalaya generate a force that may universalise the charkha in Gujarat. There are, I am told, seventy thousand Congress members in Ahmedabad. If all these were regular spinners, and if they gave their quota of yarn to the Congress? Congress soldiers should not forget that their arms are the charkhas and spinning regularly is their 'military' discipline. The military weapons and munitions today have proved futile. They have failed to keep Czechoslovakia, Poland and France free or alive, though they boasted of renowned soldiers. President Roosevelt says he and the Allied Powers are fighting the Axis Powers to make the nations of the world free, and that the Axis Powers are fighting to enslave the world. But to me both the parties seem to be tarred with the same brush.

"What shall we do in the midst of this mutual destruction which spells freedom for none? The charkha and all it means is the only thing that can enable us to live and to make us stand in honour and self-respect. This we can do if we can combine faith with understanding, for un-understanding faith will not carry us far.

"Don't think that you have come here just to learn the art of khadi. You have come here to bear the burden of the work for Swaraj. It is a tremendous burden to bear, and the very first lesson you have to learn is to know the qualifications of the soldiers of Swaraj. The very first is Restraint and Patient Labour. That is what the charkha will teach you. The renowned cities of the world are crumbling unto dust. London is changed out of recognition, the edifices which the builders thought would stand the ravages of time are no more, and our cities like Rangoon will share the same fate. The age of cities is thus coming to an end. The slogan of 'Back to the villages' was never so true as today. The mills will not be of any avail. They are producing cloth for the belligerents and may ere long cease even to do that work, and may have solely to engage in producing munition. We have therefore to produce all our cloth and to make our villages self-sufficient in all respects. That you cannot do without a life of Restraint and Patient Toil. The course you have to prepare for is not simple. It will require all your energies and your faculties, for it is an all-comprehensive one. Every one of us, men and women, have to lend their hands and their minds and their hearts to the work of building our nation and Swaraj."

THE NEXT PHASE

Gandhiji issued the following statement from Bardoli on the 7th inst. :

My being relieved of the direction of Congress Civil Disobedience does not reduce my responsibility but increases it manifold. For one thing, my official disconnection with the Congress itself increases my detachment; but since detachment never means indifference, my attachment to every Congressman increases and I must speak to him more than before. The voice of silence was enough to direct the campaign of Civil Disobedience, but it is not enough to explain and interpret in terms of non-violence the day-to-day puzzles that arise in the minds of Congressmen and others by reason of the overwhelming events happening near us.

Rangoon was naturally and culturally part of us before Burma years ago became part of British India and, therefore, it remains part of us though now sundered. What has happened there, has had its repercussions all over India.

So far as I can see, Civil Disobedience in the sense in which it was launched is not likely to be revived on behalf of the Congress till the war has ended. In a purely symbolic manner it may have to be kept up not in the name of the Congress but on behalf of resisters of all war on the pure ground of non-violence, no matter how few they are. It will be kept up for the sake of asserting the right of resisters to carry on propaganda against all war. They dare not keep still in the midst of the unhuman slaughter that is going on. They must not only speak and write against it, they must, if need be, sacrifice themselves in the attempt to stop the torrent of blood. Whether they are a few or many they have to live their mission.

Before taking any step in the direction of Civil Disobedience I propose to restart the three weeklies and understand the reaction of Government to the new orientation. I hope that they will have no objection to propaganda, naturally non-violent, against all war. It would be non-embarrassing in the sense that there cannot be, as there never was, any idea of surrounding or picketing munition factories or recruiting offices.

If the right is not conceded, there must be token Civil Disobedience by the fewest possible, even one or two known believers in resistance to all war. I must not select many, because every worker is wanted to educate the people in the art of non-violent behaviour in the face of impending danger.

Strange as it may appear, I suggest that ceaseless occupation in constructive programme is the best preparation to face danger. For it means concentration in villages of the city people and their being occupied and occupying the villagers in productive and educative work.

This removes unemployment and with it fear. Such movement on a large scale at once inaugurates a new social order. It will constitute the greatest contribution to internal peace, and should render nugatory formidable panicky ordinances just issued.

PEACE ORGANISATION

(By M. K. Gandhi)

If the Congress were an organisation with a military bias, there is no doubt that today it would be a full-fledged military unit, every member becoming trained to be an efficient soldier. Fortunately for India and humanity, the Congress is not such an organisation. No other purely national organisation is or can be in the India of today. Fortunately again for India and humanity, the Congress has pledged itself since 1920 to win India's freedom through non-violent means. But up to now it has been largely a debating society, offering Civil Disobedience at intervals and all the time only playing with its vital programme of construction. At one time every Congressman was expected to create something for the nation. He or she was to spin for the nation. Congressmen would not respond, and the clause about spinning was dropped. There were other items too which every Congressman was to work. But he has not done so to the extent expected. The moment has now come for him to make a definite choice. The only programme before him is to become a servant or soldier of peace. A soldier of peace, unlike the one of the sword, has to give all his spare time to the promotion of peace alike in war time as in peace time. His work in peace time is both a measure of prevention of, as also that of preparation for, war time.

If then I was a Congressman with a vote, I would vote, as an emergency measure, for requiring every Congressman now on the Congress register or to come hereafter to possess the minimum qualifications for working the constructive programme. It would be wrong to remind me that the Congress should retain its democratic character. It will not lose it because, of its own motion, it becomes an efficient working body which anybody undertaking to obey its discipline and conditions of membership may join. The Congress will cease to be popular, if it cannot deserve popularity in times of stress. If it cannot provide work for the workless and hungry, if it cannot protect the people from depredations or teach them how to face them, if it cannot help them in the face of danger, it will lose its prestige and popularity. No person or corporation can live long on his or its capital. The latter has to circulate and multiply itself.

The Congress has become popular because it has been foremost in fighting imperialism. Today the old way is of no avail. Nobody thinks of mass revolt at the present moment. The best, quickest, and most efficient way is to build up from the bottom. The psychological moment has come. "Back to the villages!" has become a necessity from every point of view. Now is the time to decentralise production and distribution. Every village has to become a self-sufficient republic. This does not require brave resolutions. It requires brave, corporate, intelligent work. As far as I know at the present moment this is common ground between the rulers and the people.

Let every Congressman answer for himself whether he will be a soldier or servant of peace or whether he will become a nonentity unwilling to take his place in building up Swaraj.

On train Bardoli-Wardha, 9-1-42

WHY?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

While I was engaged in organising and conducting the Civil Disobedience movement on behalf of the Congress I could not issue the three weeklies without noticing the doings of civil resisters and the general progress of the movement. That would have been to turn the weeklies into Civil Disobedience organs and to challenge the Government to suppress them. The Government in their turn could not but have accepted the challenge and suppressed the papers and even prosecuted me. Whilst I must always be ready to welcome imprisonment, I was not then ready to court it. Nor was it my plan to invite suppression when my avowed object was to organise strictly and only individual Civil Disobedience. Therefore, even at the price of sacrificing the pleasure of serving the people in various ways through the weeklies, duty demanded their stoppage. I feel that the step taken was correct in every way.

The reason for suspension now no longer exists. On the contrary I should fail in my duty, if I did not resume publication. As I have repeatedly said I am no enemy of Britain. I have many dear and personal friends among Britishers. I cannot wish ill to Britain. My resistance to war does not carry me to the point of thwarting those who wish to take part in it. I reason with them. I put before them the better way and leave them to make the choice.

But we have arrived at a stage where it is no longer merely a question of resisting war effort. There are questions which confront war-resisters as much as they confront war-mongers. And they can be decided only one way by both, though the approach must vary. Such are questions of dealing with scarcity of food and clothing, looting, and bread riots, etc. I have views on all these and like questions. Resumption of the weeklies is needed for the dissemination of my views on these and like matters. In the ability of the people to deal with them without fuss and even without Government effort lies the way to Swaraj whose basis is non-violence. Mere Government effort cannot deal with crises affecting millions of people unless there is voluntary response from them.

If we wish to achieve Swaraj through truth and non-violence, gradual but steady building up from the bottom upwards by constructive effort is the only way. This rules out the deliberate creation of an anarchical state for the overthrow of the established order in the hope of throwing up from within a dictator who would rule with a rod of iron and produce order out of disorder.

These columns will then deal with the day-to-day problems that face the people.

Sir Akbar Hydari

The late Sir Akbar Hydari was a rare combination. He was a great scholar, philosopher and reformer. He was a devout Muslim, but he saw nothing antagonistic to Islam in Hinduism. He was a student of various religions. He was catholic in the choice of his friends. On the return voyage from the second Round Table Conference we found ourselves in the same boat. He was a regular attendant at the evening prayers I used to have on board. He was so interested in the Gita verses and the bhajans we sang that he had got them all translated for him by Mahadev Desai. He had made me promise that we should tour together in India in the interest of communal unity. But God had willed otherwise. The late Lord Willingdon had a different programme for me. I was plunged into the Civil Disobedience fight. Sir Akbar and I could never carry out the programme. He had come under the influence of Shri Aurobindo Ghose. He was almost invariably in Pondicherry during the days when the sage of Pondicherry gave the quarterly darshan to his devotees. Sir Akbar's death is a great loss to the country. My respectful condolences to the deceased's family.

To the Subscribers

The Manager tells me that the subscribers of Harijan have appreciated the unavoidable suspension and exercised extraordinary patience. With a few understandable exceptions they have not recalled the balance of the unused subscription due to them. I am glad to be able now to say that they will have their copy again regularly. It will not be possible to retain the old rate for reasons they know. The subscriptions left over will be credited to the subscribers who will be notified when they are to be exhausted. I hope that the three editions will retain their old popularity. I expect even a visible increase, for I believe in the intrinsic value of the menu that will be served to the reader from week to week. The three weeklies are purely and simply media of service. Never have they been a business enterprise.

"Violence Is Disastrous"

Shri S. V. Thakar, the quiet but efficient worker in the Harijan and other causes, sends me a note drawing attention to a violent feud between two parties of Bhils which his intervention with Government assistance has just prevented. The late Gula Maharaj, himself a Bhil reformer, had by his earnestness and simplicity appealed to the Bhil imagination, and thousands of them inspired by him had abandoned drink and other evil habits. He died a year ago leaving a successor. There was a social boycott proclaimed by the reform party against those who would not give up bad habits. This bred bad blood. Violence seemed imminent. Shri Thakar's timely intervention referred to above stopped bloodshed. But the reform has suffered a set-back. The party of opposition is in the ascendant, and unless the pure ethical spirit again pervades the movement, it may collapse. Shri Thakar rightly wishes to draw the moral that violence even in a good cause will not answer, and that every reform must be broadbased on the willing and enlightened association of the people concerned. They cannot be coerced into good habits.

Adibasi

Thakkar Bapa complains that, whilst he likes the pamphlet dealing with the constructive programme, he misses in it mention of Adibasis or the so-called aboriginals, such as Sonthals, Bhils, etc. The complaint is just. Many other causes are included in the constructive programme by implication. But that cannot and should not satisfy such a humanitarian as Thakkar Bapa. The Adibasis are the original inhabitants whose material position is perhaps no better than that of Harijans and who have long been victims of neglect on the part of the so-called high classes. The Adibasis should have found a special place in the constructive programme. Non-mention was an oversight. They provide a vast field of service for Congressmen. The Christian missionary has been more or less in sole occupation of the field. Great as his labour has been, it has not prospered as it might have, because of his ultimate aim being the Adibasis' conversion to his fold and their becoming de-Indianised. Anyway no one who hopes to construct Swaraj on the foundation of non-violence can afford to neglect even the least of India's sons. Adibasis are too numerous to be counted among the least.

Hand-spun as Measure of Value

In my part of India shells and seedless dried almonds were used as coins accepted by the people and the State treasury. They had no intrinsic value. They were a measure of people's deep poverty. They could not afford the lowest metal coin. Five shells would buy them a little vegetable or a needle. I have suggested a measure which will not be a mere token but which will have always an intrinsic value which will also be its market value. In that sense it will be an ideal measure. For the present and by way of experiment I have suggested a warp length of a single thread of yarn as the lowest measure and to be used in dealings principally with the spinners and generally with khadi lovers. The spinners can have all their daily wants supplied as against fixed quantity of yarn. Stores will need to be maintained by the A. I. S. A. in combination with the A. I. V. I. A. and ultimately with those who will give their co-operation. As I conceive it the system can be worked only if it is decentralised. This is not its demerit but merit. The end to be sought is human happiness combined with full mental and moral development. I use the adjective moral as synonymous with spiritual. This end can be achieved under decentralisation. Centralisation as a system is inconsistent with non-violent structure of society. I have presented to khadi workers and those who are interested in the solution of the problem of India's poverty, the idea of a measure of value in its barest outline. Let them work it out and find for themselves flaws, if any, in the conception, and if they do not, let them enforce it where they can.

Physical Training and Ahimsa

About the time the Harijan had to cease, Gandhiji wrote a long article discussing the relation between physical training and Ahimsa. If that exhaustive article needed any elucidation, it is to be had from the lives of those who suffered and even laid down their life for a cherished mission. I was reading the other day the life of Dr. Pennel, the surgeon who worked among the frontier tribes for several years. Dr. Pennel's work, in my opinion, was weakened (to use a very mild word) by his proselytising zeal. He regarded medical missions as "the language of the church militant", and believed that part of the treatment of his patients consisted in preaching to them the gospel. Wherever he went he went with "an Afghan convert", and used all kinds of occasions (e.g. a horse-fair) for preaching the gospel, "undeterred by the hailstorm of stones and clods of earth which greeted him and his assistants." "At Hawed," says his biographer, "they at first encountered some opposition, for the people utterly refused all intercourse or medicine if there was also to be preaching. However, by dint of firmness and persuasion, they were induced to listen to a short non-controversial address and, afterwards later in the day, Dr. Pennel was able to preach three times without let or hindrance." On occasions one wonders which to admire more—Dr. Pennel's pathetic zeal in pouring his preaching down his patients' throats along with his medicines, or his patients who, in spite of terrible suffering, "refused to listen to a word more of our wicked religion and left us"; which to admire more—the surgeon who preached the gospel to unwilling patients, or the patients who "heard the gospel time after time but remained untouched, saying, as, alas, so many do, 'your medicine is very good, but your religion is very wicked.'"

But that is about the way the missionary spoils his good work. These prefatory remarks were necessary before I proceeded to describe the fearlessness of Dr. Pennel—the fearlessness which no physical training in the use of the sword or firearms gave him, but which came from his passion for his work. Indeed a reading of the various ways in which Gandhiji says a Satyagrahi should physically fit himself put me forcibly in mind of Dr. Pennel. He had certainly built up his body in his youth by gymnastic exercises, swimming, taking long treks, and so on, but never by sword-play or rifle-practice. But see what a wonderful example he has left for all Satyagrahis:

"After a treacherous attack on a British force by the Waziris, the officer in command of the troops at Bannu wished the Mission to have a guard of soldiers, a precaution of which Dr. Pennel distinctly disapproved as he maintained that the surest way of calling forth the kindness and protection of the tribes, was by showing them that he did not rely upon material arms for his defence. For this reason he never carried arms of any description himself, and on more than one occasion it was this fact which saved him from assassins who deemed it cowardly to attack an unarmed man."

He had trained himself by hard discipline. Starvation, he thought, was part of the daily lot of a missionary, and he used to collect crusts of bread till they were dry enough to satisfy his Spartan taste. He gave up most of the comforts that one may lawfully enjoy; he had none of the "petty vices"; never smoked; walked miles on end without tiring; travelled all night in tongas, ekkas, and on horseback; "in a tonga he generally slept sitting upright, with his long legs curled over the luggage; in a tum-tum he found it less risky to sleep in the net under the seats, his head at the driver's feet and his feet sticking out over the footboard at the back; and as the driver generally kept the horses' grass in this net, he found it a very comfortable bed! An ekka did not afford such good sleeping accommodation, so he would unwind his turban, and plaiting it about the poles of the awning would draw his knees up to his chin, and thus leaning against the back-rest made by his puggri or turban would sleep peacefully until his journey's end." Once while paying a visit to Esa Khel District, he found the river Kurram very much swollen, "so, dismounting from his riding camel he swam across and got some men to go back for the beast. On reaching mid-stream the animal lost its footing and turned over and over in the river. With great difficulty they got the saddle off, and with the help of some more men pulled it to the land half-drowned." Again, while on his pilgrimage as a sadhu on a cycle, "we had to ford the river several times. We lost ourselves in a jungle of tamarisk bushes. These grew denser and denser till we had to lift our machines at arm's length and over our heads and struggle through, while our lower garments got torn to shreds and our legs badly scratched."

He had thus learnt to accustom himself to physical endurance, but what made him an utter stranger to fear was his passion for his mission.

"When he heard that a certain Mullah had preached of his murder as a sure road to Paradise for the Ghazi who accomplished it, he forthwith set out unarmed and unescorted to visit the house of his adversary. If a road were known to be beset by raiders, his intrepid spirit would find exhilaration in traversing just that way. It was this spirit of fearlessness that not only won him friends among the manly Pathans but more than once was the means of saving his life."

As I write this I am reminded of Shri Ravishanker Vyas, the life and soul of the reform movement among the 'criminal tribes' of the Kheda district. No physical drill or sword-play has given him the remarkable capacity for physical endurance and fearlessness that he has. He can walk miles on end, dare death and devilry, and when in jail he used to grind 45 seers of ata (the maximum hard task) in less than the time ordinary criminals used to take over it.

The Minimum Test

And as for the concrete test of belief in Ahimsa. I am reminded of a conversation between Gandhiji and a would-be Satyagrahi in an Indian State. It indicated that Gandhiji expected a much higher standard of qualification from the would-be Satyagrahis in Indian States than from those in British India; but it also indicates the minimum test of belief in the charkha as the pivot of constructive work. The would-be Satyagrahi said he was a believer in Ahimsa.

"How much do you spin—5 yards or 50 yards?" Gandhiji asked him.

"Never more than 50, and sometimes even less than 5," was the answer.

"Do you spin every day, or once every week, or every month?"

"I don't spin more than 50 or 100 yards in a month."

"Do you make your own slivers?"

This last question was hardly justified after the answers the previous questions had elicited, but Gandhiji went on in an almost ruthless way.

"No, Mahatmaji," was the reply.

"Then where do you get them from? Get them by post?"

"No, I get from the khadi bhandar, and when I do not get them there, I get them through friends coming from places where slivers can be had." I have a suspicion that the reply was prompted by the question which indicated a rebuke if the slivers were got by post. Poor man! He might have said: "I spin so precious little that I have my year's supply at a time from the bhandar."

"Do you make your mal (string) yourself or do you purchase a reel from the market?"

It was no use pursuing this inquiry, and more questions would have landed him into more scrapes. His friend, therefore, intervened and said: "Mahatmaji, he is a believer in Ahimsa, and that, I thought, was the essential qualification. According to the test you now apply we are all likely to fail."

"Well then," said Gandhiji rather sternly, "it is better that none of you takes part in Satyagraha than that you should go without being properly qualified. My standard is inexorable. I want you to spin not only regularly but intelligently. I want you to know how to test your yarn, how to draw fine yarn and coarse yarn, to know the economics of khadi and so on. And when you will say to me, 'I know all these things,' I will ask you: 'What about your life?' Do you observe non-violence in your relations with the members of your family and in your daily affairs? Where is the good of your saying you accept non-violence in theory? Supposing you said you accepted the theory of khadi, but purchased and used foreign cloth, how would your acceptance of the theory help me? And please understand that, while in British India I am prepared to reconcile myself to belief in Ahimsa as a policy, I want you in the States to believe in it as a creed. Violence in many Indian States is greater than in British India, and we want the supreme purity and sacrifice of a Prahlad to meet the violence there. Give me a Prahlad, and I shall give him my blessings."

Begin at Home

In this connection let me reproduce here a part of a letter addressed by Gandhiji to Khan Saheb Abdul Ghaffar Khan. It will be remembered that the Khan Saheb believes in Ahimsa as a creed as he has unequivocally stated once again in his recent statement on the Bardoli decision, and he desires to train those who will follow him also as cent per cent non-violent

Satyagrahis. It is necessary to know this in order to understand the letter:

"I hope that all the conversation we had in Bombay has soaked into you. If it has, every problem could be solved by reference to those fundamentals which I tried to put before you. Our non-violence has to begin at home with our children, elders, neighbours and friends. We have to overlook the so-called blemishes of our friends and neighbours and never forgive our own. Then only shall we be able to right ourselves, and as we ascend higher, our non-violence has to be practised among our political associates. We have to see and approach the viewpoints of those who differ from us. We have to be patient with them and convince them of their errors and be convinced of our own. Then proceeding further we have to deal patiently and gently with political parties that have different policies and different principles. We have to look at their criticism from their own standpoint, always remembering that the greater the distance between ourselves and others, the greater the scope for the play of our non-violence; and it is only when we have passed our examination or test in these fields that we can deal with those against whom we are fighting and who have grievously wronged us.

This was one thing we talked about. The other thing I said was that a non-violent man has to keep himself engaged usefully during all waking hours, and therefore constructive work is for him what arms are for the violent man."

This last sentence sums up in the vividest manner the essential difference between a believer in violence and non-violence.

M. D.

WAR AGAINST DESTRUCTION

In one of his speeches Shri Vinoba contrasted the obvious expressions of violence and non-violence. "Constructive work is the obvious expression of non-violence, destructive work that of violence. Violence expresses itself in bombing, destroying buildings, hospitals, churches, and innocent women and children. Non-violence creates where violence destroys; it creates the wherewithal to clothe the naked and feed the hungry. Violence expresses itself in incendiarism; non-violence extinguishes not only physical fires but the fires of hatred and vengeance." It is this conviction that made him throw himself heart and soul into the movement for the spread of education through crafts, and even in his statement before the court he mentioned it as a principal item of the constructive programme.

In the present turmoil when our intellects are clouded by ever-increasing war propaganda and our vision blurred by the smoke-screen of passion and hate, we may not see the part education through crafts has to play in the future. But wise people in all lands know what is in store for us if we do not stem the tide of destruction. In an editorial article of the Holidays Number of the American School Arts the editor deplors the prospect and emphasises the increasing need for craft-education. "The world is witnessing today the supposedly greatest nations in cultural development, bending all their manhood and materials into building greater and better engines and transports for mass destruction of all that other men have built," says he, and adds: "Now as never before we should use all our energies towards creating more creative minds for building a new world for tomorrow's men, that they may have more creative minds and hands for creating the beautiful, rather than the destructive. This great art appreciation can only be established through actual doing, the actual handwork, rather than the mere book learning that has impeded for years our proper art growth." And this is how he inweighs against the wrong education with which we have clogged and corrupted the minds of our children: "For many years a false ideal has persisted that culture or genteelness consisted largely of not working with one's hands. Men with calloused hands were something uncouth, and the greatest desire of many a mother was to see her son capably placed in a 'white collar' job where he could accumulate wealth with a brain that would work only at a desk. This belief has brought its penalties upon each nation who made it an ideal, in lower standards of health, lesser art achievements, and social difficulties, and many leaders of our nation today are urging a greater return to the use of hands through many avenues of creative work. The seeming trend of the human minds, even evident in the mere child, is that of destroying or the breaking up of constructed objects. The tendency of destruction in the child mind will not grow as a trait in the adult, if he learns to use his hands in constructive art. He will too greatly respect all that goes into handicraft to ever approve the urge for destroying any part of the art crafts of his fellow men."

The editor also cites the statements of prominent American public men in support of "the learning which comes of doing things with the hands". William Knudsen, President of the General Motors Corporation, says:

"In pioneer days when book learning was rare, the man who made his living sitting at a desk was envied. But the pioneer's legitimate aspiration for learning has decayed into a kind of snobbery which considers it more honorable to handle a telephone than a wrench, more socially desirable to dictate to a stenographer than to direct a crew of skilled mechanics. In the years from 14 to 20, when the creative urge ought to be developing and flowering, most of a youngster's energy is devoted to cramming theories out of books. The young man then finds himself all dressed up with theoretical knowledge and no place to go. Psychiatrists in recent years have been treating nervous breakdowns by occupational therapy. Possibly, if these people originally had a useful sideline involving manual skill, the breakdowns never would have occurred. And brain training is likewise an essential part of hand training. The best man is one who combines the learning of books with the learning which comes of doing things with the hands."

Boris Blai, Director of Fine Arts, Temple University, says:

"During twelve years of teaching young people in arts, I have not found one student who did not possess a latent creative instinct that yearned for expression. I am convinced that every human being possesses a creative urge to make beautiful things, that this urge can be brought out and put to work with proper encouragement, and that suppression of it results in maladjustment of life. Furthermore, it is actually dangerous not to use your hands. Tests by neurologists at the Temple and other universities show that mental ability increases as the ability to use the hand increases. Manual work demands clear thinking, the working out of your own solutions to problems."

What can be a stronger argument than this last in support of our national plan of education through crafts? Against the training for the art of efficient destruction, the training which puts the musket on the shoulder of the child who has compulsorily to join the junior branch of the Hitler Jugend (youth) at the age of seven, there is the education which begins with a good grounding in creative work. Education through creative basic crafts can alone stem the tide of destruction that militarist education helps to swell every day.

TO SUBSCRIBERS AND AGENTS

Communications for the manager and money orders should be sent not to Sevagram or Poona but to the following address:

The Manager, HARIJAN, Ahmedabad

Cheques and postal orders should be drawn in favour of the Manager, Harijan, and not of any individual, and postal orders should be made payable at the Ahmedabad Post Office.

Correspondents will please note that the offices of the Harijan weeklies have been transferred from Poona to Ahmedabad, and communications or remittances sent to the former place will be delayed in reaching their proper destination. The subscriber number should be quoted in all communications.

A letter has been addressed to the agents stating the terms of agency, etc. Would-be agents will please communicate with the manager.

No individual or organisation or agent, except our own branch in Bombay (130. Princess Street), has been authorised to receive subscriptions on our behalf.

A specimen copy will be supplied on receipt of postal stamps worth one and half annas.

DON'T DIVIDE THE HOUSE

[The following is a summary of Gandhiji's Hindi speech at the A. I. C. C. meeting introducing the Bardoli Resolution.

M. D.

An Ordinary Mortal

I was not a little perturbed when the Maulana raised me sky-high. I do not live up in the air. I am of the earth, earthy. I have never seen an aeroplane. I am like you, an ordinary mortal made of common clay.

The question of ahimsa would not have come up before you, had it not come up before the Working Committee in Bardoli. And it was well that it came up. The result has been good, not bad. But before I say anything on this question, let me make one or two things clear.

A Political Method

I am, as I have said, an ordinary mortal like you. Had that not been the case, we should not have been able to work together these twenty years. Ahimsa with me is a creed, the breath of my life. But it is never as a creed that I placed it before India, or for the matter of that before anyone except in casual informal talks. I placed it before the Congress as a political method, to be employed for the solution of political questions. It may be it is a novel method, but it does not on that account lose its political character. I tried it for the first time in South Africa — after I found that all the so-called constitutional remedies, with which Congress work in India had made me familiar, had failed. The question there was exclusively of the political existence of Indians who had settled in South Africa as merchants, petty hawkers, etc. It was for them a question of life and death, and it was in dealing with it that this method of non-violence came to me. The various measures that I adopted there were not the work of a visionary or a dreamer. They were the work of an essentially practical man dealing with practical political questions. As a political method, it can always be changed, modified, altered, even given up in preference to another. If, therefore, I say to you that our policy should not be given up today, I am talking political wisdom. It is political insight. It has served us in the past, it has enabled us to cover many stages towards Independence, and it is as a politician that I suggest to you that it is a grave mistake to contemplate its abandonment. If I have carried the Congress with me all these years, it is in my capacity as a politician. It is hardly fair to describe my method as religious because it is new.

The Maulana has affectionately used high words of praise for me, but I cannot accept them. I have been taunted as a Bania. I regard that as a certificate of merit. The article in my possession is an invaluable pearl. It has to be weighed in the proper scales, and those who can pay the price for it can have it. It cannot be bartered away even for Independence.

Non-violence has brought us near to Swaraj as never before. We dare not exchange it even for Swaraj. For Swaraj thus got will be no true Swaraj. The question is not what we will do after Swaraj. It is whether under given conditions we can give up non-violence to win Swaraj. Again, do you expect to win real Independence by abandoning non-violence? Independence for me means the Independence of the humblest and poorest amongst us. It cannot be obtained by joining the war. For the Congress to join any war before the attainment of Complete Independence is to undo the work of the past twenty years.

Inexpedient to Divide House

And yet why is it that I stand before you to plead with you to accept the resolution, and not even to divide the house? The reason is that the resolution reflects the Congress mind. It undoubtedly is a step backward. We have not a clean slate to write on. Our elders have taken a step which has produced world-wide reactions. To alter the resolution out of shape is to ignore these. It would be unwise to change the policy adopted by the Working Committee. The world had a right to think that the Working Committee's policy would be endorsed by you. At one time I had thought of dividing the A. I. C. C., but I saw that it would be a mistake. It would be almost violence. Non-violence does not act in the ordinary way.

Sometimes a step back is a prelude to a step forward. It is highly likely that our step will be of that character.

The resolution is a mirror in which all groups can see themselves. The original was Jawaharlalji's draft, but it was referred to a sub-committee at whose hands it has undergone material changes. The original had left no room for Rajaji to work. The sub-committee opened a tiny window for him to squeeze in. Jawaharlalji's opposition to participation in the war effort is almost as strong as mine, though his reasons are different. Rajaji would participate, if certain conditions acceptable to the Congress were fulfilled. The non-violent non-cooperators like Rajendra Babu have certainly a place, for, until the remote event takes place, non-violence rules supreme.

It is no longer open to the Government and the Congress critics to say that the Congress has banged the door to negotiation on the impossible or unpolitical ground of non-violence. The resolution throws the burden on the Government of wooing the Congress on the basis of participation in the war effort. That nothing is to be expected from the Government is probably too true. Only the resolution puts the Congress right with the expectant world. And since there is a party in the Congress who will welcome an honourable offer that will satisfy the rigidest test, it is as well that the resolution has accommodated this party. It is likely in the end to make all of one mind. Out and out believers in non-violence of the political type have the whole field open to them.

When there was a talk of the A. I. C. C. being possibly divided, several people contemplated the prospect with trepidation, lest the Congress should again listen to mad Gandhi's advice in order to retain his leadership, and become a religious organisation instead of the political organisation that it has been all these years. Let me disabuse them of their fear, and say that the Congress can do no such thing, that we have not wasted the past twenty years. All that the Congress has decided to do is that it will allow the world to deal with it in terms that the world can understand, and if the terms are good enough, it will accept them. But you may be also sure that the Congress will not be easily satisfied. It will go on repeating 'Not this', 'Not this', until it wins the real commodity it wants. You will, therefore, say exactly what you want, and I will also say all I want. That is why I have decided to issue the three weeklies, and I will go on venting my views therein with the fullest freedom, as long as I am allowed to do so. In the meanwhile, if you can get what you want, you will strike the bargain, and you may be sure that I will not shed a single tear. I therefore do not want to cheat the world of its jubilation over the resolution. I do not want the Congress to look ridiculous in the eyes of the world. I do not want it to be said that in order to retain my leadership you bade good-bye to your convictions.

Operative Part

Some friends have complained that the resolution has no operative clause. The complaint is true so far as the resolution is concerned. The resolution had to be merely explanatory. It is addressed less to Congressmen, it is addressed to the world. It is not even addressed to the Government.

But there are the instructions about the constructive programme for Congressmen. They form the operative part. It is a substitute for civil disobedience and the parliamentary programme. Civil disobedience has been wisely reserved for me as an expert. It is good that, so long as I am alive and well in mind; it is so reserved. And so far as I am concerned, there will be none, if the Government do not interfere with Harijan. For this weekly will constitute enough propaganda against all war. I have no ill-will against Britishers, and for that matter against Germans, Italians or Japanese. I can have none against the Russians who have done great things for the proletariat. The Chinese sail in the same boat with us. I would like all these nations to be at peace with one another. I would like to think that India will, through her non-violence, be a messenger of peace to the whole world. Even political non-violence has potency of which we have no conception. Harijan will deliver the message of peace from week to week. But if this is not permitted, then will be the time for civil disobedience as a token. I want every worker to be out for constructive work. And if I am rendered penless, I may become the sole resister. But I have no fixed plan. Events will show the way.

So much for civil disobedience.

Parliamentary Programme

Though the parliamentary mentality has come to stay, in my opinion the parliamentary programme can have no place in Congress work so long as the war lasts. The Congress cannot handle it without identifying itself with the war effort. I have always held that at all times it is the least part of a nation's activity. The most important and permanent work is done outside. Legislators are not the masters but servants of their electors — the nation. The less, therefore, we look at and depend upon parliaments the better. Power resides in the people either through their arms or through their civil disobedience, more comprehensively described as non-violent non-cooperation. But the power of non-cooperation comes only through solid, incessant constructive work. Non-violent strength comes from construction, not destruction. Hence today the constructive programme is the only thing before the Congress. And in this all parties are at one.

No Split

Do not please go away with the idea that there is a rift in the Congress lute. The Working Committee has worked like members of a happy family. Somebody suggested that Pandit Jawaharlal and I were estranged. It will require much more than differences of opinion to estrange us. We have had differences from the moment we became co-workers, and yet I have said for some years and say now that not Rajaji but Jawaharlal will be my successor. He says he does not understand my language, and that he speaks a language foreign to me. This may or may not be true. But language is no bar to a union of hearts. And I know this that when I am gone he will speak my language.

Let there be no lack of understanding or zeal among Congressmen. Neither Jawaharlal nor Rajaji will let you be idle. I certainly will not. Lastly, let those who think the constructive programme is insipid know that there is nothing in the Working Committee's resolutions to prevent a Congressman at his own risk from leading civil disobedience — individual or mass. If he succeeds, he will win nothing but praise from all. But let me warn enthusiasts that they will not handle the weapon with any success. They will only damage themselves and the cause by any hasty or ignorant action. And let me say as your expert that those who regard the constructive programme as insipid do not know what non-violence is and how it works.

Some Congressmen are sorry because I have relinquished the leadership of the Congress. You have not lost me. You would lose me only if I ceased to be loyal to the Congress, only if I became a visionary, only if I ceased to be a practical man. It is not at Bardoli that I left the Congress; I did so seven years ago at Bombay, and I did so in order to be able to render greater service to the country and the Congress. Colleagues like the Sardar and Rajendra Babu are not happy over the resolution, but I am asking them not to leave the Working Committee. But even if they leave the Congress, the Congress is not going to cease to function. Its work will go on, whether they are there or not. No man, however great, is indispensable to the Congress. Those who built up the Congress like Dadabhai, Pherozeshah and Tilak are no more, but the Congress still functions. For they have left for us an edifice to work upon and expand. And if the passing away of these leaders has not made any difference, why should the withdrawal of other leaders make any?

WORKING COMMITTEE'S INSTRUCTIONS

This meeting of the A. I. C. C. endorses the following instructions issued by the Working Committee and calls upon all Provincial and other Subordinate Congress Committees to give effect to them within their respective areas. The Provincial Congress Committees are authorised to supplement them wherever necessary. The Committee expects every member of an elective Congress Committee to devote himself actively to the execution of some item of this programme, and to send periodical reports of the work done by him to his Committee:

Recent developments in the world situation have brought war near to India's frontiers. This may lead to internal dislocation in certain parts of the country and there is a possibility of some cities being subjected to aerial attack. Whatever dangers and difficulties might arise, the real antidote to them is to remain cool and collected and on no account to give way to nervousness and excitement. Congressmen must remain at their posts and continue their service of the people; wherever necessity arises they should yield places of safety to those in greater need and be ready to render aid to those who may require it.

The Congress can help and serve the people in the difficult times ahead only if its organisation is strong and disciplined and Congressmen individually and Congress Committees are able to command confidence in their respective localities. Congress Committees and Congressmen should therefore address themselves immediately to the task of strengthening the organisation and reviving and maintaining contacts with the people in the villages and towns. Every village should, as far as possible, receive the message of the Congress and be prepared to face such difficulties as might arise.

The constructive programme adopted by the Congress, and explained from time to time by Gandhiji, is of particular importance at this juncture. It is meant not only to bring about unity among various groups, to remove disabilities which keep sections of the community backward and depressed, to promote self-reliance and the co-operative spirit among the people, to increase production and have fairer distribution, but it also furnishes the best opportunity and means of contacts with the people and service to them which are necessary for winning their confidence. The Working Committee therefore call upon Congress Committees and workers to further this programme intensively, and thus exercise a steadying and strengthening influence in times of dislocation and uneasiness.

During such times there is always a possibility of trouble being created by unsocial elements in the country. To avoid the emergence of such a situation and to meet it when it arises, volunteers should be organised in both the urban and rural areas. Such organisations should be formed on the basis of strict non-violence, and it should always be remembered that the Congress adheres to this principle. These volunteers may co-operate with other organisations working for similar ends. This volunteer organisation is meant for rendering service to the people both normally and in the event of possible internal commotion. It should therefore avoid conflict with the authorities.

Prices of commodities have already risen and are causing distress among the people and no adequate steps have so far been taken by the authorities to meet this situation. These tendencies are likely to be accentuated in the future, and dislocation of trade and transport, due to stress of war, may lead to scarcity of the necessities of life as well as of many other things which are of everyday use. Big scale industries in other countries have suffered heavily on account of the war, and transport of goods has become difficult on account of military requirements. China has largely overcome these difficulties by a wide-spread development of village industries. India may have to face similar problems, and village and cottage industries afford a solution, desirable in itself, and more particularly, suited to the needs of the moment. Such industries can escape to a large extent the effects of dislocation of trade and transport. It is therefore necessary that this item of the constructive programme should be widely taken up and worked up with vigour and earnestness so that the countryside may be rendered, as far as possible, self-sufficient in regard to the necessities of life. The Committee would especially recommend to the villagers the growing of food crops at least to cover the needs of the village and appeal to the grain dealers not to hold up stores for profit but to release them for consumption at fair prices.

In cases of emergency, when instructions are issued to the public by the authorities for the preservation of life and property and the maintenance of public order, Congressmen should avoid conflict with the authorities. They should carry out such instructions, unless they are contrary to Congress directions.

REAL WAR EFFORT

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The greatest need of the immediate present is to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. There is already scarcity in the land both of food and clothing. As the war progresses, both the scarcities must increase. There are no imports from outside, either of food-stuff or of cloth. The well-to-do may not feel the pinch as yet or at all, but the poor are feeling it now. The well-to-do live on the poor. There is no other way. What is then their duty? He who saves gains as much, that is to say he produces as much. Hence those who feel for the poor, those who would be one with them must curtail their wants. There are many ways. I shall only mention some here. There is much, too much food eaten and wasted by the well-to-do.

Use one grain at a time. Chapati, rice, and pulses, milk, ghee, gud, and oil are used in ordinary households besides vegetables and fruit. I regard this as an unhealthy combination. Those who get animal protein in the shape of milk, cheese, eggs or meat need not use pulses at all. The poor people get only vegetable protein. If the well-to-do give up pulses and oils, they set free these two essentials for the poor who get neither animal protein nor animal fat. Then the grain eaten should not be sloppy. Half the quantity suffices when it is eaten dry and not dipped in any gravy. It is well to eat it with raw salads such as onion, carrot, radish, salad leaves, tomatoes. An ounce or two of salads serves the purpose of eight ounces of cooked vegetables. Chapatis or bread should not be eaten with milk. To begin with, one meal may be raw vegetables and chapati or bread, and the other cooked vegetables with milk or curds.

Sweet dishes should be eliminated altogether. Instead gud or sugar in small quantities may be taken with milk or bread or by itself.

Fresh fruit is good to eat, but only a little is necessary to give tone to the system. It is an expensive article, and an over-indulgence by the well-to-do has deprived the poor and the ailing of an article which they need much more than the well-to-do.

Any medical man who has studied the science of dietetics will certify that what I have suggested can do no harm to the body, on the contrary it must conduce to better health.

This is only one way of saving food-stuff. It is obvious. But by itself it cannot produce much visible effect.

Grain-dealers have to shed their greed and the habit of making as much profit as possible. They must be satisfied with as little as possible. They run the risk of being looted, if they do not gain the credit of being keepers of grain for the sake of the poor. They should be in touch with the people in their neighbourhood. Congressmen have to visit grain-dealers within their beat and give them the message of the time.

By far the most important part of the work consists in educating the villagers to keep what they have and to induce cultivation of fresh crops wherever water is available. This requires wide-spread and intelligent propaganda. It is not generally known that bananas, potatoes, beetroot, yam and suran, and in a measure pumpkin are a food crop easily grown. They can take the place of bread in time of need.

There is too scarcity of money. There may be grain available but no money to buy it with. There is no money because there is no employment. This has to be found. Spinning is the readiest and the handiest. But local needs may supply other sources of labour. Every available source has to be tapped so that there is no want of employment. Only the lazy ones need and must starve. Patient handling will induce even this class to shed their laziness.

The problem of clothing is much easier than feeding, if it is handled well and in time. The mills may not be relied on in these times. There is ample cotton to be had in India. It is a problem for cotton cultivators how to dispose of their stock. The outside market is closed to them. Our mills cannot absorb the whole of the crop. It can be utilised, if the nation takes to spinning not for wages but for the sake of clothing the naked. Of course those who need employment will spin for profit. This number must be limited. They need organising. Much money will be needed for the purpose. But national spinning does not need so much organising. Profit motive being eliminated and willingness being assumed, organisation is reduced to simplest terms.

This is no time for multiplying wheels. They take time to manufacture. Raw material is daily becoming dearer. Wheels cannot be manufactured everywhere. Places where they are can be counted by the fingers of one hand.

Therefore I suggest the plying of the dhanush takli and even the simple takli. The former should be manufactured locally. Indeed it is difficult to manufacture the simple takli at once in lacs. The dhanush takli is the only thing which can be the easiest manufactured. Slivers cannot be supplied to spinners. Each one should get some cotton for himself or herself, and card it as well as may be with the hand or with a home-made small bow such as the children in the Bihar basic schools have. All this can be done because no one is expected to manufacture a large quantity of yarn. If every one of our available millions span for one hour daily, there would be enough yarn to keep every hand-loom going. The reader should know that there are lacs of hand-loom weavers in the land. There is danger of their starving for want of yarn.

Here is a great task for every Congressman to undertake. He has to become a good spinner and carder and know how to manufacture the dhanush takli. Let every Congressman begin with himself and his family and neighbours, and he will find that the life-giving contagion spreads like wild fire which envelops you before you hardly know what you are witnessing.

Any organisation that tackles these two problems successfully will command the love and confidence of the people. I hope that all will join in this real war effort. It is none the less effective because it is peaceful and constructive.

Will the Princes let their people do this work without let or hindrance? Will Qaide Azam Jinnah allow the members of the Muslim League to co-operate with the Congress workers in this truly national but non-political work which is also humanitarian? There are 23,000 Muslim spinners, carders and weavers earning their daily bread through the A. I. S. A.

COMMUNAL UNITY

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Freedom will not come through parliamentary effort. Therefore communal pacts, whilst they are good if they can be had, are valueless unless they are backed by the union of hearts. Without it there can be no peace in the land. Even Pakistan can bring no peace, if there is no union of hearts. This union can come only by mutual service and co-operative work.

Separate electorates have resulted in the separation of hearts. They presupposed mutual distrust and conflict of interests. They have tended to perpetuate differences and deepen the distrust.

How to get out of the tangle is the question. I want just now to confine myself to the four Muslim majority provinces. In them there is natural Pakistan in the sense that the permanent majority can rule the minority. I hold it to be utterly wrong thus to divide man from man by reason of religion which is liable to change. What conflict of interest can there be between Hindus and Muslims in the matter of revenue, sanitation, police, justice, or the use of public conveniences? The difference can only be in religious usage and observances with which a secular State has no concern.

Congressmen, if they are not to merge in the Hindus as Hindus, must rigidly abstain from the legislatures and local bodies governed by separate electorates. In these provinces the separate electorates must be taken to have come from the Hindu demand and in the supposed Hindu interest. But a Congress Hindu has no interest apart from his Muslim brother. Therefore he must not enter the electoral bodies where Hindu and Muslim interests are falsely regarded as separate and even antagonistic. If he enters these bodies, he can do so only to divide the majority members, i. e. to take sides with one Muslim Party or another. If I could make all Hindus Congress-minded, I would withdraw every Hindu member from these bodies and put the Muslim members on their honour. I would seek to influence them from outside these bodies by being friends with them and rendering disinterested service. I would be indifferent to their manning all the services. At the most an infinitesimal percentage can have a share in them. And it is a superstition to suppose that these services can oppress a people who have become conscious of human dignity and human rights and know how to enforce them. Since the vast majority of Congressmen are Hindus in at least three Muslim majority provinces, they have a rare opportunity of showing their non-violent strength; their disinterestedness, their utter freedom from the communal taint, and their ability to submit to the rule of their Muslim fellow countrymen. They will do this not in a huff but as true nationalists and friends of the Muslims. Remaining outside they will probably better protect the just interests of Hindus as citizens. For a Congress Hindu is not any the less a Hindu because he claims to represent equally, as he must, all the other faiths in himself. For as I have said, so far as the State is concerned, its capacity for service stops short of the service of the different faiths, and the services it can render apply to all irrespective of their faiths. Therefore Congressmen have a rare opportunity of showing undefiled nationalism in these provinces. They will incidentally show the other minorities that they have nothing to fear from the majorities if they know the true way. We must get out of the miasma of religious majorities and minorities. Why is a Parsi's interest different from a Hindu's or Muslim's so far as the State is concerned? Did not Dadabhai and Pherozeshah rule the Congress while they lived, not by Congress grace or patronage, but by right of service and merit? Did their rule injure any Hindu or Muslim interest? Were these interests ever in conflict on the Congress platform? And is not the Congress a voluntary State?

Constructive Programme and Government

Will not the working of the constructive programme bring Congressmen into conflict with the Government? This was one of the many questions asked at the meeting of the principal members of the A. I. C. C. I addressed in Wardha on the 17th. My answer was that the whole programme was so conceived as to avoid conflict. Of course the most innocent activity may be so manipulated as to provoke conflict. I expect every Congress worker to do his best to avoid it. But there is no help for it, if the Government prohibit such activities because they are undertaken by Congressmen who believe that the working of the constructive programme will bring Swaraj. That is the only non-violent way to achieve the end. Swaraj by non-violent means must come from the creative effort of those who desire it. The Government should welcome every such effort, unless they want to prevent even cent per cent non-violent movement. In that case conflict will become unavoidable. But I am of opinion that no conflict is possible, at any rate while the war lasts, unless Congress workers want or provoke it. They have to work, work and work. They will make no speeches or demonstrations in doing their constructive work. As I have already said, today most of the items of constructive work happen to be—like feeding and clothing—common cause between the Government and the people.

TRIUMPH OF NON-VIOLENCE

History Repeats Itself

The ratification of the Bardoli decision by the A. I. C. C. which met at Wardha on the 15th and 16th of this month is a triumph not of violence but of non-violence. On the other hand, if a bare majority had rejected the Bardoli resolution and adopted one declaring all opposition to war predominantly on the ground of non-violence, it might well have been a triumph of violence. I propose to place before the reader a few facts in order to help him to understand my meaning. When the Working Committee met at Bardoli Gandhiji had drafted for them a resolution reiterating the Congress policy and programme of complete non-participation in the war under all circumstances. A couple of days' discussion with the members was an eye-opener to him. He did not even place the draft before the members. Then came the draft prepared by a committee appointed by the Working Committee. It was a compromise resolution which, as the statements by some members of the Working Committee showed, was not acceptable to at least half the members of the Committee. "Should these members seek to divide the A. I. C. C.?" was the question. The first impulse was in the affirmative. Then came the reactions to the resolution in India and outside. Gandhiji's mind was almost made up before he returned to Sevagram that the first impulse was wrong, and that there should be no attempt to divide the A. I. C. C. Rather than leave it to any of the members of the Working Committee to give the lead to the house, Gandhiji himself in a speech packed with argument commended the resolution on the very ground of non-violence.

History here repeated itself. After the Chauri Chaura decision in 1922 there was the meeting of the A. I. C. C. in Delhi where Gandhiji found such an "under-current of violence, both conscious and unconscious", that he "was actually and literally praying for a disastrous defeat." A similar disillusionment came at Ahmedabad in 1924 where the four resolutions he moved were passed by a bare majority. He decided that the majority must be regarded as a minority, and rejected ultimately the fruit of the majority vote. "Majorities," he declared, "cannot deceive me," and within a few months he signed an agreement with the late Pandit Motilal Nehru and Deshbandhu Das declaring suspension of the non-cooperation movement and a "total surrender on my part". And in a fervent appeal to the so-called No-changers he said: "I have often said, and I repeat for the millionth time, that, if you do not believe in the charkha, you must go to the councils. . . . My appeal to you is to cleanse your hearts and to have charity. Make your hearts as broad as the ocean. That is the teaching of the Koran and the Gita. . . . Why should you say that their politics are corrupt? Heaven protect us from any such calumny of human nature. So long as the world lasts, so long will there be so many differences of opinion, and the greatest achievement of No-changers will be when they make their so-called opponents their truest friends and convert them to the creed of the charkha."

The result of the seeds of non-violence so assiduously sown was the Satyagraha movement of 1930-31, which made India's fight for freedom known throughout the world.

Misplaced Zeal

If some of those who opposed the resolution, after Gandhiji had made a fervent appeal to them not to divide the house, had remembered this past history, they would have held their souls in peace and not advanced arguments which were correct but which lacked reality. Thus when one knew that even the acceptance of the Bardoli resolution was due to Gandhiji's appeal, it was hardly proper to remind them of Simon who betrayed his Master thrice before the cock crew and to tell them that they had thrown their Pilot overboard. When a questioner asked one of the speakers who opposed the resolution whether he preferred non-violence to Independence, he might have said, "Independence won at the expense of non-violence is no Independence at all." Instead he said: "You do not know the great implications of non-violence!" C. R. would have put the case for non-violence in an unassailable way, had he chosen to do so.

A Dexterous Speech

But he chose to play a different part. It did one's soul good to watch the whole house listen to his dispassionate, closely-reasoned, compact speech with patient and respectful attention. If the advocates of non-violence gave an illustration of bad lawyers spoiling a good case, Rajaji's was an instance of an able lawyer apparently winning a bad case. Born teacher he is a lover of parables and similes. But he used a simile which, though at the moment applauded, was really at his own expense. "Do you think, if I go a hunting, I should hunt for rats and rabbits? I should go in for big game." "Two strings to the bow", or "killing two birds with one stone" may suit the genius of the English language, but the Indian language has ek panth do kaj (two errands in one journey). But Rajaji triumphantly used a simile which I should have hesitated ever to associate with the mild Brahman that he is. And then one would like to ask him: "Which is the bigger game of the two—leading a non-violent India to victory, or a violent India to a doubtful victory and a possible humiliating defeat?"

Then he said: "It is thought that I am advising the Congress to throw away the weapon of non-violence"—the weapon he described as "our only weapon"—"and some even go further and say I have actually taken up the weapon of violence. But it is all wrong." This was perfectly correct. But not quite so correct as what followed: "So far as the attainment of Swaraj goes and my general outlook on life goes, I adhere to the principle of non-violence. I have not suddenly changed my attitude. But in certain extensions of the principle I do not share Gandhiji's confidence. For him there is no question of extension—for it is a creed with him, applicable to all circumstances, but it is not a creed with us." There can be no question about the honesty of the argument. But is it correct? Can one who contemplates participation in violent war for purposes of defence against an aggressor or in return for a promise of full freedom claim to adhere to the principle of non-violence for the attainment of freedom? And has Gandhiji ever asked for an extension of his creed to all circumstances? I have gone over several files of Young India to make myself sure if ever Gandhiji ran into that error. Again and again I find him talking of limited non-violence. "I have not the capacity for preaching universal non-violence," he wrote in 1925, "I preach, therefore, non-violence restricted strictly to the purpose of winning our freedom and, therefore, perhaps for preaching the regulation of international relations by non-violent means. Before I can preach universal non-violence, I must be wholly free from passions, I must be wholly incapable of sin. Let the revolutionary pray with and for me that I may soon become that. But meanwhile let him take with me the one step to it which I see as clearly as day-light, viz. to win India's freedom with strictly non-violent means. And then under Swaraj you and I shall have a disciplined, intelligent police force that would keep order within and fight raiders from without, if by that time I or someone else does not show a better way of dealing with either."

Rajaji had quite a number of weapons in his armoury. With apparently devastating effect he quoted the General Secretary against himself: "India has often declared its opposition to Nazism and Fascism. Its sympathies have all along been with the Democratic countries. It was therefore prepared to help. It was not, however, possible for it to do this unless its shackles were removed. The Working Committee, therefore, on September 14th issued a statement..... 'If, therefore, England wanted the free and willing help of India, it must declare its war aims,'" and so on. But Rajaji was really not quoting the General Secretary against himself,—for in that paragraph Acharya Kripalani was only summarising the argument leading up to the Working Committee's statement of September 14th and summarising the statement itself—but he was quoting the Working Committee's statement in support of the stand he has consistently taken since the Poona resolution. In doing so, however, he forgot two very vital facts: one—that ever since the framing of that statement there had been a controversy going on amongst the members of the Working Committee regarding the connotation of the words "free and willing help", Gandhiji always meaning thereby moral support; two—that Acharya Kripalani was always of the same view as Gandhiji. In Poona the things came to a head, the Working Committee decided that not moral but material help was meant, and also decided that India pledged to non-violence for the attainment of Independence could give it. That compelled Gandhiji to withdraw. The Poona resolution was bad not, as he explained later and during his recent Wardha speech, because of the position taken up, but because he was wrong in having abdicated his function and having allowed the Working Committee to interpret non-violence.

He came back in Bombay, not because he discovered any new political points of contact with the sponsors of the Poona resolution, but because he believed he had discovered that he had succeeded in weaning them from the idea of violent participation in the war, and that they had come into line with him in opposing participation on among other grounds non-violence also, to which the Congress creed had pledged them.

Another Fallacy

In this connection I would like to refer to an argument used by Pandit Jawaharlal with the same apparently devastating effect. "If," he said, (I am paraphrasing his Hindustani) "we say we cannot participate on the sole ground of non-violence, what would the world think of us? They would feel that we were opposing the war as mere pacifists and that we had no political grounds, and Britain would successfully delude the world into believing that beyond pacifism we had no case at all." I wonder how Panditji could say this in face of the fact that Gandhiji had made it abundantly clear in his letter to the Maulana that the opposition was principally on the ground of non-violence. The world knows that all responsible people in India—whether pacifists or non-pacifists—are sworn enemies of India's slavery, and Britain cannot possibly delude the world.

"Then," it may be argued, "the principal ground is political and the non-violence ground is subsidiary. Why should Gandhiji describe the ground of non-violence as the principal one?" Well, there's the rub. What Gandhiji has been trying to explain, and has for the time being failed to explain to many of his colleagues, is that the principal ground is non-violence, because we are pledged to win India's Independence by peaceful and legitimate means. That is an overwhelmingly political ground and no religious or ethical one. It is impossible to lay too much emphasis on this point, if one honestly wants to understand the meaning of the present controversy.

There was another argument in Panditji's speech that I would like to advert to. He explained most eloquently how the present war and the two "years of horror" had strengthened his predilection for non-violence. "But," he said, "we have to choose between two evils. Gandhiji has himself taught us that violence is any day preferable to abject cowardice. How can we therefore bind ourselves as regards the future?" There is no question as regards the future. And Gandhiji would be the first man to advise violent defence in preference to cowardly abandonment of hearths and homes and women and children.

The Same Language

And when one comes to think of it, the consistency of argument and even the identity of language used by Gandhiji nearly twenty years ago with that of today is striking indeed. Take these two or three extracts which might have been written or spoken only the other day: "Cowardice, whether philosophical or otherwise, I abhor. And if I can be persuaded that revolutionary activity has dispelled cowardice, it will go a long way to soften my abhorrence of the method, however much I may still oppose it on principle."

And this: "I would not hesitate to turn the Congress into an exclusively khaddar-producing and khaddar propaganda organisation till the attainment of Swaraj, just as I would not hesitate, if I believed in the use of arms and giving violent battle to England, to make the Congress an organisation exclusively devoted to training the nation in the use of arms." Also: "I have recognised that the nation has the right, if it so wills, to vindicate her freedom even by actual violence. Only then India ceases to be the land of my love, though she be the land of my birth, even as I should take no pride in my mother if she went astray."

Why

Gandhiji in his speech did make it clear that the resolution was taking us back, he also made it clear that in substance it repeated the Poona resolution, and he might even have said that so long as the Congress creed was there the resolution was unconstitutional. But his non-violence would not let him use that argument, unassailable as it would have been. Never was the precept of 'agreeing with thine adversary quickly', and 'going twain with him who asks you to go a mile' practised with such thorough-going deliberation. And he put the whole burden of the future on those who were for out and out non-violence. It was for them to employ all the twentyfour hours in the constructive programme, it was for them to show that the constructive programme meant the construction of Swaraj. "The whole key to the situation lies in the hands of No-changers," as he used to say in 1924.

And what he said then applies with greater force today in that we are faced with a much greater danger. "If we are few," he said, "we must perish in the attempt to quench the conflagration raging about us. If there are such No-changers, they cannot quarrel with the agreement (with the Swarajists). For it is but a method of finding out the number of unbending and unbendable No-changers — No-changers whose love will stand the severest test and whose faith in the triple constructive programme will, if necessary, outlast the faithlessness of the rest of India." The only difference is that the programme is not threefold, nor even thirteenfold, it is thirtyfold today.

As he said it in his brief English speech in reply to a question by Shri Prakasam: "The suspension of satyagraha has connection only with the present condition of the country, and I want every single man who thinks with me to remain outside and do work rather than go to jail and read the Koran and the Gita and lead an easy life there. I won't let them lead an easy life. Jawaharlal will ask for diaries from thousands of men. He is not going to sleep. Therefore, if you will go away with the real message to the country, do not criticise this resolution. Nobody is rendered incapable of giving the fullest possible service, in fact he is made capable of the fullest growth, by reason of this resolution. Civil disobedience remains under my control, and the reason for its suspension is wholly extraneous to my retirement from office. Every one of you has to give a good account of yourself. If all will pull your full weight in the fulfilment of the constructive programme, you will find a different India in six months' time."

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Congress and A. R. P.

Q. Can a Congressman belong to A. R. P. and such other committees connected with the war?

A. I think not. But this does not mean that he will render no help in caring for those who may be injured by bombs or otherwise. On the contrary he will be expected to be most assiduous in rendering such help.

Economic Equality

Q. While working the constructive programme can a Congressman preach economic equality? How can working the civil disobedience programme bring it about?

A. You can certainly preach it, if your speech is strictly non-violent and not in the manner of some who, I know, have preached forcible dispossession of land-owners and capitalists. But I have shown a better way than preaching. The constructive programme takes the country a long way towards the goal. This is the most auspicious time for it. The charkha and the allied industries, if fully successful, practically abolish all inequalities, both social and economic. The rising consciousness of the strength which non-violence gives to the people, and their intelligent refusal to co-operate in their slavery must bring about equality.

Strengthen the Organisation

Q. What is the meaning of strengthening the Congress organisation?

A. You can strengthen it no doubt by enlisting members who know the meaning of the fundamental article of the Congress, namely attainment of Poorna Swaraj by peaceful and legitimate means. Enlisting of bogus members and members for seizing power in the Congress is vicious and harmful.

There is no room for power politics within the Congress, if the Congress is to end the power or the system that grinds the people and be itself in power. Therefore real strengthening of the organisation consists in every Congressman working the constructive programme to its fullest capacity. Enlisting bona fide members without much effort provides running expense of the Congress, only if the enlisting itself does not eat up the subscriptions you collect from members.

DON'T DIVIDE THE HOUSE

[ The following is a summary of Gandhiji's Hindi speech at the A. I. C. C. meeting introducing the Bardoli Resolution.

M. D.

An Ordinary Mortal

I was not a little perturbed when the Maulana raised me sky-high. I do not live up in the air. I am of the earth, earthy. I have never seen an aeroplane. I am like you, an ordinary mortal made of common clay.

The question of ahimsa would not have come up before you, had it not come up before the Working Committee in Bardoli. And it was well that it came up. The result has been good, not bad. But before I say anything on this question, let me make one or two things clear.

A Political Method

I am, as I have said, an ordinary mortal like you. Had that not been the case, we should not have been able to work together these twenty years. Ahimsa with me is a creed, the breath of my life. But it is never as a creed that I placed it before India, or for the matter of that before anyone except in casual informal talks. I placed it before the Congress as a political method, to be employed for the solution of political questions. It may be it is a novel method, but it does not on that account lose its political character. I tried it for the first time in South Africa — after I found that all the so-called constitutional remedies, with which Congress work in India had made me familiar, had failed. The question there was exclusively of the political existence of Indians who had settled in South Africa as merchants, petty hawkers, etc. It was for them a question of life and death, and it was in dealing with it that this method of non-violence came to me. The various measures that I adopted there were not the work of a visionary or a dreamer. They were the work of an essentially practical man dealing with practical political questions. As a political method, it can always be changed, modified, altered, even given up in preference to another. If, therefore, I say to you that our policy should not be given up today, I am talking political wisdom. It is political insight. It has served us in the past, it has enabled us to cover many stages towards Independence, and it is as a politician that I suggest to you that it is a grave mistake to contemplate its abandonment. If I have carried the Congress with me all these years, it is in my capacity as a politician. It is hardly fair to describe my method as religious because it is new.

The Maulana has affectionately used high words of praise for me, but I cannot accept them. I have been taunted as a Bania. I regard that as a certificate of merit. The article in my possession is an invaluable pearl. It has to be weighed in the proper scales, and those who can pay the price for it can have it. It cannot be bartered away even for Independence.

Non-violence has brought us near to Swaraj as never before. We dare not exchange it even for Swaraj. For Swaraj thus got will be no true Swaraj. The question is not what we will do after Swaraj. It is whether under given conditions we can give up non-violence to win Swaraj. Again, do you expect to win real Independence by abandoning non-violence? Independence for me means the Independence of the humblest and poorest amongst us. It cannot be obtained by joining the war. For the Congress to join any war before the attainment of Complete Independence is to undo the work of the past twenty years.

Inexpedient to Divide House

And yet why is it that I stand before you to plead with you to accept the resolution, and not even to divide the house? The reason is that the resolution reflects the Congress mind. It undoubtedly is a step backward. We have not a clean slate to write on. Our elders have taken a step which has produced world-wide reactions. To alter the resolution out of shape is to ignore these. It would be unwise to change the policy adopted by the Working Committee. The world had a right to think that the Working Committee's policy would be endorsed by you. At one time I had thought of dividing the A. I. C. C., but I saw that it would be a mistake. It would be almost violence. Non-violence does not act in the ordinary way.

Sometimes a step back is a prelude to a step forward. It is highly likely that our step will be of that character.

The resolution is a mirror in which all groups can see themselves. The original was Jawaharlalji's draft, but it was referred to a sub-committee at whose hands it has undergone material changes. The original had left no room for Rajaji to work. The sub-committee opened a tiny window for him to squeeze in. Jawaharlalji's opposition to participation in the war effort is almost as strong as mine, though his reasons are different. Rajaji would participate, if certain conditions acceptable to the Congress were fulfilled. The non-violent non-cooperators like Rajendra Babu have certainly a place, for, until the remote event takes place, non-violence rules supreme.

It is no longer open to the Government and the Congress critics to say that the Congress has banged the door to negotiation on the impossible or unpolitical ground of non-violence. The resolution throws the burden on the Government of wooing the Congress on the basis of participation in the war effort. That nothing is to be expected from the Government is probably too true. Only the resolution puts the Congress right with the expectant world. And since there is a party in the Congress who will welcome an honourable offer that will satisfy the rigidest test, it is as well that the resolution has accommodated this party. It is likely in the end to make all of one mind. Out and out believers in non-violence of the political type have the whole field open to them.

When there was a talk of the A. I. C. C. being possibly divided, several people contemplated the prospect with trepidation, lest the Congress should again listen to mad Gandhi's advice in order to retain his leadership, and become a religious organisation instead of the political organisation that it has been all these years. Let me disabuse them of their fear, and say that the Congress can do no such thing, that we have not wasted the past twenty years. All that the Congress has decided to do is that it will allow the world to deal with it in terms that the world can understand, and if the terms are good enough, it will accept them. But you may be also sure that the Congress will not be easily satisfied. It will go on repeating 'Not this', 'Not this', until it wins the real commodity it wants. You will, therefore, say exactly what you want, and I will also say all I want. That is why I have decided to issue the three weeklies, and I will go on venting my views therein with the fullest freedom, as long as I am allowed to do so. In the meanwhile, if you can get what you want, you will strike the bargain, and you may be sure that I will not shed a single tear. I therefore do not want to cheat the world of its jubilation over the resolution. I do not want the Congress to look ridiculous in the eyes of the world. I do not want it to be said that in order to retain my leadership you bade good-bye to your convictions.

Operative Part

Some friends have complained that the resolution has no operative clause. The complaint is true so far as the resolution is concerned. The resolution had to be merely explanatory. It is addressed less to Congressmen, it is addressed to the world. It is not even addressed to the Government.

But there are the instructions about the constructive programme for Congressmen. They form the operative part. It is a substitute for civil disobedience and the parliamentary programme. Civil disobedience has been wisely reserved for me as an expert. It is good that, so long as I am alive and well in mind, it is so reserved. And so far as I am concerned, there will be none, if the Government do not interfere with Harijan. For this weekly will constitute enough propaganda against all war. I have no ill-will against Britishers, and for that matter against Germans, Italians or Japanese. I can have none against the Russians who have done great things for the proletariat. The Chinese sail in the same boat with us. I would like all these nations to be at peace with one another. I would like to think that India will, through her non-violence, be a messenger of peace to the whole world. Even political non-violence has potency of which we have no conception. Harijan will deliver the message of peace from week to week. But if this is not permitted, then will be the time for civil disobedience as a token. I want every worker to be out for constructive work. And if I am rendered penless, I may become the sole resister. But I have no fixed plan. Events will show the way.

So much for civil disobedience.

Parliamentary Programme

Though the parliamentary mentality has come to stay, in my opinion the parliamentary programme can have no place in Congress work so long as the war lasts. The Congress cannot handle it without identifying itself with the war effort. I have always held that at all times it is the least part of a nation's activity. The most important and permanent work is done outside. Legislators are not the masters but servants of their electors — the nation. The less, therefore, we look at and depend upon parliaments the better. Power resides in the people either through their arms or through their civil disobedience, more comprehensively described as non-violent non-cooperation. But the power of non-cooperation comes only through solid, incessant constructive work. Non-violent strength comes from construction, not destruction. Hence today the constructive programme is the only thing before the Congress. And in this all parties are at one.

No Split

Do not please go away with the idea that there is a rift in the Congress lute. The Working Committee has worked like members of a happy family. Somebody suggested that Pandit Jawaharlal and I were estranged. It will require much more than differences of opinion to estrange us. We have had differences from the moment we became co-workers, and yet I have said for some years and say now that not Rajaji but Jawaharlal will be my successor. He says he does not understand my language, and that he speaks a language foreign to me. This may or may not be true. But language is no bar to a union of hearts. And I know this that when I am gone he will speak my language.

Let there be no lack of understanding or zeal among Congressmen. Neither Jawaharlal nor Rajaji will let you be idle. I certainly will not. Lastly, let those who think the constructive programme is insipid know that there is nothing in the Working Committee's resolutions to prevent a Congressman at his own risk from leading civil disobedience — individual or mass. If he succeeds, he will win nothing but praise from all. But let me warn enthusiasts that they will not handle the weapon with any success. They will only damage themselves and the cause by any hasty or ignorant action. And let me say as your expert that those who regard the constructive programme as insipid do not know what non-violence is and how it works.

Some Congressmen are sorry because I have relinquished the leadership of the Congress. You have not lost me. You would lose me only if I ceased to be loyal to the Congress, only if I became a visionary, only if I ceased to be a practical man. It is not at Bardoli that I left the Congress; I did so seven years ago at Bombay, and I did so in order to be able to render greater service to the country and the Congress. Colleagues like the Sardar and Rajendra Babu are not happy over the resolution, but I am asking them not to leave the Working Committee. But even if they leave the Congress, the Congress is not going to cease to function. Its work will go on, whether they are there or not. No man, however great, is indispensable to the Congress. Those who built up the Congress like Dadabhai, Pherozeshah and Tilak are no more, but the Congress still functions. For they have left for us an edifice to work upon and expand. And if the passing away of these leaders has not made any difference, why should the withdrawal of other leaders make any?

WORKING COMMITTEE'S INSTRUCTIONS

This meeting of the A. I. C. C. endorses the following instructions issued by the Working Committee and calls upon all Provincial and other Subordinate Congress Committees to give effect to them within their respective areas. The Provincial Congress Committees are authorised to supplement them wherever necessary. The Committee expects every member of an elective Congress Committee to devote himself actively to the execution of some item of this programme, and to send periodical reports of the work done by him to his Committee:

Recent developments in the world situation have brought war near to India's frontiers. This may lead to internal dislocation in certain parts of the country and there is a possibility of some cities being subjected to aerial attack. Whatever dangers and difficulties might arise, the real antidote to them is to remain cool and collected and on no account to give way to nervousness and excitement. Congressmen must remain at their posts and continue their service of the people; wherever necessity arises they should yield places of safety to those in greater need and be ready to render aid to those who may require it.

The Congress can help and serve the people in the difficult times ahead only if its organisation is strong and disciplined and Congressmen individually and Congress Committees are able to command confidence in their respective localities. Congress Committees and Congressmen should therefore address themselves immediately to the task of strengthening the organisation and reviving and maintaining contacts with the people in the villages and towns. Every village should, as far as possible, receive the message of the Congress and be prepared to face such difficulties as might arise.

The constructive programme adopted by the Congress, and explained from time to time by Gandhiji, is of particular importance at this juncture. It is meant not only to bring about unity among various groups, to remove disabilities which keep sections of the community backward and depressed, to promote self-reliance and the co-operative spirit among the people, to increase production and have fairer distribution, but it also furnishes the best opportunity and means of contacts with the people and service to them which are necessary for winning their confidence. The Working Committee therefore call upon Congress Committees and workers to further this programme intensively, and thus exercise a steadying and strengthening influence in times of dislocation and uneasiness.

During such times there is always a possibility of trouble being created by unsocial elements in the country. To avoid the emergence of such a situation and to meet it when it arises, volunteers should be organised in both the urban and rural areas. Such organisations should be formed on the basis of strict non-violence, and it should always be remembered that the Congress adheres to this principle. These volunteers may co-operate with other organisations working for similar ends. This volunteer organisation is meant for rendering service to the people both normally and in the event of possible internal commotion. It should therefore avoid conflict with the authorities.

Prices of commodities have already risen and are causing distress among the people and no adequate steps have so far been taken by the authorities to meet this situation. These tendencies are likely to be accentuated in the future, and dislocation of trade and transport, due to stress of war, may lead to scarcity of the necessities of life as well as of many other things which are of everyday use. Big scale industries in other countries have suffered heavily on account of the war, and transport of goods has become difficult on account of military requirements. China has largely overcome these difficulties by a wide-spread development of village industries. India may have to face similar problems, and village and cottage industries afford a solution, desirable in itself, and more particularly, suited to the needs of the moment. Such industries can escape to a large extent the effects of dislocation of trade and transport. It is therefore necessary that this item of the constructive programme should be widely taken up and worked up with vigour and earnestness so that the countryside may be rendered, as far as possible, self-sufficient in regard to the necessities of life. The Committee would especially recommend to the villagers the growing of food crops at least to cover the needs of the village and appeal to the grain dealers not to hold up stores for profit but to release them for consumption at fair prices.

In cases of emergency, when instructions are issued to the public by the authorities for the preservation of life and property and the maintenance of public order, Congressmen should avoid conflict with the authorities. They should carry out such instructions, unless they are contrary to Congress directions.

REAL WAR EFFORT

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The greatest need of the immediate present is to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. There is already scarcity in the land both of food and clothing. As the war progresses, both the scarcities must increase. There are no imports from outside, either of food-stuff or of cloth. The well-to-do may not feel the pinch as yet or at all, but the poor are feeling it now. The well-to-do live on the poor. There is no other way. What is then their duty? He who saves gains as much, that is to say he produces as much. Hence those who feel for the poor, those who would be one with them must curtail their wants. There are many ways. I shall only mention some here. There is much, too much food eaten and wasted by the well-to-do.

Use one grain at a time. Chapati, rice, and pulses, milk, ghee, gud, and oil are used in ordinary households besides vegetables and fruit. I regard this as an unhealthy combination. Those who get animal protein in the shape of milk, cheese, eggs or meat need not use pulses at all. The poor people get only vegetable protein. If the well-to-do give up pulses and oils, they set free these two essentials for the poor who get neither animal protein nor animal fat. Then the grain eaten should not be sloppy. Half the quantity suffices when it is eaten dry and not dipped in any gravy. It is well to eat it with raw salads such as onion, carrot, radish, salad leaves, tomatoes. An ounce or two of salads serves the purpose of eight ounces of cooked vegetables. Chapatis or bread should not be eaten with milk. To begin with, one meal may be raw vegetables and chapati or bread, and the other cooked vegetables with milk or curds.

Sweet dishes should be eliminated altogether. Instead gud or sugar in small quantities may be taken with milk or bread or by itself.

Fresh fruit is good to eat, but only a little is necessary to give tone to the system. It is an expensive article, and an over-indulgence by the well-to-do has deprived the poor and the ailing of an article which they need much more than the well-to-do.

Any medical man who has studied the science of dietetics will certify that what I have suggested can do no harm to the body, on the contrary it must conduce to better health.

This is only one way of saving food-stuff. It is obvious. But by itself it cannot produce much visible effect.

Grain-dealers have to shed their greed and the habit of making as much profit as possible. They must be satisfied with as little as possible. They run the risk of being looted, if they do not gain the credit of being keepers of grain for the sake of the poor. They should be in touch with the people in their neighbourhood. Congressmen have to visit grain-dealers within their beat and give them the message of the time.

By far the most important part of the work consists in educating the villagers to keep what they have and to induce cultivation of fresh crops wherever water is available. This requires wide-spread and intelligent propaganda. It is not generally known that bananas, potatoes, beetroot, yam and suran, and in a measure pumpkin are a food crop easily grown. They can take the place of bread in time of need.

There is too scarcity of money. There may be grain available but no money to buy it with. There is no money because there is no employment. This has to be found. Spinning is the readiest and the handiest. But local needs may supply other sources of labour. Every available source has to be tapped so that there is no want of employment. Only the lazy ones need and must starve. Patient handling will induce even this class to shed their laziness.

The problem of clothing is much easier than feeding, if it is handled well and in time. The mills may not be relied on in these times. There is ample cotton to be had in India. It is a problem for cotton cultivators how to dispose of their stock. The outside market is closed to them. Our mills cannot absorb the whole of the crop. It can be utilised, if the nation takes to spinning not for wages but for the sake of clothing the naked. Of course those who need employment will spin for profit. This number must be limited. They need organising. Much money will be needed for the purpose. But national spinning does not need so much organising. Profit motive being eliminated and willingness being assumed, organisation is reduced to simplest terms.

This is no time for multiplying wheels. They take time to manufacture. Raw material is daily becoming dearer. Wheels cannot be manufactured everywhere. Places where they are can be counted by the fingers of one hand.

Therefore I suggest the plying of the dhanush takli and even the simple takli. The former should be manufactured locally. Indeed it is difficult to manufacture the simple takli at once in lacs. The dhanush takli is the only thing which can be the easiest manufactured. Slivers cannot be supplied to spinners. Each one should get some cotton for himself or herself, and card it as well as may be with the hand or with a home-made small bow such as the children in the Bihar basic schools have. All this can be done because no one is expected to manufacture a large quantity of yarn. If every one of our available millions span for one hour daily, there would be enough yarn to keep every hand-loom going. The reader should know that there are lacs of hand-loom weavers in the land. There is danger of their starving for want of yarn.

Here is a great task for every Congressman to undertake. He has to become a good spinner and carder and know how to manufacture the dhanush takli. Let every Congressman begin with himself and his family and neighbours, and he will find that the life-giving contagion spreads like wild fire which envelops you before you hardly know what you are witnessing.

Any organisation that tackles these two problems successfully will command the love and confidence of the people. I hope that all will join in this real war effort. It is none the less effective because it is peaceful and constructive.

Will the Princes let their people do this work without let or hindrance? Will Quaid Azam Jinnah allow the members of the Muslim League to co-operate with the Congress workers in this truly national but non-political work which is also humanitarian? There are 23,000 Muslim spinners, carders and weavers earning their daily bread through the A. I. S. A.

On the way to Kashi, 19-1-42

COMMUNAL UNITY

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Freedom will not come through parliamentary effort. Therefore communal pacts, whilst they are good if they can be had, are valueless unless they are backed by the union of hearts. Without it there can be no peace in the land. Even Pakistan can bring no peace, if there is no union of hearts. This union can come only by mutual service and co-operative work.

Separate electorates have resulted in the separation of hearts. They presupposed mutual distrust and conflict of interests. They have tended to perpetuate differences and deepen the distrust.

How to get out of the tangle is the question. I want just now to confine myself to the four Muslim majority provinces. In them there is natural Pakistan in the sense that the permanent majority can rule the minority. I hold it to be utterly wrong thus to divide man from man by reason of religion which is liable to change. What conflict of interest can there be between Hindus and Muslims in the matter of revenue, sanitation, police, justice, or the use of public conveniences? The difference can only be in religious usage and observances with which a secular State has no concern.

Congressmen, if they are not to merge in the Hindus as Hindus, must rigidly abstain from the legislatures and local bodies governed by separate electorates. In these provinces the separate electorates must be taken to have come from the Hindu demand and in the supposed Hindu interest. But a Congress Hindu has no interest apart from his Muslim brother. Therefore he must not enter the electoral bodies where Hindu and Muslim interests are falsely regarded as separate and even antagonistic. If he enters these bodies, he can do so only to divide the majority members, i. e. to take sides with one Muslim Party or another. If I could make all Hindus Congress-minded, I would withdraw every Hindu member from these bodies and put the Muslim members on their honour. I would seek to influence them from outside these bodies by being friends with them and rendering disinterested service. I would be indifferent to their manning all the services. At the most an infinitesimal percentage can have a share in them. And it is a superstition to suppose that these services can oppress a people who have become conscious of human dignity and human rights and know how to enforce them. Since the vast majority of Congressmen are Hindus in at least three Muslim majority provinces, they have a rare opportunity of showing their non-violent strength, their disinterestedness, their utter freedom from the communal taint, and their ability to submit to the rule of their Muslim fellow countrymen. They will do this not in a huff but as true nationalists and friends of the Muslims. Remaining outside they will probably better protect the just interests of Hindus as citizens. For a Congress Hindu is not any the less a Hindu because he claims to represent equally, as he must, all the other faiths in himself. For as I have said, so far as the State is concerned, its capacity for service stops short of the service of the different faiths, and the services it can render apply to all irrespective of their faiths. Therefore Congressmen have a rare opportunity of showing undefiled nationalism in these provinces. They will incidentally show the other minorities that they have nothing to fear from the majorities if they know the true way. We must get out of the miasma of religious majorities and minorities. Why is a Parsi's interest different from a Hindu's or Muslim's so far as the State is concerned? Did not Dadabhai and Pherozeshah rule the Congress while they lived, not by Congress grace or patronage, but by right of service and merit? Did their rule injure any Hindu or Muslim interest? Were these interests ever in conflict on the Congress platform? And is not the Congress a voluntary State?

Constructive Programme and Government

Will not the working of the constructive programme bring Congressmen into conflict with the Government? This was one of the many questions asked at the meeting of the principal members of the A. I. C. C. I addressed in Wardha on the 17th. My answer was that the whole programme was so conceived as to avoid conflict. Of course the most innocent activity may be so manipulated as to provoke conflict. I expect every Congress worker to do his best to avoid it. But there is no help for it, if the Government prohibit such activities because they are undertaken by Congressmen who believe that the working of the constructive programme will bring Swaraj. That is the only non-violent way to achieve the end. Swaraj by non-violent means must come from the creative effort of those who desire it. The Government should welcome every such effort, unless they want to prevent even cent per cent non-violent movement. In that case conflict will become unavoidable. But I am of opinion that no conflict is possible, at any rate while the war lasts, unless Congress workers want or provoke it. They have to work, work and work. They will make no speeches or demonstrations in doing their constructive work. As I have already said, today most of the items of constructive work happen to be—like feeding and clothing—common cause between the Government and the people.

History Repeats Itself

The ratification of the Bardoli decision by the A. I. C. C. which met at Wardha on the 15th and 16th of this month is a triumph not of violence but of non-violence. On the other hand, if a bare majority had rejected the Bardoli resolution and adopted one declaring all opposition to war predominantly on the ground of non-violence, it might well have been a triumph of violence. I propose to place before the reader a few facts in order to help him to understand my meaning. When the Working Committee met at Bardoli Gandhiji had drafted for them a resolution reiterating the Congress policy and programme of complete non-participation in the war under all circumstances. A couple of days' discussion with the members was an eye-opener to him. He did not even place the draft before the members. Then came the draft prepared by a committee appointed by the Working Committee. It was a compromise resolution which, as the statements by some members of the Working Committee showed, was not acceptable to at least half the members of the Committee. "Should these members seek to divide the A. I. C. C.?" was the question. The first impulse was in the affirmative. Then came the reactions to the resolution in India and outside. Gandhiji's mind was almost made up before he returned to Sevagram that the first impulse was wrong, and that there should be no attempt to divide the A. I. C. C. Rather than leave it to any of the members of the Working Committee to give the lead to the house, Gandhiji himself in a speech packed with argument commended the resolution on the very ground of non-violence.

History here repeated itself. After the Chauri Chaura decision in 1922 there was the meeting of the A. I. C. C. in Delhi where Gandhiji found such an "under-current of violence, both conscious and unconscious", that he "was actually and literally praying for a disastrous defeat." A similar disillusionment came at Ahmedabad in 1924 where the four resolutions he moved were passed by a bare majority. He decided that the majority must be regarded as a minority, and rejected ultimately the fruit of the majority vote. "Majorities," he declared, "cannot deceive me," and within a few months he signed an agreement with the late Pandit Motilal Nehru and Deshbandhu Das declaring suspension of the non-cooperation movement and a "total surrender on my part". And in a fervent appeal to the so-called No-changers he said: "I have often said, and I repeat for the millionth time, that, if you do not believe in the charkha, you must go to the councils. . . . My appeal to you is to cleanse your hearts and to have charity. Make your hearts as broad as the ocean: That is the teaching of the Koran and the Gita. . . . Why should you say that their politics are corrupt? Heaven protect us from any such calumny of human nature. So long as the world lasts, so long will there be so many differences of opinion, and the greatest achievement of No-changers will be when they make their so-called opponents their truest friends and convert them to the creed of the charkha."

The result of the seeds of non-violence so assiduously sown was the Satyagraha movement of 1930-31, which made India's fight for freedom known throughout the world.

Misplaced Zeal

If some of those who opposed the resolution, after Gandhiji had made a fervent appeal to them not to divide the house, had remembered this past history, they would have held their souls in peace and not advanced arguments which were correct but which lacked reality. Thus when one knew that even the acceptance of the Bardoli resolution was due to Gandhiji's appeal, it was hardly proper to remind them of Simon who betrayed his Master thrice before the cock crew and to tell them that they had thrown their Pilot overboard. When a questioner asked one of the speakers who opposed the resolution whether he preferred non-violence to Independence, he might have said, "Independence won at the expense of non-violence is no Independence at all." Instead he said: "You do not know the great implications of non-violence!" C. R. would have put the case for non-violence in an unassailable way, had he chosen to do so.

A Dexterous Speech

But he chose to play a different part. It did one's soul good to watch the whole house listen to his dispassionate, closely-reasoned, compact speech with patient and respectful attention. If the advocates of non-violence gave an illustration of bad lawyers spoiling a good case, Rajaji's was an instance of an able lawyer apparently winning a bad case. Born teacher he is a lover of parables and similes. But he used a simile which, though at the moment applauded, was really at his own expense. "Do you think, if I go ahunting, I should hunt for rats and rabbits? I should go in for big game." "Two strings to the bow", or "killing two birds with one stone" may suit the genius of the English language, but the Indian language has ek panth do kaj (two errands in one journey). But Rajaji triumphantly used a simile which I should have hesitated ever to associate with the mild Brahman that he is. And then one would like to ask him: "Which is the bigger game of the two—leading a non-violent India to victory, or a violent India to a doubtful victory and a possible humiliating defeat?"

Then he said: "It is thought that I am advising the Congress to throw away the weapon of non-violence"—the weapon he described as "our only weapon"—"and some even go further and say I have actually taken up the weapon of violence. But it is all wrong." This was perfectly correct. But not quite so correct as what followed: "So far as the attainment of Swaraj goes and my general outlook on life goes, I adhere to the principle of non-violence. I have not suddenly changed my attitude. But in certain extensions of the principle I do not share Gandhiji's confidence. For him there is no question of extension—for it is a creed with him, applicable to all circumstances, but it is not a creed with us." There can be no question about the honesty of the argument. But is it correct? Can one who contemplates participation in violent war for purposes of defence against an aggressor or in return for a promise of full freedom claim to adhere to the principle of non-violence for the attainment of freedom? And has Gandhiji ever asked for an extension of his creed to all circumstances? I have gone over several files of Young India to make myself sure if ever Gandhiji ran into that error. Again and again I find him talking of limited non-violence. "I have not the capacity for preaching universal non-violence," he wrote in 1925, "I preach, therefore, non-violence restricted strictly to the purpose of winning our freedom and, therefore, perhaps for preaching the regulation of international relations by non-violent means. Before I can preach universal non-violence, I must be wholly free from passions, I must be wholly incapable of sin. Let the revolutionary pray with and for me that I may soon become that. But meanwhile let him take with me the one step to it which I see as clearly as day-light, viz. to win India's freedom with strictly non-violent means. And then under Swaraj you and I shall have a disciplined, intelligent police force that would keep order within and fight raiders from without, if by that time I or someone else does not show a better way of dealing with either."

Rajaji had quite a number of weapons in his armoury. With apparently devastating effect he quoted the General Secretary against himself: "India has often declared its opposition to Nazism and Fascism. Its sympathies have all along been with the Democratic countries. It was therefore prepared to help. It was not, however, possible for it to do this unless its shackles were removed. The Working Committee, therefore, on September 14th issued a statement..... 'If, therefore, England wanted the free and willing help of India, it must declare its war aims,' " and so on. But Rajaji was really not quoting the General Secretary against himself, — for in that paragraph Acharya Kripalani was only summarising the argument leading up to the Working Committee's statement of September 14th and summarising the statement itself — but he was quoting the Working Committee's statement in support of the stand he has consistently taken since the Poona resolution. In doing so, however, he forgot two very vital facts: one — that ever since the framing of that statement there had been a controversy going on amongst the members of the Working Committee regarding the connotation of the words "free and willing help", Gandhiji always meaning thereby moral support; two — that Acharya Kripalani was always of the same view as Gandhiji. In Poona the things came to a head, the Working Committee decided that not moral but material help was meant, and also decided that India pledged to non-violence for the attainment of Independence could give it. That compelled Gandhiji to withdraw. The Poona resolution was bad not, as he explained later and during his recent Wardha speech, because of the position taken up, but because he was wrong in having abdicated his function and having allowed the Working Committee to interpret non-violence.

He came back in Bombay, not because he discovered any new political points of contact with the sponsors of the Poona resolution, but because he believed he had discovered that he had succeeded in weaning them from the idea of violent participation in the war, and that they had come into line with him in opposing participation on among other grounds non-violence also, to which the Congress creed had pledged them.

Another Fallacy

In this connection I would like to refer to an argument used by Pandit Jawaharlal with the same apparently devastating effect. "If," he said, (I am paraphrasing his Hindustani) "we say we cannot participate on the sole ground of non-violence, what would the world think of us? They would feel that we were opposing the war as mere pacifists and that we had no political grounds, and Britain would successfully delude the world into believing that beyond pacifism we had no case at all." I wonder how Panditji could say this in face of the fact that Gandhiji had made it abundantly clear in his letter to the Maulana that the opposition was principally on the ground of non-violence. The world knows that all responsible people in India — whether pacifists or non-pacifists — are sworn enemies of India's slavery, and Britain cannot possibly delude the world.

"Then," it may be argued, "the principal ground is political and the non-violence ground is subsidiary. Why should Gandhiji describe the ground of non-violence as the principal one?" Well, there's the rub. What Gandhiji has been trying to explain, and has for the time being failed to explain to many of his colleagues, is that the principal ground is non-violence, because we are pledged to win India's Independence by peaceful and legitimate means. That is an overwhelmingly political ground and no religious or ethical one. It is impossible to lay too much emphasis on this point, if one honestly wants to understand the meaning of the present controversy.

There was another argument in Panditji's speech that I would like to advert to. He explained most eloquently how the present war and the two "years of horror" had strengthened his predilection for non-violence. "But," he said, "we have to choose between two evils. Gandhiji has himself taught us that violence is any day preferable to abject cowardice. How can we therefore bind ourselves as regards the future?" There is no question as regards the future. And Gandhiji would be the first man to advise violent defence in preference to cowardly abandonment of hearths and homes and women and children.

The Same Language

And when one comes to think of it, the consistency of argument and even the identity of language used by Gandhiji nearly twenty years ago with that of today is striking indeed. Take these two or three extracts which might have been written or spoken only the other day: "Cowardice, whether philosophical or otherwise, I abhor. And if I can be persuaded that revolutionary activity has dispelled cowardice, it will go a long way to soften my abhorrence of the method, however much I may still oppose it on principle."

And this: "I would not hesitate to turn the Congress into an exclusively khaddar-producing and khaddar propaganda organisation till the attainment of Swaraj, just as I would not hesitate, if I believed in the use of arms and giving violent battle to England, to make the Congress an organisation exclusively devoted to training the nation in the use of arms." Also: "I have recognised that the nation has the right, if it so-wills, to vindicate her freedom even by actual violence. Only then India ceases to be the land of my love, though she be the land of my birth, even as I should take no pride in my mother if she went astray."

Why

Gandhiji in his speech did make it clear that the resolution was taking us back, he also made it clear that in substance it repeated the Poona resolution, and he might even have said that so long as the Congress creed was there the resolution was unconstitutional. But his non-violence would not let him use that argument, unassailable as it would have been. Never was the precept of 'agreeing with thine adversary quickly', and 'going twain with him who asks you to go a mile' practised with such thorough-going deliberation. And he put the whole burden of the future on those who were for out and out non-violence. It was for them to employ all the twentyfour hours in the constructive programme, it was for them to show that the constructive programme meant the construction of Swaraj. "The whole key to the situation lies in the hands of No-changers," as he used to say in 1924.

And what he said then applies with greater force today in that we are faced with a much greater danger. "If we are few," he said, "we must perish in the attempt to quench the conflagration raging about us. If there are such No-changers, they cannot quarrel with the agreement (with the Swarajists). For it is but a method of finding out the number of unbending and unbendable No-changers — No-changers whose love will stand the severest test and whose faith in the triple constructive programme will, if necessary, outlast the faithlessness of the rest of India." The only difference is that the programme is not threefold, nor even thirteenfold, it is thirtyfold today.

As he said it in his brief English speech in reply to a question by Shri Prakasam: "The suspension of satyagraha has connection only with the present condition of the country, and I want every single man who thinks with me to remain outside and do work rather than go to jail and read the Koran and the Gita and lead an easy life there. I won't let them lead an easy life. Jawaharlal will ask for diaries from thousands of men. He is not going to sleep. Therefore, if you will go away with the real message to the country, do not criticise this resolution. Nobody is rendered incapable of giving the fullest possible service, in fact he is made capable of the fullest growth, by reason of this resolution. Civil disobedience remains under my control, and the reason for its suspension is wholly extraneous to my retirement from office. Every one of you has to give a good account of yourself. If all will pull your full weight in the fulfilment of the constructive programme, you will find a different India in six months' time."

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Congress and A. R. P.

Q. Can a Congressman belong to A. R. P. and such other committees connected with the war?

A. I think not. But this does not mean that he will render no help in caring for those who may be injured by bombs or otherwise. On the contrary he will be expected to be most assiduous in rendering such help.

Economic Equality

Q. While working the constructive programme can a Congressman preach economic equality? How can working the civil disobedience programme bring it about?

A. You can certainly preach it, if your speech is strictly non-violent and not in the manner of some who, I know, have preached forcible dispossession of land-owners and capitalists. But I have shown a better way than preaching. The constructive programme takes the country a long way towards the goal. This is the most auspicious time for it. The charkha and the allied industries, if fully successful, practically abolish all inequalities, both social and economic. The rising consciousness of the strength which non-violence gives to the people, and their intelligent refusal to co-operate in their slavery must bring about equality.

Strengthen the Organisation

Q. What is the meaning of strengthening the Congress organisation?

A. You can strengthen it no doubt by enlisting members who know the meaning of the fundamental article of the Congress, namely attainment of Poorna Swaraj by peaceful and legitimate means. Enlisting of bogus members and members for seizing power in the Congress is vicious and harmful.

There is no room for power politics within the Congress, if the Congress is to end the power or the system that grinds the people and be itself in power. Therefore real strengthening of the organisation consists in every Congressman working the constructive programme to its fullest capacity. Enlisting bona fide members without much effort provides running expense of the Congress, only if the enlisting itself does not eat up the subscriptions you collect from members.

AN UNEXPECTED EXPERIENCE

Chokhamela

When Gandhiji consented to address the boys in the Chokhamela Boarding House at Nagpur on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee of the House he had no idea of the trouble he was inviting on himself. Chokhamela was one of the Harijan saints in Maharashtra whose name is still revered, who kept the torch of true religion and right living and devotion to God burning when there was darkness in the land, and who has been honourably mentioned by the late Mahadev Govind Ranade in his Rise of the Maratha Power. He was a Mahar, but as he revealed the light of self-realisation in his life he was canonised by the people and is revered by Brahmins and non-Brahmins alike. To associate an institution of Harijan boys with his name is in the fitness of things. When the boys of the Boarding House came to invite Gandhiji to address them he had not the slightest notion that, although the boys had unanimously invited him, one of the members of the Committee was opposed to the proposal. Much against his will he agreed to give a few minutes on his way back from Benares by breaking journey at Nagpur.

What Awaited Him?

But what awaited him? When he was told that a few Mahar youths were going to stage a black flag demonstration he simply smiled and said, 'I do not mind it.' As our car approached the quarter, a number of youths rushed towards the car shouting, 'Gandhi go back, Gandhi boycott.' Among them was no boy from the hostel, but only rowdies from the neighbourhood. In the compound was a large meeting of the hostel boys, and thousands of men and women from the city who had come for the celebration. Pandit Ravishanker Shukla, who was presiding over the function, was distributing the prizes as we went in. Within a minute or two he finished the function and Gandhiji began to address the gathering. There was noise. In a moment a youth sprang to his feet and said: "This is not the ordinary noise. We are protesting against your coming." Gandhiji invited him to come to the rostrum and say what he wanted to say. He had nothing more to say than this: "We do not want you here. Those who invited you here had no right to do so." "But why don't you want me here?" asked Gandhiji of him. "Because you have done nothing for the Harijans." "That's all? Have you anything more to say?" "Nothing more," he said, and after a while disappeared. No sooner than Gandhiji had uttered a few sentences a shower of stones came upon the audience from the rowdies, some of whom had now got upon the walls of the compound. They were, it seems, bent on breaking the meeting. They continued to pelt stones from outside in great fury. Two little children and a young man were hurt and two of them began to bleed profusely. Pandit Ravishanker Shukla and Gandhiji asked the audience to be quiet and to keep sitting no matter what happened. Two boys from the hostel were badly injured and they had to be removed to the hospital. The audience showed exemplary behaviour and listened to Gandhiji, whose address, which would otherwise have been finished in five minutes with a few words of blessings and advice to the boys, took a different turn. It was for him a rich experience and an occasion for further self-introspection and a fresh test of ahimsa, and direction to those who would wipe out the blot on Hinduism with non-violent means.

A Call to Self-purification

This is what he said in Hindustani:

"I am told by the friend who raised the voice of protest that those who invited me here had no right to do so. The fact is that it was the students of the Chokhamela Boarding House who came to Wardha to invite me. I had begged to be excused, but Shri Chaturbhuj Jasani intervened and told me that, if the work that carried me to Benares was after my heart, this might be even dearer inasmuch as it was the Silver Jubilee of an institution that had served Harijan boys. And since the abolition of untouchability is my life's work and I even toured the country for the same cause for one whole year, I agreed.

"But assuming that those who invited me had no right to do so, it was surely not my fault. These protests do not displease me. The Harijans have suffered all these centuries at the hands of the Savarna Hindus as from no one else, and as I am one of the latter I am participant in their sin. And I am never accustomed to weigh my sins in golden scales. I can atone for them only if I made a mountain of a molehill. The reason is simple. Man can never see his faults in proper perspective, and, if he really did so, he would scarcely survive them. The remedy is, therefore, to magnify one's shortcomings. And the sin of untouchability is so heinous that it is impossible to exaggerate it. Those who suffer from it are naturally liable to be angry with those who are trying to wipe it out. They may well say to me: 'Who are you to remove untouchability? We shall wipe it out with our own strength.' Now the way of demonstrating one's strength is of two kinds: one is the eternal, God-given way of self-purification, where man takes the blame upon himself of all the wrongs he is suffering from; the other is the way of retaliation, the Mosaic law of tooth for a tooth and nail for a nail.

The latter is quite natural in that we have descended from the state of brutes, and some of their qualities may have been exaggerated in us. It is Hitler's way. Because a Jew or many Jews may have wronged the Germans he thinks it is his duty to exterminate the whole Jewish race. To those Harijans who would destroy Caste Hindus and Hinduism I would say that the Hindus deserve it. But the Caste Hindus too owe a duty to themselves and their religion. Let them receive lathis and stones from Harijans, but they should continue to serve them.

"What, however, is to be done, if they will not receive our service? (Shower of stones at this stage, and a slight interruption due to the stones having injured a few from the audience.)

"Let the stones rain on us, we have to keep quiet and to hold this meeting. I had promised to stay here for ten minutes, but I am in no hurry to go now. Send word to the demonstrators that, if they will have a separate meeting, I am prepared to stay and address that meeting and answer the charges they may have to make against me. And what after all is my crime? That I am labouring for them? That I am endeavouring to put a little money into their pockets? That I am telling the Sanatanists day in and day out that they have to purge themselves of their sin? And why rain stones on the innocent audience?

"They wanted to hurt me, but what have they succeeded in doing? They have hurt a few innocent people including two children in the audience. If they wanted to punish me or those who invited me, they should have gone directly for us. Let me tell them that this hooliganism is the opposite of bravery, humanity, civility. Let me tell them they are going about the wrong way. They are injuring their own cause.

"Now a word to those assembled here. Though this is a boarding house, those who receive their board and lodging here are all students. I hope your stay here will be fruitful and give you what is real education. Let today's demonstration be a lesson to you. It should make you neither angry nor afraid, for anger and fear are twin sins. Let the demonstration awake you to your sense of duty and burn the eternal truth indelibly on your minds that only Truth quenches untruth, Love quenches anger, self-suffering quenches violence. This eternal rule is a rule not for saints only but for all. Those who observe it may be few but they are the salt of the earth, it is they who keep the society together, not those who sin against light and truth.

"I ask you not only not to punish the demonstrators but not even to have the wish. They are not wicked. It is through them that God works to open our eyes to the wickedness within us. Let, therefore, today's demonstration purify you, as I know it will purify me. True vidya (knowledge) is the art of self-purification. Now I want you to stay here until the storm ceases, lest your going out just now should infuriate them. Let us wait until their fury ceases, and then quietly go back to our homes. In the meanwhile let us all recite Ramdhun together, let someone give us a hymn, and we shall disperse only when we are told that everything is quiet outside."

Krishnanand Sokhta

Soon there was demand from the audience for Shri Krishnanand Sokhta who appeared on the rostrum and delivered in a heart-stirring way in impromptu verses the message of truth and ahimsa, and asked the audience to join him in reciting Ramanam. This went on for a good few minutes. It heightened the atmosphere of peace and self-purification that Gandhiji had created, and the meeting peacefully dispersed thereafter. The Silver Jubilee had been celebrated in a manner unexpected by the boys, but it has left them a lesson which some at least will treasure all their lives.

BENARES NOTES

I

A Pilgrimage

The visit to Benares is made doubly sacred by the memories of our ancient spiritual heritage that Benares must wake up in the mind of every Indian and by the darshan of Bharatbhushan Pandit Malaviyaji whose life has been a continuous dedication. It is that burning love for the country that is the indissoluble bond of union between Malaviyaji and Gandhiji.

Few people have been able to see their dreams fulfilled in a measure that Malaviyaji has done. For the fulfilment of his dream he laid under tribute each and every one who professed a love for India's ancient culture. The Hindu Rajas and Maharajas and rich men came under his spell. The vision of the University was vouchsafed to him as he sat one day in contemplation, after a bath in holy Ganges, and the story goes that he shared the vision with his father, who parted with a hard-earned sum of Rs. one hundred and one and along with it gave also the blessing that that amount may be multiplied to a crore and one. The blessing was fulfilled, and for five and twenty years Malaviyaji has seen rise before his eyes edifice after edifice, and thousands of youths of the land come and grow under his benign influence. The youths have in turn imparted to him their youth and energy, and old age in one like him has become an object of pride and veneration.

No wonder the Silver Jubilee Convocation, to which flocked thousands from far and near, became a unique festival of thanksgiving, and Dr. Radhakrishnan, on whom Panditji's mantle has fitly fallen, voiced the feelings of all when in a wonderful paean of praise he said that sages like him render holy places real tirthas — places of pilgrimage — तीर्थकुर्वन्ति तीर्थानि, and wished him life for a hundred autumns.

A Dream Unfulfilled

And yet to him the dream is far from fulfilment. A book of memoirs published recently by Pandit Ram Naresh Tripathi — तीस दिन — मालवीजीके साथ (Thirty Days with Malaviyaji) — gives us a glimpse of his days and dreams. Even now he says to his doctor: "I would still like to make a tour of India. There is much yet to be done. I want a magnificent hall of music where the boys may learn music, so that they may go about through life with devotional music inspiring them. I want to see here a Nalanda where ten thousand students may live and study together in order to revive our ancient glories." One day he goes out in fair moonlight and exclaims: "What a glorious sight! There is enough space here for our sages to come and build their ashrams and be a perpetual source of light and life to our youths. The object of the Vishwavidyalaya will be fulfilled only when we have a Vasishtha, an Atri, a Gautama, an Angiras, each with his ashram to impart his unique message." Again: "I want some of our pandits to do research regarding the works of Tulsidas and other saints. I want absolutely authentic editions of their works." Again: "I want to name some of our roads here after Harishchandra, Yudhishtira, Hanuman, Ashoka, Pratap." Also: "No, no, have as many scholarships here as possible for the poor. Who knows there may be many an unknown Shivaji, Pratap, Harishchandra, Dhruva among them?" One more: "I have deliberately arranged a weekly Gita class here, so that a regular reading of our unique book may be an inspiration to them." /

The Voice of the Sentinel

Gandhiji was there as a pilgrim no less than others. But he had the mission of a sentinel to fulfil. He was no good for a convocation address. It was not in his line. But lest our festivities should make us lose sight of the fact that those who are to be the heirs of the venerable sage have to work together to bring to a complete fulfilment his dream, he took upon himself the task of sounding a note of warning.

Twentyfive years ago he had performed a similar task. The then Maharaja of Darbhanga, who welcomed him as one "who though born in luxury and affluence had voluntarily chosen to identify himself with the poor", did not know he would prove true to the description. But Malaviyaji knew. He had taken him into his secrets. Gandhiji knew what a Herculean task it had been for Malaviyaji to secure a charter for the University, and also what was Malaviyaji's unfulfilled ambition. Malaviyaji had met Sir Harcourt Butler, who was then a Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, in charge of education, and told him that education in the University would be imparted through Hindi. But Sir Harcourt knew his business better. He said: "That will not do. You had in that case better go on your own and do without Government's help and support. So long as you conduct your affairs in English we are safe, we know where you are and what you mean; but when you use your own language we are completely at sea." Malaviyaji, who has often agreed with his adversary rather too quickly, had promised not to press the idea. But not so Gandhiji. Malaviyaji knew what Gandhiji would say on the occasion, in fact Gandhiji had warned him beforehand. But Malaviyaji would not take a refusal. He compelled him to speak in English, but also asked him to say whatever he wanted to say. And so he had let himself go. Even today that speech reads as though it was delivered yesterday. It was an impromptu speech as on the present occasion, and Gandhiji perhaps does not recall today the exact words he said. But they have the same authentic ring, and the whole was couched almost in the same language! "It is a matter of deep humiliation and shame for us that I am compelled this evening, under the shadow of this great college in this sacred city to address my countrymen in a language that is foreign to me." That is how he began, and hoped that "this University will see to it that youths who come to it will receive their instruction through the vernaculars. . . . If we were receiving our education today through our vernaculars, what should we be today? We should have today a free India, we should have our educated men not as if they were foreigners in their own land, but speaking to the heart of the nation; they would be working among the poorest of the poor, and whatever they would have gained during the past fifty years would be a heritage to the nation." He then deplored the thousands of years that were lost to our nation as a result of the terrible handicap under which our youths had to labour, and then took the liberty of "thinking audibly" before them. He turned his eyes about him, and as he did so he sighed at the sight of the gorgeous show of jewellery which "made a splendid feast for the eyes", but which compelled him to say to the bedecked ones: "There is no salvation for India unless you strip yourselves of this jewellery and hold it in trust for your countrymen in India."

I will not summarise the whole of that speech which the curious can read even today with profit. Some of the things that followed, which were really meant to deprecate the cult of the bomb, jarred on an un-understanding audience then, so much so that most of the big people left the meeting in a body. The times are changed. Harder things than he said that day have been said by him, and when on the evening of the 21st January he began to address the audience in Hindustani no one felt that anything unexpected was happening. But the University has still got to be the Vishwavidyalaya of Malaviyaji's and Gandhiji's dream. And it did one's soul good to see the eighty year old Malaviyaji deliver in distinct and chaste Hindi a speech that was heard by the vast concourse that had gathered there, corroborating every one of the sentiments uttered by Gandhiji. "The Sun that radiates light and warmth is there," as Gandhiji said, "we have but to receive and enjoy that light and warmth." His blessing is there given in a Sanskrit verse of his own composition:

देशभक्त्याऽऽत्मत्यागेन समानार्हः सदा भव ॥

(May thou be deserving of honour by means of truth, brahmacharya, healthy body, learning, love of thy land, and self-sacrifice.)

A DEPLORABLE INCIDENT

(By M. K. Gandhi)

As Sardar Vallabhbhai was leaving Sevagram the other day he told me of a dacoity in a home in Kheda District. Armed dacoits entered the house, belaboured the inmates, and escaped with the loot. The story was heart-rending. What should I do under similar circumstances, I thought to myself. What should Congressmen do in the circumstances was the next thought; and since then the train of thought arising from the dacoity has taken possession of me. The Congress has been working continuously since 1920 under the policy of non-violence. The province of Gujarat has also had the advantage of a leader of the Sardar's calibre. And yet daring dacoities can take place. How far then can Congress influence be said to have penetrated? People imagine that, if the British Government were to cease to function today, it would be the non-violent Congressmen who would automatically take over. But it is not so. I have been working to this end for the last twenty years, but my dream has not materialised. For the Congress has not had a living faith in the very means which it adopted in 1920. Therefore the non-violence of the Congress has really been non-violence of the weak. But Governments can only be run by the strong. And a non-violent Government can only be run by those who believe that non-violence is the mightiest force on earth. If we had had this strength, there would be no Hindu-Muslim riots, there would be no robbers or dacoits. Some might say that for such strength you need either a Jesus or a Buddha. But this is not so. Neither Jesus nor Buddha tried non-violence in the political sphere, or it would be truer to say that the present-day type of politics did not exist in their day. The Congress experiment is, therefore, a new one. The tragedy is that Congressmen have not tried it with full faith, full understanding and sincerity. If they had had these three essential qualities, the Congress would today have been far taller than it is. But I may not cry over spilt milk. I refer to the past only in order to guide us in the present. Even if we wake up now, the game is ours; if we do not, we shall surely lose. Power invariably elects to go into the hands of the strong. That strength may be physical or of the heart, or, if we do not fight shy of the word, of the spirit. Strength of the heart connotes soul force. If today we decide that we should try to get power by force of arms, we shall have to undo all the work of twenty years among the masses. We shall have to spend a considerable time in giving people a contrary training. We cannot afford to give the required time at this critical juncture. It is certain that today whoever has any strength of any kind will use it for seizing power. It is my firm conviction that, if Congressmen are to get power, it should only be through non-violence or soul force.

We have neither time nor material to do new work even in this line. When we have so far employed non-violence as a weapon of the weak, how can we all of a sudden expect to convert it into a weapon of the strong? But in spite of this I feel that at the present moment this experiment alone is feasible and proper for us. There is no risk involved in it. Even failure in it takes the form of success because, even if the people are not able to go the whole length in the experiment, they cannot possibly be led into a ditch. By following the way of physical force they may not only be proved cowards, but in attempting to follow an untrodden path thousands may also be destroyed.

It is then the duty of Congressmen to seek out dacoits and robbers. They should try to understand and convert them. Such workers cannot be had for the asking; but Congressmen should know that this work is just as important as it is fraught with risk, and a certain number of them have to devote themselves to it.

The second thing requisite is that we should prepare such workers as would, under difficult circumstances, stand up to dacoits and, whilst trying to check or convert them from their evil ways, be prepared to suffer hurt or even death. Perhaps few workers will be forthcoming for this task too, but peace brigades throughout the country are a definite necessity. Or else in times of chaos Congressmen will lose all the reputation they have so far gained.

Thirdly, the rich should ponder well as to what is their duty today. They who employ mercenaries to guard their wealth may find those very guardians turning on them. The monied classes have got to learn how to fight either with arms or with the weapon of non-violence. For those who wish to follow the latter way the best and most effective mantram is: तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः (Enjoy thy wealth by renouncing it). Expanded it means: "Earn your crores by all means. But understand that your wealth is not yours; it belongs to the people. Take what you require for your legitimate needs, and use the remainder for society." This truth has hitherto not been acted upon; but, if the monied classes do not even act on it in these times of stress, they will remain the slaves of their riches and passions and consequently of those who overpower them.

But I have visions that the end of this war will mean also the end of the rule of capital. I see coming the day of the rule of the poor, whether that rule be through force of arms or of non-violence. Let it be remembered that physical force is transitory even as the body is transitory. But the power of the spirit is permanent, even as the spirit is everlasting.

HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"(a) The proceedings of the Congress, the A. I. C. C. and the Working Committee shall ordinarily be conducted in Hindustani. The English Language or any Provincial Language may be used, if the speaker is unable to speak in Hindustani or whenever permitted by the President.

(b) The proceedings of the Provincial Congress Committee shall ordinarily be conducted in the language of the Province concerned. Hindustani may also be used."

— Article 25 of the Congress Constitution

The Congress has not carried out this resolution to any appreciable extent. It is a sad reflection. The fault is Congressmen's. They will not take the trouble of learning Hindustani. Their effort for learning languages is evidently exhausted with the performance of the impossible task of acquiring a knowledge of the English language equal to a learned Englishman's. The result is tragic. It has meant impoverishment of the provincial languages and displacement of the all-India language described by the Congress as Hindustani. It has also meant a break between the millions and the English-educated few who happen to be the natural leaders for the simple reason that they are the only educated class. There is no education worth the name apart from the schools established by the Government. The Congress has to perform the Herculean task of displacing the English language with Hindustani. With the passing of the resolution it should have created a bureau for fulfilling the purpose as it might do even now. But if it does not, individual Congressmen and those who are interested in evolving an all-India language should do so.

But what is Hindustani? There is no such language apart from Urdu and Hindi. Urdu has sometimes been called Hindustani. Did the Congress mean Urdu in the article quoted? Did it exclude the more extensively known Hindi? Such a meaning would be absurd. It evidently meant, and could only mean, a scientific blend of Hindi and Urdu. There is no such written blend extant. But it is the common speech of the unlettered millions of Hindus and Muslims living in Northern India. Not being written, it is imperfect, and the written language has taken two different turns tending to widen the difference by each running away from the other. Therefore the word Hindustani means Hindi and Urdu. Therefore also Hindi can call itself Hindustani, if it does not exclude Urdu but tries to assimilate Urdu as much as is scientifically possible without damaging the natural structure and music of the original. Urdu can do likewise. There is no separate Hindustani body attempting to blend the two streams which today threaten to run away from each other.

The noble task can be performed by the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan and Anjuman-e-taraqqi-e-Urdu. I have been connected with the former since 1917 when I was invited to preside at its session of that year. I acquainted the audience with my views on the all-India medium. When I presided again at its session in 1935, I was able to persuade the Sammelan to define Hindi as the language spoken by Hindus and Muslims of the North of India and written either in Devanagari or Persian script. The natural consequence should have been for the members of the Sammelan to expand their knowledge of Hindi by living up to the definition and producing literature that could be read by both Hindus and Muslims. This should have meant the members learning the Persian script. They seem to have denied themselves this proud privilege. But better late than never. Will they bestir themselves now? They need not wait for the Anjuman to respond. It will be a great thing, if the Anjuman does. Each Association can, if it will work in harmony with the other. But I have suggested unitary action independent of the other party. That Association which will adopt my plan will enrich the language it stands for, and will ultimately be responsible for producing a blend which will serve the whole nation.

It is unfortunate that the Hindi-Urdu question has assumed a communal shape. It is possible for either party to undo the mischief by recognising the other and incorporating the acceptable part in a generous spirit. A language that borrows unstintingly from the others without harming its special characteristic will be enriched, even as the English language has become enriched by free borrowings.

WORKING COMMITTEE'S RESOLUTIONS

1. Present Situation

[The Working Committee passed the following resolutions at its recent sittings at Bardoli.]

Fourteen months have elapsed since the Working Committee held their last meeting and during this period the world has fallen ever deeper into the abyss of war and rushed headlong towards self-destruction. The members of the Committee have met again on their release from prison and given earnest thought to all the national and international developments during this fateful period of human history. The burden of guiding the Congress and the nation at this critical stage when old problems assume a new significance and war approaches the frontiers of India bringing new problems in its train, is a heavy one which the Committee can only shoulder worthily with the full co-operation of the people of India. The Committee have endeavoured to keep in view the principles and objectives for which the Congress has stood during these past many years and considered them in the larger context of world conditions and world freedom. The Committee are convinced that full freedom for the people of India is essential even, and more especially, in the present state of world turmoil, not only for India's sake but for the sake of the world. The Committee also hold that real peace and freedom can only be established and endure on the basis of world co-operation between free nations.

The Committee gave full expression to their attitude towards the War in their statement issued on September 14, 1939, wherein they condemned Nazi and Fascist aggression and expressed their willingness to help the cause of freedom and democracy, provided the objectives of the war were clearly stated and acted upon, in so far as was possible, in the present. If freedom and democracy were those objectives, then they must necessarily include the ending of imperialism and the recognition of the independence of India. Subsequent pronouncements made on behalf of the British Government and their reactionary and oppressive policy made it clear that this Government was determined to maintain and intensify its imperialist hold and exploitation of the Indian people. British policy was one of deliberate insult to Indian nationalism, of a perpetuation of unrestrained authoritarianism, and the encouragement of disruptive and reactionary elements. Not only has every offer made by the Congress for an honourable compromise been rejected, but public opinion voiced by organisations regarded as moderate has also been flouted.

The Congress was, therefore, compelled, in order to defend the honour and the elementary rights of the Indian people and the integrity of the nationalist movement, to request Gandhiji to guide the Congress in the action that should be taken. Mahatma Gandhi desirous of avoiding embarrassment to his opponent as far as possible, especially during the perils and dangers of war, limited the satyagraha movement which he started to selected individuals who conformed to certain tests he had laid down. That satyagraha has now proceeded for over fourteen months and about twentyfive thousand Congressmen have suffered imprisonment, while many thousands of others who offered satyagraha in the Frontier Province and elsewhere were not arrested. The Committee desire to express their respectful appreciation of Gandhiji's leadership and of the response of the nation to it, and are of opinion that this has strengthened the people.

Throughout this period the attitude of the British Government has been hostile to Indian freedom and it has functioned in India as a completely authoritarian government, insulting the deeply cherished convictions and feelings of the people. Neither the professions of freedom and democracy, nor the perils and catastrophes that have come in the wake of war, have affected this attitude and policy, and such changes as have taken place have been for the worse.

The recent release of a number of political prisoners has no significance or importance, and the circumstances attending it, and official pronouncements made, make it clear that it is not connected with any change of policy. Large numbers of detenus, who are kept in prison under the Defence of India Act without trial, and whose only offence seems to be that they are ardent patriots impatient of foreign rule and determined to achieve the independence of the country, still remain in prison. Recent arrests of prominent persons and their treatment in prison also indicate that the old policy is being pursued as before.

While there has been no change in Britain's policy towards India, the Working Committee must nevertheless take into full consideration the new world situation that has arisen by the development of the war into a world conflict and its approach to India. The sympathies of the Congress must inevitably lie with the peoples who are the subject of aggression and who are fighting for their freedom. But only a free and independent India can be in a position to undertake the defence of the country on a national basis and be of help in the furtherance of the larger causes that are emerging from the storm of war. The whole background in India is one of hostility and of distrust of the British Government and not even the most far-reaching promises can alter this background, nor can a subject India offer voluntary or willing help to an arrogant imperialism which is indistinguishable from fascist authoritarianism.

The Committee is, therefore, of opinion that the resolution of the A. I. C. C. passed in Bombay on September 16, 1940, holds today and defines Congress policy still.

2. Gandhiji Absolved

The Working Committee have received the following letter from Gandhiji and recognise the validity of the point he has raised and therefore relieve him of the responsibility laid upon him by the Bombay resolution referred to by Gandhiji. But the Committee assure him that the policy of non-violence adopted under his guidance for the attainment of Swaraj and which has proved so successful in leading to mass awakening and otherwise will be adhered to by the Congress. The Working Committee further assure him that it would like to extend its scope as far as possible even in free India. The Committee hope that Congressmen will render him full assistance in the prosecution of his mission, including the offering of civil disobedience.

Dear Maulana Sahab,

In the course of discussion in the Working Committee, I discovered that I had committed a grave error in the interpretation of the Bombay resolution. I had interpreted it to mean that the Congress was to refuse participation in the present or all war on the ground principally of non-violence. I found to my astonishment that most members differed from my interpretation and held that the opposition need not be on the ground of non-violence. On re-reading the Bombay resolution I found that the differing members were right and that I had read into it a meaning which its letter could not bear. The discovery of the error makes it impossible for me to lead the Congress in the struggle for resistance to war effort on grounds in which non-violence was not indispensable. I could not, for instance, identify myself with opposition to war effort on the ground of ill-will against Great Britain. The resolution contemplated material association with Britain in the war effort as a price for guaranteed independence of India. If such was my view and I believed in the use of violence for gaining independence and yet refused participation in the effort as the price of that independence, I would consider myself guilty of unpatriotic conduct. It is my certain belief that only non-violence can save India and the world from self-extinction. Such being the case, I must continue my mission whether I am alone or assisted by an organisation or individuals. You will, therefore, please relieve me of the responsibility laid upon me by the Bombay resolution. I must continue civil disobedience for free speech against all war with such Congressmen and others whom I select and who believe in the non-violence I have contemplated and are willing to conform to prescribed conditions.

I will not, at this critical period, select for civil disobedience those whose services are required to steady and help the people in their respective localities.

Yours sincerely
M. K. Gandhi

THE MONTH IN BARDOLI

With Harijan Sevak

It was impossible for Gandhiji to respond to the calls of various workers in Gujarat to visit their centres. The call from Ahmedabad was almost irresistible. But the Sardar had to take the odium of being ruthlessly impartial, and so every one of them came to Bardoli. Among these were Harijan sevak who had met in Sabarmati under the Presidentship of Thakkar Bapa. They came with questions ready framed and thus made Gandhiji's work easy.

The first was the question about the wells: "Should we seek the co-operation of Harijans, and, if so, to what extent?" "Co-operation," said Gandhiji, "is necessary, but we must not take the Harijans in a body and invade the Savarna quarters. We should visit the wells, ascertain the classes of people using them, and reason with these to let the Harijans use them. Regarding local board wells the help of officials may be freely sought, and such Harijans may be asked to go and use the wells as may be prepared to stand ill-treatment. But the brunt should be borne by the sevak, care being taken to stand between the Harijans and those who would threaten to molest or belabour them. The Harijans should be invariably asked to use clean vessels and observe all the ordinary rules of cleanliness. We can also dig wells for Harijans and invite the Savarnas to use them. It is likely that the Harijans may be boycotted, but we should see that they get employment elsewhere. The Harijans have to be taught to learn to assert themselves firmly and non-violently, and the Savarnas may be gently reminded that injustice cannot last for ever. These are broad principles, but everyone has to take measures suited to the circumstances in each case."

Q. "Can't we insist on the admission of Harijan boys to hostels where all non-Harijan Hindu boys are admitted?"

A. "Of course, but care should be taken to see that the hostel is not exclusively for a particular community or section of Hindus. Where all sections are admitted and only the Harijans are excluded, the workers should strain every nerve to get the Harijans admitted."

"When I said that removal of untouchability did not include the removal of restrictions on interdining and intermarriage, I had the general Hindu public in mind, not the Congress workers or Congressmen. These have to abolish untouchability from every part of their life."

The next question was about the temptations given by Missionaries in the shape of books, school fees, etc., with a view to the boys' ultimate conversion. How was one to deal with them? "The missionaries have of course the right to preach the gospel of Christ and to invite non-Christians to embrace Christianity. But every attempt to press material benefits or attractions in the aid of conversion should be freely exposed, and the Harijans should be educated to resist these temptations."

Q. "What are the qualifications that a Harijan sevak should have in order to make his work felt?"

A. "Such a question is rather late in the day. But I shall try to answer it again. It is a misfortune that politics have been mixed up with anti-untouchability work, which is essentially one of self-purification, justice, humanity. Long before I took to politics I felt that abolition of untouchability and Hindu-Muslim unity were essential for national well-being. In order to prevent the vivisection of Hinduism I had to fight it with my life, and the question did receive a political complexion, but in essence it is a purely religious and moral question. Every sevak must be fired with a passion to purify Hinduism, and must be ready to lay down his life in the attempt. Such a sevak will be ready to sacrifice his all—family connections, social advantages, and life itself—in order to wipe out the blot on Hinduism. The work should be as one of life's essential functions, e.g. offering one's prayers, ablutions, etc. not carrying emolument or reward. If the worker is fired with this passion, the way will be clear before him. Thus a worker would rather starve than allow the Harijans to be starved, would hesitate to use amenities which are denied to the Harijans and feel increasing identification with them every day. All this work is to be done without regard to the political results. Assuming for a moment that Swaraj does not come as a result of the abolition of untouchability, the work has to be done in order to keep Hinduism pure and alive. I know that with some of the Congressmen the work has only a political meaning, but it is wrong. If they seek justice from an alien Government, they must first do justice to their own kith and kin. That is the fundamental maxim of equity—he who seeks equity must do equity."

"There is, I know, a section who says that political freedom must be won first and social reform would follow later. It is a wrong idea, and certainly inconsistent with one who would win Swaraj by non-violent means. But the Harijan worker has to educate both the orthodox and exclusively political-minded people. Let him not judge others, but by selfless self-effacing service set an example to them."

With Khadi Workers

Sardar Vallabhbhai has created a khadi organisation in Gujarat in order to intensify khadi production, and he has enlisted for this work a number of khadi workers, and he collects the necessary funds also. These workers too came for guidance and advice.

"We are producing 2 lakhs of rupees worth of khadi, but the demand exceeds 12 lakhs," they said. "How are we to meet it? We have not enough weavers and workers, and there is the question of funds too."

"Let me take up the last question first," said Gandhiji. "It is my firm conviction which has grown upon me with the years that, if there are workers, no work suffers for want of funds. But the real question is of the capacity to produce. Supposing someone gave you one crore of rupees, I know you cannot produce ten crore rupees worth of khadi. The reason is lack of workers, lack of efficiency, and lack of faith. It is good that there is a growing demand for khadi—though 12 lakhs of rupees worth of khadi is nothing extraordinary where 8 crores of rupees worth of khadi could be used. But the increased sales mean that the liking for khadi is also on the increase. We should contact these consumers and persuade them to spin. And here comes in the Dhanush Takli. You may know that I can spin on the ordinary wheel better, but I have made a point of using only the Dhanush Takli, and I am now almost an expert in it. The reason is that, whereas Laxmidasbhai cannot execute an order for 25 lakhs of wheels, the people can themselves make as many Dhanush Taklis. It is so easy to make, so cheap, takes very little material and practically no technical skill. It is a wrong policy to manufacture wheels in Sabarmati in order to export them to the Punjab or South India. They should be made locally everywhere, and for that purpose the Dhanush Takli is the thing. Universalisation of this will increase production by leaps and bounds.

"You have to catch the increasing love of spinning by the forelock. In none of our previous campaigns was spinning done on such a large scale as during the last campaign. The figures for Sabarmati Jail were good, but the figures for Agra and Bareilly were also good. Badshah Khan has been able to popularise spinning as he had never been before. We have, therefore, to take this tide at the flood and bring expert knowledge to bear on the love for spinning that is growing.

"We have to go from house to house and enlist willing spinners ready to contribute their yarn.

"I take it that all khadi workers are believers in the attainment of Swaraj by non-violent means. Yours then should be the largest contribution to constructive work.

"Some of you have to be weavers too. There are enough hand-loom weavers in India to produce all the cloth we need. We have to persuade them to take to weaving hand-spun yarn and also to get their womenfolk and children to produce yarn in their homes."

A Record Spinner

Gandhiji has referred to the record spinning in jails by the satyagrahis. Even now he gets letters from satyagrahis still in jail to say that even in the Punjab some satyagrahis, who came in with an initial aversion to spinning, ended by becoming regular spinners. But all records were broken by Shri Ashabhai of Ras who never missed a day's spinning during the 9 months and 11 days of his imprisonment. He is an agriculturist. He might have kept all his yarn for home consumption, but he brought it to Bardoli and laid it at Gandhiji's feet to be used as he liked. Here are figures of his spinning:

9 months 11 days.

1,237 hanks of 840 yards each, i. e. 10,39,080 yards, i. e. over 3,700 yards per day. Weight 59 lbs.
668 hanks of 24 counts	Rs. 36-4-0 spinning wage
263 " 20 "	Rs. 14-7-0 "
306 " 18 "	Rs. 16-0-6 "
	Rs. 66-11-6

This will yield 280 square yards of khadi worth Rs. 175. Shri Ashabhai kept excellent health, attended to his daily needs of washing etc., and did some amount of reading also.

TO GUJARATIS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

You have sacrificed a great deal in the cause of Swaraj. But it is not enough. You can contribute still more in the form of money, labour, and increasingly intelligent and fresh minds.

Is it not sad that Rs. 2 lakhs worth of khadi only is being produced in Gujarat whereas Rs. 12 lakhs worth is wanted? It may be that there is not so much poverty in Gujarat as in the other provinces. But that does not mean that Gujaratis cannot, if they wish, produce all the khadi they need. Reckoning the population of Gujarat at 1 crore, the people would need at least 3 crores worth of cloth. You should produce at least this quantity, i. e. 15 crore yards.

The time is fast approaching when we shall not be able to get mill cloth. There is scarcity even today, and what if the mills are bombed, what if they are used as munition factories? Either each one of us, young and old, rich and poor, men and women, has to spin and provide for his own clothing or else go naked. There is not the least exaggeration in this. In the warring countries people are rationed for food and clothing, and as the war is prolonged even the necessities of life are being used up and munitions are produced only to end in smoke. The war is thus working double destruction.

We have been wilfully dragged into the vortex. But we are not yet so hard put to it as the people in the warring countries. If, however, we sit with folded hands until the trouble comes upon us, we shall be found to have been fools. We must be wise and adopt the necessary measures in time.

It is my request then to those Gujaratis whose ear I can reach that they should give as much money and as much yarn as they can to the Mahagujarat Khadi Mandal. Receiving centres should be opened where necessary so as to save people the cost of posting yarn. The master-key to producing the requisite khadi lies in the wheel plying in every home. If good yarn is spun, weavers will be available, though I have already advised that we should take time by the forelock and train voluntary weavers also.

Will every Congressman rise to the occasion and spin for the nation?

KASHI VISHWAVIDYALAYA ADDRESS

[The following is a fairly full translation of Gandhiji's Hindustani address on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee Convocation of the Benares Hindu University on the 21st January. M. D.]

Pilgrimage

Revered Malaviyaji, Sir Radhakrishnan, brothers and sisters,

You all know very well that I have neither the physical strength nor the inclination to undertake long journey, and yet when I received Sir Radhakrishnan's invitation to deliver an address on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee Convocation of the Benares Hindu University I had not the heart to decline it. You know the strong bond of affection that binds me to Panditji, and it is with a certain amount of pride and satisfaction that I obey his behest whenever it is at all possible for me. I therefore could not say 'no'. Sir Radhakrishnan's letter was a call to a pilgrimage.

Great as are Malaviyaji's services to the country, I have no doubt that this University constitutes his greatest service and achievement, and he has worn himself out for the work that is dear to him as life itself. It was out of my great regard for him that twentyfive years ago I accepted his invitation to attend the foundation ceremony of this University. I knew that in that august function, which was to be attended by the Viceroy and the ruling Princes of India, there was no place for a poor man like me. I had not then been made a 'Mahatma', and if anyone called me by that name, I knew I must have been mistaken for Mahatma Munshiramji, as the late Swami Shraddhanandji was then called. For there cannot be a number of Mahatmas, and I knew even when I was in South Africa that Munshiramji's great work had entitled him to that name. But Malaviyaji has a knack for detecting servants of the people, however obscure they may be.

The Sun Radiating Heat and Light

Everyone knows that there is no greater beggar than Pandit Malaviyaji on the face of the earth. He has never begged for himself, by the grace of God he has never been in want, but he became a voluntary beggar for causes he has made his own, and God has always filled his bowl in an overflowing measure. But he has an insatiable appetite, and although he got the crore he wanted he is still asking for more. Even at this moment he whispered into my ears that he had a good donation from the Maharaja of Darbhanga, our Chairman.

It is a rare good fortune to have him still in our midst, a living example of a pure life of plain living and high thinking; but I have a fear that, though he is physically in your midst, many of you are untouched by his great example. The fault is wholly yours, not his. The Sun radiates heat and light to all on earth, but how can even the Sun help those who will shut themselves from him? But I am not here to sing Malaviyaji's praises. This platform has rung with them. He has deserved them all. I must now address a few words to you—the teachers and the students of the Vidyapith. When I accepted Sir Radhakrishnan's invitation he had asked me to send a copy of my address to him. I told him that I had no time to write anything, I did not even know what I should be able to say. A feeling of nervousness overpowers me when I am in the midst of learned men. Ever since my return to India my lot has been cast among the poor and the downtrodden—those whom the Congress represents—and whilst in their midst I feel no sense of constraint or hesitation. In your midst I feel tongue-tied. I simply said to Sir Radhakrishnan that I should trust to the inspiration of the moment. That inspiration has come, but I do not know how you will welcome my plain speaking.

A Painful Anomaly

As speaker after speaker spoke and left the dais, I longed for someone who would address the audience in Hindi or Urdu, or Hindustani, aye even in Sanskrit, —even in Marathi, or for that matter any of the Indian languages. But no such good luck befell me and you. Why? We are slaves and have hugged the language of those who have kept us enslaved. It has become a fashion to blame the Englishmen for all our ills. I have not hesitated to blame them for many things they have done. I have never charged them with compelling us to adopt English as the medium of expression. We devote precious years of our lives to learning the English language, our ambition being to be able to speak English as Englishmen, and our breast swells with pride when an Englishman pats us on our back for speaking flawless English. Think of the time and energy of our youth expended on learning the English language, as if it was our mother-tongue, and calculate by simple multiplication the number of years and the volume of precious energy that are lost to the nation.

And yet all this is happening in the Kashi Hindu Vishwavidyalaya which has been extolled today as the living embodiment of Indian culture. Malaviyaji did all that was necessary to draw the best possible teachers by attractive salaries, but he could not do the rest. It was not his fault; Hindi did not take the place of English. The teachers are the product of the tradition which they have inherited, and the students are content to accept what they get from them. They need not be. They go on strikes and even hunger-strikes often for trivial reasons. Why will they not insist on having their tuition in the all-India language? There are, we were told today, 250 students here from the Andhra Province. Let them go to Sir Radhakrishnan and ask for an Andhra section of the University and ask to be taught through the medium of Telugu if they will not learn the all-India language.

Japan's Example

You know what has happened in Japan—a country which I do not regard as essentially great—but which is regarded as great in Asia in that it has successfully challenged the supremacy of the Western nations. The thousands of boys and girls in the Japanese schools and colleges receive their education not through the medium of English but through Japanese. Their script is difficult, but it is no bar to their learning it and they have not given it up in preference to the Roman. Not that they boycott English and other European languages. But they economise their energy. Those who need to learn them do so for enriching the Japanese thought and knowledge which the West alone can give. They take care to turn into Japanese all that is worth taking from the West. That is because the mind of Japan's youth is fresh and alert. The knowledge gained thus has become national property. Our ambition does not go beyond becoming clerks in Government offices, lawyers, barristers, judges, all helplessly serving the system they would fain destroy. And we have not succeeded either in mastering the English language. I get numerous letters from English-educated people—some of them possessing the highest degrees of our universities—but they betray a woeful ignorance of the English language. The reason is simple. Malaviyaji and Radhakrishnans are rare, and the thousands cannot achieve what they have done.

No Discipline

As I was listening to the English speeches I was amazed at the patience and innate courtesy of our people who, though they do not understand a word of what is said, do not mob us, as they well might do. If there is any doubt in your minds about this, I can demonstrate to you by a show of hands how few—even from among the students—have followed the proceedings here.

There is another thing to which I am tempted to draw your attention. I witnessed this morning a scene that I had least expected here. There was the Vasant Panchami day procession of the students who had to march past Malaviyaji's house after receiving his silent blessings. The way in which they were walking betrayed a lack of even elementary physical training. Instead of walking in step, erect and disciplined like soldiers on the march, they walked haphazardly in a desultory fashion.

Give Hindi the Pride of Place

I cannot help saying a word about the sight that greets you as you enter the great portals of the University. Thanks to the money that Malaviyaji can get for the asking, the gate is in consonance with the splendour of the edifices here. But what did I find on the top of the gate?—the bulk of the space (three-fourths) taken up by the words BENARES HINDU UNIVERSITY in English, and the fourth given to the inscription in Hindi which is the language through which you would derive your knowledge. I wondered what need there was of the English language? Just a little thought on the part of those who were in charge of such things would have been enough to tell them that what was needed there was the name written in Devanagari and Persian scripts—which would have symbolised to the people the desire on the part of Malaviyaji's University and Sir Radhakrishnan for communal harmony. It would have been in the fitness of things too, as both Hindi and Urdu are understood in these parts and both the scripts are familiar. The fact is the years we have wasted on English have ossified our minds and stunted our memory and imagination.

Surely it is no difficult thing for a non-Hindi-speaking person to learn Hindi or Hindustani. I can undertake to teach Hindi to anyone knowing Gujarati, Bengali or Marathi in the space of three months. Even the South Indian languages—Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, Kanarese—are full of Sanskrit words, and, if there was just a little fervour and love of the country in us, we should not hesitate to decide to write all the Sanskrit-derived languages as also the Southern group in the Devanagari script. These languages have not only a fairly common vocabulary, there is also a striking resemblance in the scripts. If our minds were not fagged, we would easily know half a dozen Indian languages. Then there is Urdu which should not be difficult to learn, if only our Urdu scholars did not make it a matter of pride to pack it with Persian and Arabic words, as the Pandits pack Hindi with Sanskrit words.

A Distinctive Feature Suggested

One more thought I should like to leave with you. Every university is supposed to have its tradition, its distinctive feature—Oxford and Cambridge, for instance, have theirs. But I am afraid our universities are the blotting-sheets of the West. We have borrowed the superficial features of the Western universities, and flattered ourselves that we have founded living universities here. Do they reflect or respond to the needs of the masses? Now I am told that a special feature of your University is that Engineering and Technology are taught here as nowhere else. I should not consider this a distinguishing feature. Let me suggest one to you. Have you been able to attract to your University youths from Aligarh? Have you been able to identify yourselves with them? That, I think, should be your special work, the special contribution of your University. Money has come in, and more will come in if God keeps Malaviyaji in our midst for a few more years. But no amount of money will achieve the miracle I want—I mean a heart-unity between Hindus and Muslims. I would like you to go out to invite Mussalmans to come here, and not to mind if they reject your advances. You are the representatives of a great civilisation which according to Lokamanya Tilak is 10,000 years old and according to later scholars even older. The special contribution of that civilisation is to befriend the world, to turn so-called foes into friends. Our civilisation has absorbed, like the holy Ganges, many streams from outside, and it is my prayer that the Hindu University which is endeavouring to represent Hindu culture and Hindu civilisation may invite and absorb all that is best in other cultures and be a model to all of communal unity and harmony. That should be its distinctive feature. English will not help you to evolve this. It is our own ancient learning that will teach you this—our scriptures learnt and understood in the proper spirit.

One thing more and I have done. You are living in palatial hostels, but look at the little house in which Panditji lives in utter simplicity and without the least splendour. You enter his room. There is no decoration and barest furniture. You, who will be his heirs, should model your lives accordingly. Many of you are children of poor parents. Don't forget that you have to represent the poor, and that therefore a life of ease and luxury is inconsistent with the poverty of our land. May you be all models of plain and simple living and high thinking like Malaviyaji. May God bless you with long life and the wisdom to carry out what I have said, if it has appealed to you.

PLAIN LIVING AND HIGH THINKING

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"An ideal society is that in which every individual will be able to live a life of progressively increasing wants with a minimum output of labour." Thus writes a friend from Ahmedabad. The proposition is pleasing and is backed by plausible argument which many may accept. The writer forecast that the Viceroy was bound to refuse the Congress proposal. He does not believe in the freedom of the individual, and is therefore of opinion that it was only meet that the Viceroy should turn down the proposal. Because his forecast turned out correct he may even hold his argument to be sound and say, "I told you so." It is therefore necessary for me to take note of the letter.

The writer may not derive any satisfaction from the Viceroy's refusal. All my colleagues had foretold the result. But I wanted to go not so much in the expectation of getting acceptance as, in the event of failure, to return with added strength. Nor does the rejection of the proposal mean in any sense that the Viceroy does not believe in individual freedom. Britain has not gone that length. Europe has no doubt entered upon a new phase in denying individual liberty. If this goes, then surely all is lost, for, if the individual ceases to count, what is left of society? Individual freedom alone can make a man voluntarily surrender himself completely to the service of society. If it is wrested from him, he becomes an automaton and society is ruined. No society can possibly be built on a denial of individual freedom. It is contrary to the very nature of man. Just as a man will not grow horns or a tail, so he will not exist as man if he has no mind of his own. In reality even those who do not believe in the liberty of the individual believe in their own. Modern editions of Chenghiz Khan retain their own.

Just as the writer's ideas on individual liberty are impossible, so also is his other theory. That everyone in this world should be able to maintain as high a standard of life as possible with the least possible output of labour is just as fantastic as to expect a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. The writer's high living would appear to mean luxurious living which is an impossible proposition for any society as a whole. And when there is no limit to luxury where shall we stop? All the scriptures of the world have taught the exact opposite. Plain living and high thinking is the ideal that has been placed before us. The vast majority recognise its truth but are unable to get there because of human frailty. It is, however, perfectly possible to envisage such an existence. That the crores in India should be guaranteed a certain income is only right, and to achieve this ideal large scale machinery is not only not necessary but wholly destructive.

Man falls from the pursuit of the ideal of plain living and high thinking the moment he wants to multiply his daily wants. History gives ample proof of this. Man's happiness really lies in contentment. He who is discontented, however much he possesses, becomes a slave to his desires. And there is really no slavery equal to that of his desires. All the sages have declared from the house-tops that man can be his own worst enemy as well as his best friend. To be free or to be a slave lies in his own hands. And what is true for the individual is true for society.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Unitary Method

Q. You seem to be advocating what you call the unitary method in the solution of many questions. Will you explain it a little more fully than you have done?

A. It is as simple as it is sure. A contract or pact is between two parties. There is also consideration passing from one to the other. Such was the Lucknow Pact between the Congress and the Muslim League. The same thing could have been accomplished by the unitary method. Only then there would have been no compromise dictated by fear and distrust. The Congress could have done, according to its notion, absolute justice, i. e. yielded the maximum consistent with the welfare of the whole nation without the expectation of any consideration from the League. In a well-regulated family the relations are governed by the unitary method. Thus a father gives to his children not as a result of a pact. He gives out of love, a sense of justice without expecting any return therefor. Not that there is none. But everything is natural, nothing is forced. Nothing is done out of fear or distrust. What is true of a well-regulated family is equally true of a well-regulated society which is but an extended family. My advice about the adoption of two scripts by Hindus and Muslims is based on the unitary method. My equal love for all communities dictates its adoption. Properly applied the method never fails. It disarms criticism and opposition. It presupposes a clean conscience and clean action. I propose to unfold in these columns the application of the method in all our communal relations. The views will be personal to me, as are all such since the Bardoli resolution. They will be addressed to Congressmen for adoption only in so far as they appeal to their reason.

Rajaji

Q. What has come over Rajaji? You and he seem to be drifting away from each other.

A. Yes, we seem to be and yet we are not. The seeming drift is but a prelude to a closer bond and clearer understanding. His loyalty is above suspicion. He would have gladly suppressed himself, if I had not strongly encouraged him to propound his views with a view to their adoption by the public. We own allegiance to the same goddess. Our interpretations differ. If he is erring, he will retrace his steps as soon as he discovers it. And he knows that I would do likewise, if I discover mine. I feel, therefore, absolutely safe with him, and I ask all questioners to do likewise.

Untruth

Q. Do you know that you are reported to have said at Benares that it is sinful for any Indian ever to study or speak in English and you are charged with insincerity in that you make such liberal use of the hated language when it suits you?

A. The report is wholly untrue. But once an untruth gets a start it is most difficult to overtake. Many untruths about me have had such a start. They created a temporary sensation and got a decent burial without any effort on my part. So will this one. No untruth has ever done any harm to anyone if there was no bottom to it. I am answering the question, not to protect my reputation but to carry my point further. The charge of insincerity is itself the best refutation of the untruth. For my free use of the English language is not a thing of today. The charge should have been regarded as unworthy of belief. Let it be known that I am a lover of the English language and the English. But my love is wise and intelligent. Therefore I give both the place they deserve. Thus I do not allow the English language to displace the mother-tongue or the natural all-India language—Hindustani. Nor do I let my love of the English displace my fellow-countrymen whose interest I can in no way allow to be injured. I recognise the great importance of the English language for international intercourse. I hold its knowledge as a second language to be indispensable for specified Indians who have to represent the country's interest in the international domain. I regard the English language as an open window for peeping into Western thought and sciences. For this too I should set apart a class. Through them I would spread through the Indian languages the knowledge they have gained from the West. But I would not burden India's children and sap their youthful energy by expecting the expansion of their brains through the medium of a foreign language. I do hold it to be a sin on the part of those who are responsible for producing the unnatural condition under which we are being educated. Such a thing is unknown in any other part of the world. Being too near the scene of the wreck we are unaware of the damage the nation has suffered by it. I can see the enormity of the damage because of my daily and close contact with the dumb and suppressed millions.

Another Untruth

Q. You are reported by the Press to have approvingly referred to the progress made by the Japanese in adopting Western methods with a thoroughness hitherto unknown in the East. Is not this a contradiction of all you have written about the West? Or is there one law for India and another for Japan?

A. This is another untruth like the one about the English Language. The reader will find out for himself from Mahadev Desai's report of my Benares speech as to what I actually said about the Japanese. The burden of my speech was the undesirability of making English the medium of instruction and all-India speech. I said in this connection that, however harmful in my opinion the Japanese adaptation of the West was, the rapid progress was due to the restriction of the learning of the Western mode to a select few and using them for transmission of the new knowledge among the Japanese through their own mother-tongue. Surely it is easy enough to understand that the Japanese could never have adapted themselves to the new mode, if they had had to do so through a foreign medium.

Sevagram, 27-1-42

'Other Organisations'

Q. What do you mean by associating with other volunteer organisations working for similar ends? Do you include communal organisations?

A. I do. Unfortunately we have very few other non-communal organisations. 'Similar ends' naturally means constructive ends, using 'constructive' in the widest sense of the term. Thus you will tender your help to a Muslim League, or Hindu Sabha, volunteer in putting out fire or tending the wounded. You will also invite their help in such matters.

'Constructive Programme'

While I was writing the pamphlet on the thirteenfold, now fourteenfold, constructive programme, Rajendra Babu was doing likewise in his own way. His pamphlet has now been published by the Navajivan Press, Ahmedabad, at 4 annas (postage 1 anna extra). It may be called a companion to mine. The reader will find much of interest and instruction in Rajendra Babu's treatise. It gives details which I have omitted. No worker should be without either.

AN UNEXPECTED EXPERIENCE

Chokhamela

When Gandhiji consented to address the boys in the Chokhamela Boarding House at Nagpur on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee of the House he had no idea of the trouble he was inviting on himself. Chokhamela was one of the Harijan saints in Maharashtra whose name is still revered, who kept the torch of true religion and right living and devotion to God burning when there was darkness in the land, and who has been honourably mentioned by the late Mahadev Govind Ranade in his Rise of the Maratha Power. He was a Mahar, but as he revealed the light of self-realisation in his life he was canonised by the people and is revered by Brahmins and non-Brahmins alike. To associate an institution of Harijan boys with his name is in the fitness of things. When the boys of the Boarding House came to invite Gandhiji to address them he had not the slightest notion that, although the boys had unanimously invited him, one of the members of the Committee was opposed to the proposal. Much against his will he agreed to give a few minutes on his way back from Benares by breaking journey at Nagpur.

What Awaited Him?

But what awaited him? When he was told that a few Mahar youths were going to stage a black flag demonstration he simply smiled and said, 'I do not mind it.' As our car approached the quarter, a number of youths rushed towards the car shouting, 'Gandhi go back, Gandhi boycott.' Among them was no boy from the hostel, but only rowdies from the neighbourhood. In the compound was a large meeting of the hostel boys, and thousands of men and women from the city who had come for the celebration. Pandit Ravishanker Shukla, who was presiding over the function, was distributing the prizes as we went in. Within a minute or two he finished the function and Gandhiji began to address the gathering. There was noise. In a moment a youth sprang to his feet and said: "This is not the ordinary noise. We are protesting against your coming." Gandhiji invited him to come to the rostrum and say what he wanted to say. He had nothing more to say than this: "We do not want you here. Those who invited you here had no right to do so." "But why don't you want me here?" asked Gandhiji of him. "Because you have done nothing for the Harijans." "That's all? Have you anything more to say?" "Nothing more," he said, and after a while disappeared. No sooner than Gandhiji had uttered a few sentences a shower of stones came upon the audience from the rowdies, some of whom had now got upon the walls of the compound. They were, it seems, bent on breaking the meeting. They continued to pelt stones from outside in great fury. Two little children and a young man were hurt and two of them began to bleed profusely. Pandit Ravishanker Shukla and Gandhiji asked the audience to be quiet and to keep sitting no matter what happened. Two boys from the hostel were badly injured and they had to be removed to the hospital. The audience showed exemplary behaviour and listened to Gandhiji, whose address, which would otherwise have been finished in five minutes with a few words of blessings and advice to the boys, took a different turn. It was for him a rich experience and an occasion for further self-introspection and a fresh test of ahimsa, and direction to those who would wipe out the blot on Hinduism with non-violent means.

A Call to Self-purification

This is what he said in Hindustani:

"I am told by the friend who raised the voice of protest that those who invited me here had no right to do so. The fact is that it was the students of the Chokhamela Boarding House who came to Wardha to invite me. I had begged to be excused, but Shri Chaturbhuj Jasani intervened and told me that, if the work that carried me to Benares was after my heart, this might be even dearer inasmuch as it was the Silver Jubilee of an institution that had served Harijan boys. And since the abolition of untouchability is my life's work and I even toured the country for the same cause for one whole year, I agreed.

"But assuming that those who invited me had no right to do so, it was surely not my fault. These protests do not displease me. The Harijans have suffered all these centuries at the hands of the Savarna Hindus as from no one else, and as I am one of the latter I am participant in their sin. And I am never accustomed to weigh my sins in golden scales. I can atone for them only if I made a mountain of a molehill. The reason is simple. Man can never see his faults in proper perspective, and, if he really did so, he would scarcely survive them. The remedy is, therefore, to magnify one's shortcomings. And the sin of untouchability is so heinous that it is impossible to exaggerate it. Those who suffer from it are naturally liable to be angry with those who are trying to wipe it out. They may well say to me: 'Who are you to remove untouchability? We shall wipe it out with our own strength.' Now the way of demonstrating one's strength is of two kinds: one is the eternal, God-given way of self-purification, where man takes the blame upon himself of all the wrongs he is suffering from; the other is the way of retaliation, the Mosaic law of tooth for a tooth and nail for a nail.

The latter is quite natural in that we have descended from the state of brutes, and some of their qualities may have been exaggerated in us. It is Hitler's way. Because a Jew or many Jews may have wronged the Germans he thinks it is his duty to exterminate the whole Jewish race. To those Harijans who would destroy Caste Hindus and Hinduism I would say that the Hindus deserve it. But the Caste Hindus too owe a duty to themselves and their religion. Let them receive lathis and stones from Harijans, but they should continue to serve them.

"What, however, is to be done, if they will not receive our service? (Shower of stones at this stage, and a slight interruption due to the stones having injured a few from the audience.)

"Let the stones rain on us, we have to keep quiet and to hold this meeting. I had promised to stay here for ten minutes, but I am in no hurry to go now. Send word to the demonstrators that, if they will have a separate meeting, I am prepared to stay and address that meeting and answer the charges they may have to make against me. And what after all is my crime? That I am labouring for them? That I am endeavouring to put a little money into their pockets? That I am telling the Sanatanists day in and day out that they have to purge themselves of their sin? And why rain stones on the innocent audience?

"They wanted to hurt me, but what have they succeeded in doing? They have hurt a few innocent people including two children in the audience. If they wanted to punish me or those who invited me, they should have gone directly for us. Let me tell them that this hooliganism is the opposite of bravery, humanity, civility. Let me tell them they are going about the wrong way. They are injuring their own cause.

"Now a word to those assembled here. Though this is a boarding house, those who receive their board and lodging here are all students. I hope your stay here will be fruitful and give you what is real education. Let today's demonstration be a lesson to you. It should make you neither angry nor afraid, for anger and fear are twin sins. Let the demonstration awake you to your sense of duty and burn the eternal truth indelibly on your minds that only Truth quenches untruth, Love quenches anger, self-suffering quenches violence. This eternal rule is a rule not for saints only but for all. Those who observe it may be few but they are the salt of the earth, it is they who keep the society together, not those who sin against light and truth.

"I ask you not only not to punish the demonstrators but not even to have the wish. They are not wicked. It is through them that God works to open our eyes to the wickedness within us. Let, therefore, today's demonstration purify you, as I know it will purify me. True vidya (knowledge) is the art of self-purification. Now I want you to stay here until the storm ceases, lest your going out just now should infuriate them. Let us wait until their fury ceases, and then quietly go back to our homes. In the meanwhile let us all recite Ramdhun together, let someone give us a hymn, and we shall disperse only when we are told that everything is quiet outside."

Krishnanand Sokhta

Soon there was demand from the audience for Shri Krishnanand Sokhta who appeared on the rostrum and delivered in a heart-stirring way in impromptu verses the message of truth and ahimsa, and asked the audience to join him in reciting Ramanam. This went on for a good few minutes. It heightened the atmosphere of peace and self-purification that Gandhiji had created, and the meeting peacefully dispersed thereafter. The Silver Jubilee had been celebrated in a manner unexpected by the boys, but it has left them a lesson which some at least will treasure all their lives.

BENARES NOTES

I

A Pilgrimage

The visit to Benares is made doubly sacred by the memories of our ancient spiritual heritage that Benares must wake up in the mind of every Indian and by the darshan of Bharatbhushan Pandit Malaviyaji whose life has been a continuous dedication. It is that burning love for the country that is the indissoluble bond of union between Malaviyaji and Gandhiji.

Few people have been able to see their dreams fulfilled in a measure that Malaviyaji has done. For the fulfilment of his dream he laid under tribute each and every one who professed a love for India's ancient culture. The Hindu Rajas and Maharajas and rich men came under his spell. The vision of the University was vouchsafed to him as he sat one day in contemplation, after a bath in holy Ganges, and the story goes that he shared the vision with his father, who parted with a hard-earned sum of Rs. one hundred and one and along with it gave also the blessing that that amount may be multiplied to a crore and one. The blessing was fulfilled, and for five and twenty years Malaviyaji has seen rise before his eyes edifice after edifice, and thousands of youths of the land come and grow under his benign influence. The youths have in turn imparted to him their youth and energy, and old age in one like him has become an object of pride and veneration.

No wonder the Silver Jubilee Convocation, to which flocked thousands from far and near, became a unique festival of thanksgiving, and Dr. Radhakrishnan, on whom Panditji's mantle has fitly fallen, voiced the feelings of all when in a wonderful paean of praise he said that sages like him render holy places real tirthas — places of pilgrimage — तीर्थकुर्वन्ति तीर्थानि, and wished him life for a hundred autumns.

A Dream Unfulfilled

And yet to him the dream is far from fulfilment. A book of memoirs published recently by Pandit Ram Naresh Tripathi — तीस दिन — मालवीजीके साथ (Thirty Days with Malaviyaji) — gives us a glimpse of his days and dreams. Even now he says to his doctor: "I would still like to make a tour of India. There is much yet to be done. I want a magnificent hall of music where the boys may learn music, so that they may go about through life with devotional music inspiring them. I want to see here a Nalanda where ten thousand students may live and study together in order to revive our ancient glories." One day he goes out in fair moonlight and exclaims: "What a glorious sight! There is enough space here for our sages to come and build their ashrams and be a perpetual source of light and life to our youths. The object of the Vishwavidyalaya will be fulfilled only when we have a Vasishta, an Atri, a Gautama, an Angiras, each with his ashram to impart his unique message." Again: "I want some of our pandits to do research regarding the works of Tulsidas and other saints. I want absolutely authentic editions of their works." Again: "I want to name some of our roads here after Harishchandra, Yudhishtira, Hanuman, Ashoka, Pratap." Also: "No, no, have as many scholarships here as possible for the poor. Who knows there may be many an unknown Shivaji, Pratap, Harishchandra, Dhruva among them?" One more: "I have deliberately arranged a weekly Gita class here, so that a regular reading of our unique book may be an inspiration to them."

The Voice of the Sentinel

Gandhiji was there as a pilgrim no less than others. But he had the mission of a sentinel to fulfil. He was no good for a convocation address. It was not in his line. But lest our festivities should make us lose sight of the fact that those who are to be the heirs of the venerable sage have to work together to bring to a complete fulfilment his dream, he took upon himself the task of sounding a note of warning.

Twentyfive years ago he had performed a similar task. The then Maharaja of Darbhanga, who welcomed him as one "who though born in luxury and affluence had voluntarily chosen to identify himself with the poor", did not know he would prove true to the description. But Malaviyaji knew. He had taken him into his secrets. Gandhiji knew what a Herculean task it had been for Malaviyaji to secure a charter for the University, and also what was Malaviyaji's unfulfilled ambition. Malaviyaji had met Sir Harcourt Butler, who was then a Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, in charge of education, and told him that education in the University would be imparted through Hindi. But Sir Harcourt knew his business better. He said: "That will not do. You had in that case better go on your own and do without Government's help and support. So long as you conduct your affairs in English we are safe, we know where you are and what you mean; but when you use your own language we are completely at sea." Malaviyaji, who has often agreed with his adversary rather too quickly, had promised not to press the idea. But not so Gandhiji. Malaviyaji knew what Gandhiji would say on the occasion, in fact Gandhiji had warned him beforehand. But Malaviyaji would not take a refusal. He compelled him to speak in English, but also asked him to say whatever he wanted to say. And so he had let himself go. Even today that speech reads as though it was delivered yesterday. It was an impromptu speech as on the present occasion, and Gandhiji perhaps does not recall today the exact words he said. But they have the same authentic ring, and the whole was couched almost in the same language! "It is a matter of deep humiliation and shame for us that I am compelled this evening, under the shadow of this great college in this sacred city to address my countrymen in a language that is foreign to me." That is how he began, and hoped that "this University will see to it that youths who come to it will receive their instruction through the vernaculars. . . . . If we were receiving our education today through our vernaculars, what should we be today? We should have today a free India, we should have our educated men not as if they were foreigners in their own land, but speaking to the heart of the nation; they would be working among the poorest of the poor, and whatever they would have gained during the past fifty years would be a heritage to the nation." He then deplored the thousands of years that were lost to our nation as a result of the terrible handicap under which our youths had to labour, and then took the liberty of "thinking audibly" before them. He turned his eyes about him, and as he did so he sighed at the sight of the gorgeous show of jewellery which "made a splendid feast for the eyes", but which compelled him to say to the bedecked ones: "There is no salvation for India unless you strip yourselves of this jewellery and hold it in trust for your countrymen in India."

I will not summarise the whole of that speech which the curious can read even today with profit. Some of the things that followed, which were really meant to deprecate the cult of the bomb, jarred on an un-understanding audience then, so much so that most of the big people left the meeting in a body. The times are changed. Harder things than he said that day have been said by him, and when on the evening of the 21st January he began to address the audience in Hindustani no one felt that anything unexpected was happening. But the University has still got to be the Vishwavidyalaya of Malaviyaji's and Gandhiji's dream. And it did one's soul good to see the eighty year old Malaviyaji deliver in distinct and chaste Hindi a speech that was heard by the vast concourse that had gathered there, corroborating every one of the sentiments uttered by Gandhiji. "The Sun that radiates light and warmth is there," as Gandhiji said, "we have but to receive and enjoy that light and warmth." His blessing is there given in a Sanskrit verse of his own composition:

देशभक्त्याऽऽत्मत्यागेन समानार्हः सदा भव ॥

(May thou be deserving of honour by means of truth, brahmacharya, healthy body, learning, love of thy land, and self-sacrifice.)

A DEPLORABLE INCIDENT

( By M. K. Gandhi )

As Sardar Vallabhbhai was leaving Sevagram the other day he told me of a dacoity in a home in Kheda District. Armed dacoits entered the house, belaboured the inmates, and escaped with the loot. The story was heart-rending. What should I do under similar circumstances, I thought to myself. What should Congressmen do in the circumstances was the next thought; and since then the train of thought arising from the dacoity has taken possession of me. The Congress has been working continuously since 1920 under the policy of non-violence. The province of Gujarat has also had the advantage of a leader of the Sardar's calibre. And yet daring dacoities can take place. How far then can Congress influence be said to have penetrated? People imagine that, if the British Government were to cease to function today, it would be the non-violent Congressmen who would automatically take over. But it is not so. I have been working to this end for the last twenty years, but my dream has not materialised. For the Congress has not had a living faith in the very means which it adopted in 1920. Therefore the non-violence of the Congress has really been non-violence of the weak. But Governments can only be run by the strong. And a non-violent Government can only be run by those who believe that non-violence is the mightiest force on earth. If we had had this strength, there would be no Hindu-Muslim riots, there would be no robbers or dacoits. Some might say that for such strength you need either a Jesus or a Buddha. But this is not so. Neither Jesus nor Buddha tried non-violence in the political sphere, or it would be truer to say that the present-day type of politics did not exist in their day. The Congress experiment is, therefore, a new one. The tragedy is that Congressmen have not tried it with full faith, full understanding and sincerity. If they had had these three essential qualities, the Congress would today have been far taller than it is. But I may not cry over spilt milk. I refer to the past only in order to guide us in the present. Even if we wake up now, the game is ours; if we do not, we shall surely lose. Power invariably elects to go into the hands of the strong. That strength may be physical or of the heart, or, if we do not fight shy of the word, of the spirit. Strength of the heart connotes soul force. If today we decide that we should try to get power by force of arms, we shall have to undo all the work of twenty years among the masses. We shall have to spend a considerable time in giving people a contrary training. We cannot afford to give the required time at this critical juncture. It is certain that today whoever has any strength of any kind will use it for seizing power. It is my firm conviction that, if Congressmen are to get power, it should only be through non-violence or soul force.

We have neither time nor material to do new work even in this line. When we have so far employed non-violence as a weapon of the weak, how can we all of a sudden expect to convert it into a weapon of the strong? But in spite of this I feel that at the present moment this experiment alone is feasible and proper for us. There is no risk involved in it. Even failure in it takes the form of success because, even if the people are not able to go the whole length in the experiment, they cannot possibly be led into a ditch. By following the way of physical force they may not only be proved cowards, but in attempting to follow an untrodden path thousands may also be destroyed.

It is then the duty of Congressmen to seek out dacoits and robbers. They should try to understand and convert them. Such workers cannot be had for the asking; but Congressmen should know that this work is just as important as it is fraught with risk, and a certain number of them have to devote themselves to it.

The second thing requisite is that we should prepare such workers as would, under difficult circumstances, stand up to dacoits and, whilst trying to check or convert them from their evil ways, be prepared to suffer hurt or even death. Perhaps few workers will be forthcoming for this task too, but peace brigades throughout the country are a definite necessity. Or else in times of chaos Congressmen will lose all the reputation they have so far gained.

Thirdly, the rich should ponder well as to what is their duty today. They who employ mercenaries to guard their wealth may find those very guardians turning on them. The monied classes have got to learn how to fight either with arms or with the weapon of non-violence. For those who wish to follow the latter way the best and most effective mantram is: तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः (Enjoy thy wealth by renouncing it). Expanded it means: "Earn your crores by all means. But understand that your wealth is not yours; it belongs to the people. Take what you require for your legitimate needs, and use the remainder for society." This truth has hitherto not been acted upon; but, if the monied classes do not even act on it in these times of stress, they will remain the slaves of their riches and passions and consequently of those who overpower them.

But I have visions that the end of this war will mean also the end of the rule of capital. I see coming the day of the rule of the poor, whether that rule be through force of arms or of non-violence. Let it be remembered that physical force is transitory even as the body is transitory. But the power of the spirit is permanent, even as the spirit is everlasting.

HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"(a) The proceedings of the Congress, the A. I. C. C. and the Working Committee shall ordinarily be conducted in Hindustani. The English Language or any Provincial Language may be used, if the speaker is unable to speak in Hindustani or whenever permitted by the President.

(b) The proceedings of the Provincial Congress Committee shall ordinarily be conducted in the language of the Province concerned. Hindustani may also be used."

— Article 25 of the Congress Constitution

The Congress has not carried out this resolution to any appreciable extent. It is a sad reflection. The fault is Congressmen's. They will not take the trouble of learning Hindustani. Their effort for learning languages is evidently exhausted with the performance of the impossible task of acquiring a knowledge of the English language equal to a learned Englishman's. The result is tragic. It has meant impoverishment of the provincial languages and displacement of the all-India language described by the Congress as Hindustani. It has also meant a break between the millions and the English-educated few who happen to be the natural leaders for the simple reason that they are the only educated class. There is no education worth the name apart from the schools established by the Government. The Congress has to perform the Herculean task of displacing the English language with Hindustani. With the passing of the resolution it should have created a bureau for fulfilling the purpose as it might do even now. But if it does not, individual Congressmen and those who are interested in evolving an all-India language should do so.

But what is Hindustani? There is no such language apart from Urdu and Hindi. Urdu has sometimes been called Hindustani. Did the Congress mean Urdu in the article quoted? Did it exclude the more extensively known Hindi? Such a meaning would be absurd. It evidently meant, and could only mean, a scientific blend of Hindi and Urdu. There is no such written blend extant. But it is the common speech of the unlettered millions of Hindus and Muslims living in Northern India. Not being written, it is imperfect, and the written language has taken two different turns tending to widen the difference by each running away from the other. Therefore the word Hindustani means Hindi and Urdu. Therefore also Hindi can call itself Hindustani, if it does not exclude Urdu but tries to assimilate Urdu as much as is scientifically possible without damaging the natural structure and music of the original. Urdu can do likewise. There is no separate Hindustani body attempting to blend the two streams which today threaten to run away from each other.

The noble task can be performed by the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan and Anjuman-e-taraqqi-e-Urdu. I have been connected with the former since 1917 when I was invited to preside at its session of that year. I acquainted the audience with my views on the all-India medium. When I presided again at its session in 1935, I was able to persuade the Sammelan to define Hindi as the language spoken by Hindus and Muslims of the North of India and written either in Devanagari or Persian script. The natural consequence should have been for the members of the Sammelan to expand their knowledge of Hindi by living up to the definition and producing literature that could be read by both Hindus and Muslims. This should have meant the members learning the Persian script. They seem to have denied themselves this proud privilege. But better late than never. Will they bestir themselves now? They need not wait for the Anjuman to respond. It will be a great thing, if the Anjuman does. Each Association can, if it will work in harmony with the other. But I have suggested unitary action independent of the other party. That Association which will adopt my plan will enrich the language it stands for, and will ultimately be responsible for producing a blend which will serve the whole nation.

It is unfortunate that the Hindi-Urdu question has assumed a communal shape. It is possible for either party to undo the mischief by recognising the other and incorporating the acceptable part in a generous spirit. A language that borrows unstintingly from the others without harming its special characteristic will be enriched, even as the English language has become enriched by free borrowings.

WORKING COMMITTEE'S RESOLUTIONS

1. Present Situation

Fourteen months have elapsed since the Working Committee held their last meeting and during this period the world has fallen ever deeper into the abyss of war and rushed headlong towards self-destruction. The members of the Committee have met again on their release from prison and given earnest thought to all the national and international developments during this fateful period of human history. The burden of guiding the Congress and the nation at this critical stage when old problems assume a new significance and war approaches the frontiers of India bringing new problems in its train, is a heavy one which the Committee can only shoulder worthily with the full co-operation of the people of India. The Committee have endeavoured to keep in view the principles and objectives for which the Congress has stood during these past many years and considered them in the larger context of world conditions and world freedom. The Committee are convinced that full freedom for the people of India is essential even, and more especially, in the present state of world turmoil, not only for India's sake but for the sake of the world. The Committee also hold that real peace and freedom can only be established and endure on the basis of world co-operation between free nations.

The Committee gave full expression to their attitude towards the War in their statement issued on September 14, 1939, wherein they condemned Nazi and Fascist aggression and expressed their willingness to help the cause of freedom and democracy, provided the objectives of the war were clearly stated and acted upon, in so far as was possible, in the present. If freedom and democracy were those objectives, then they must necessarily include the ending of imperialism and the recognition of the independence of India. Subsequent pronouncements made on behalf of the British Government and their reactionary and oppressive policy made it clear that this Government was determined to maintain and intensify its imperialist hold and exploitation of the Indian people. British policy was one of deliberate insult to Indian nationalism, of a perpetuation of unrestrained authoritarianism, and the encouragement of disruptive and reactionary elements. Not only has every offer made by the Congress for an honourable compromise been rejected, but public opinion voiced by organisations regarded as moderate has also been flouted.

The Congress was, therefore, compelled, in order to defend the honour and the elementary rights of the Indian people and the integrity of the nationalist movement, to request Gandhiji to guide the Congress in the action that should be taken. Mahatma Gandhi desirous of avoiding embarrassment to his opponent as far as possible, especially during the perils and dangers of war, limited the satyagraha movement which he started to selected individuals who conformed to certain tests he had laid down. That satyagraha has now proceeded for over fourteen months and about twentyfive thousand Congressmen have suffered imprisonment, while many thousands of others who offered satyagraha in the Frontier Province and elsewhere were not arrested. The Committee desire to express their respectful appreciation of Gandhiji's leadership and of the response of the nation to it, and are of opinion that this has strengthened the people.

Throughout this period the attitude of the British Government has been hostile to Indian freedom and it has functioned in India as a completely authoritarian government, insulting the deeply cherished convictions and feelings of the people. Neither the professions of freedom and democracy, nor the perils and catastrophes that have come in the wake of war, have affected this attitude and policy, and such changes as have taken place have been for the worse.

The recent release of a number of political prisoners has no significance or importance, and the circumstances attending it, and official pronouncements made, make it clear that it is not connected with any change of policy. Large numbers of detenus, who are kept in prison under the Defence of India Act without trial, and whose only offence seems to be that they are ardent patriots impatient of foreign rule and determined to achieve the independence of the country, still remain in prison. Recent arrests of prominent persons and their treatment in prison also indicate that the old policy is being pursued as before.

While there has been no change in Britain's policy towards India, the Working Committee must nevertheless take into full consideration the new world situation that has arisen by the development of the war into a world conflict and its approach to India. The sympathies of the Congress must inevitably lie with the peoples who are the subject of aggression and who are fighting for their freedom. But only a free and independent India can be in a position to undertake the defence of the country on a national basis and be of help in the furtherance of the larger causes that are emerging from the storm of war. The whole background in India is one of hostility and of distrust of the British Government and not even the most far-reaching promises can alter this background, nor can a subject India offer voluntary or willing help to an arrogant imperialism which is indistinguishable from fascist authoritarianism.

The Committee is, therefore, of opinion that the resolution of the A. I. C. C. passed in Bombay on September 16, 1940, holds today and defines Congress policy still.

2. Gandhiji Absolved

The Working Committee have received the following letter from Gandhiji and recognise the validity of the point he has raised and therefore relieve him of the responsibility laid upon him by the Bombay resolution referred to by Gandhiji. But the Committee assure him that the policy of non-violence adopted under his guidance for the attainment of Swaraj and which has proved so successful in leading to mass awakening and otherwise will be adhered to by the Congress. The Working Committee further assure him that it would like to extend its scope as far as possible even in free India. The Committee hope that Congressmen will render him full assistance in the prosecution of his mission, including the offering of civil disobedience.

Bardoli,

Dear Maulana Saheb,

In the course of discussion in the Working Committee, I discovered that I had committed a grave error in the interpretation of the Bombay resolution. I had interpreted it to mean that the Congress was to refuse participation in the present or all war on the ground principally of non-violence. I found to my astonishment that most members differed from my interpretation and held that the opposition need not be on the ground of non-violence. On re-reading the Bombay resolution I found that the differing members were right and that I had read into it a meaning which its letter could not bear. The discovery of the error makes it impossible for me to lead the Congress in the struggle for resistance to war effort on grounds in which non-violence was not indispensable. I could not, for instance, identify myself with opposition to war effort on the ground of ill-will against Great Britain. The resolution contemplated material association with Britain in the war effort as a price for guaranteed independence of India. If such was my view and I believed in the use of violence for gaining independence and yet refused participation in the effort as the price of that independence, I would consider myself guilty of unpatriotic conduct. It is my certain belief that only non-violence can save India and the world from self-extinction. Such being the case, I must continue my mission whether I am alone or assisted by an organisation or individuals. You will, therefore, please relieve me of the responsibility laid upon me by the Bombay resolution. I must continue civil disobedience for free speech against all war with such Congressmen and others whom I select and who believe in the non-violence I have contemplated and are willing to conform to prescribed conditions.

I will not, at this critical period, select for civil disobedience those whose services are required to steady and help the people in their respective localities.

Yours sincerely
M. K. Gandhi

THE MONTH IN BARDOLI

With Harijan Sevak

It was impossible for Gandhiji to respond to the calls of various workers in Gujarat to visit their centres. The call from Ahmedabad was almost irresistible. But the Sardar had to take the odium of being ruthlessly impartial, and so every one of them came to Bardoli. Among these were Harijan sevak who had met in Sabarmati under the Presidentship of Thakkar Bapa. They came with questions ready framed and thus made Gandhiji's work easy.

The first was the question about the wells: "Should we seek the co-operation of Harijans, and, if so, to what extent?" "Co-operation," said Gandhiji, "is necessary, but we must not take the Harijans in a body and invade the Savarna quarters. We should visit the wells, ascertain the classes of people using them, and reason with these to let the Harijans use them. Regarding local board wells the help of officials may be freely sought, and such Harijans may be asked to go and use the wells as may be prepared to stand ill-treatment. But the brunt should be borne by the sevak, care being taken to stand between the Harijans and those who would threaten to molest or belabour them. The Harijans should be invariably asked to use clean vessels and observe all the ordinary rules of cleanliness. We can also dig wells for Harijans and invite the Savarnas to use them. It is likely that the Harijans may be boycotted, but we should see that they get employment elsewhere. The Harijans have to be taught to learn to assert themselves firmly and non-violently, and the Savarnas may be gently reminded that injustice cannot last for ever. These are broad principles, but everyone has to take measures suited to the circumstances in each case."

Q. "Can't we insist on the admission of Harijan boys to hostels where all non-Harijan Hindu boys are admitted?"

A. "Of course, but care should be taken to see that the hostel is not exclusively for a particular community or section of Hindus. Where all sections are admitted and only the Harijans are excluded, the workers should strain every nerve to get the Harijans admitted."

"When I said that removal of untouchability did not include the removal of restrictions on interdining and intermarriage, I had the general Hindu public in mind, not the Congress workers or Congressmen. These have to abolish untouchability from every part of their life."

The next question was about the temptations given by Missionaries in the shape of books, school fees, etc., with a view to the boys' ultimate conversion. How was one to deal with them? "The missionaries have of course the right to preach the gospel of Christ and to invite non-Christians to embrace Christianity. But every attempt to press material benefits or attractions in the aid of conversion should be freely exposed, and the Harijans should be educated to resist these temptations."

Q. "What are the qualifications that a Harijan sevak should have in order to make his work felt?"

A. "Such a question is rather late in the day. But I shall try to answer it again. It is a misfortune that politics have been mixed up with anti-untouchability work, which is essentially one of self-purification, justice, humanity. Long before I took to politics I felt that abolition of untouchability and Hindu-Muslim unity were essential for national well-being. In order to prevent the vivisection of Hinduism I had to fight it with my life, and the question did receive a political complexion, but in essence it is a purely religious and moral question. Every sevak must be fired with a passion to purify Hinduism, and must be ready to lay down his life in the attempt. Such a sevak will be ready to sacrifice his all—family connections, social advantages, and life itself—in order to wipe out the blot on Hinduism. The work should be as one of life's essential functions, e.g. offering one's prayers, ablutions, etc. not carrying emolument or reward. If the worker is fired with this passion, the way will be clear before him. Thus a worker would rather starve than allow the Harijans to be starved, would hesitate to use amenities which are denied to the Harijans and feel increasing identification with them every day. All this work is to be done without regard to the political results. Assuming for a moment that Swaraj does not come as a result of the abolition of untouchability, the work has to be done in order to keep Hinduism pure and alive. I know that with some of the Congressmen the work has only a political meaning, but it is wrong. If they seek justice from an alien Government, they must first do justice to their own kith and kin. That is the fundamental maxim of equity—he who seeks equity must do equity."

"There is, I know, a section who says that political freedom must be won first and social reform would follow later. It is a wrong idea, and certainly inconsistent with one who would win Swaraj by non-violent means. But the Harijan worker has to educate both the orthodox and exclusively political-minded people. Let him not judge others, but by selfless self-effacing service set an example to them."

With Khadi Workers

Sardar Vallabhbhai has created a khadi organisation in Gujarat in order to intensify khadi production, and he has enlisted for this work a number of khadi workers, and he collects the necessary funds also. These workers too came for guidance and advice.

"We are producing 2 lakhs of rupees worth of khadi, but the demand exceeds 12 lakhs," they said. "How are we to meet it? We have not enough weavers and workers, and there is the question of funds too."

"Let me take up the last question first," said Gandhiji. "It is my firm conviction which has grown upon me with the years that, if there are workers, no work suffers for want of funds. But the real question is of the capacity to produce. Supposing someone gave you one crore of rupees, I know you cannot produce ten crore rupees worth of khadi. The reason is lack of workers, lack of efficiency, and lack of faith. It is good that there is a growing demand for khadi—though 12 lakhs of rupees worth of khadi is nothing extraordinary where 8 crores of rupees worth of khadi could be used. But the increased sales mean that the liking for khadi is also on the increase. We should contact these consumers and persuade them to spin. And here comes in the Dhanush Takli. You may know that I can spin on the ordinary wheel better, but I have made a point of using only the Dhanush Takli, and I am now almost an expert in it. The reason is that, whereas Laxmidasbhai cannot execute an order for 25 lakhs of wheels, the people can themselves make as many Dhanush Taklis. It is so easy to make, so cheap, takes very little material and practically no technical skill. It is a wrong policy to manufacture wheels in Sabarmati in order to export them to the Punjab or South India. They should be made locally everywhere, and for that purpose the Dhanush Takli is the thing. Universalisation of this will increase production by leaps and bounds.

"You have to catch the increasing love of spinning by the forelock. In none of our previous campaigns was spinning done on such a large scale as during the last campaign. The figures for Sabarmati Jail were good, but the figures for Agra and Bareilly were also good. Badshah Khan has been able to popularise spinning as he had never been before. We have, therefore, to take this tide at the flood and bring expert knowledge to bear on the love for spinning that is growing.

"We have to go from house to house and enlist willing spinners ready to contribute their yarn.

"I take it that all khadi workers are believers in the attainment of Swaraj by non-violent means. Yours then should be the largest contribution to constructive work.

"Some of you have to be weavers too. There are enough hand-loom weavers in India to produce all the cloth we need. We have to persuade them to take to weaving hand-spun yarn and also to get their womenfolk and children to produce yarn in their homes."

A Record Spinner

Gandhiji has referred to the record spinning in jails by the satyagrahis. Even now he gets letters from satyagrahis still in jail to say that even in the Punjab some satyagrahis, who came in with an initial aversion to spinning, ended by becoming regular spinners. But all records were broken by Shri Ashabhai of Ras who never missed a day's spinning during the 9 months and 11 days of his imprisonment. He is an agriculturist. He might have kept all his yarn for home consumption, but he brought it to Bardoli and laid it at Gandhiji's feet to be used as he liked. Here are figures of his spinning:

9 months 11 days.

1,237 hanks of 840 yards each, i. e. 10,39,080 yards, i. e. over 3,700 yards per day. Weight 59 lbs.
668 hanks of 24 counts	Rs. 36-4-0 spinning wage
263 " 20 "	Rs. 14-7-0 "
306 " 18 "	Rs. 16-0-6 "
	Rs. 66-11-6

This will yield 280 square yards of khadi worth Rs. 175. Shri Ashabhai kept excellent health, attended to his daily needs of washing etc., and did some amount of reading also.

TO GUJARATIS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

You have sacrificed a great deal in the cause of Swaraj. But it is not enough. You can contribute still more in the form of money, labour, and increasingly intelligent and fresh minds.

Is it not sad that Rs. 2 lakhs worth of khadi only is being produced in Gujarat whereas Rs. 12 lakhs worth is wanted? It may be that there is not so much poverty in Gujarat as in the other provinces. But that does not mean that Gujaratis cannot, if they wish, produce all the khadi they need. Reckoning the population of Gujarat at 1 crore, the people would need at least 3 crores worth of cloth. You should produce at least this quantity, i. e. 15 crore yards.

The time is fast approaching when we shall not be able to get mill cloth. There is scarcity even today, and what if the mills are bombed, what if they are used as munition factories? Either each one of us, young and old, rich and poor, men and women, has to spin and provide for his own clothing or else go naked. There is not the least exaggeration in this. In the warring countries people are rationed for food and clothing, and as the war is prolonged even the necessities of life are being used up and munitions are produced only to end in smoke. The war is thus working double destruction.

We have been willynilly dragged into the vortex. But we are not yet so hard put to it as the people in the warring countries. If, however, we sit with folded hands until the trouble comes upon us, we shall be found to have been fools. We must be wise and adopt the necessary measures in time.

It is my request then to those Gujaratis whose ear I can reach that they should give as much money and as much yarn as they can to the Mahagujarat Khadi Mandal. Receiving centres should be opened where necessary so as to save people the cost of posting yarn. The master-key to producing the requisite khadi lies in the wheel plying in every home. If good yarn is spun, weavers will be available, though I have already advised that we should take time by the forelock and train voluntary weavers also.

Will every Congressman rise to the occasion and spin for the nation?

KASHI VISHWAVIDYALAYA ADDRESS

[The following is a fairly full translation of Gandhiji's Hindustani address on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee Convocation of the Benares Hindu University on the 21st January. M. D.]

Pilgrimage

Revered Malaviyaji, Sir Radhakrishnan, brothers and sisters,

You all know very well that I have neither the physical strength nor the inclination to undertake long journey, and yet when I received Sir Radhakrishnan's invitation to deliver an address on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee Convocation of the Benares Hindu University I had not the heart to decline it. You know the strong bond of affection that binds me to Panditji, and it is with a certain amount of pride and satisfaction that I obey his behest whenever it is at all possible for me. I therefore could not say 'no'. Sir Radhakrishnan's letter was a call to a pilgrimage.

Great as are Malaviyaji's services to the country, I have no doubt that this University constitutes his greatest service and achievement, and he has worn himself out for the work that is dear to him as life itself. It was out of my great regard for him that twentyfive years ago I accepted his invitation to attend the foundation ceremony of this University. I knew that in that august function, which was to be attended by the Viceroy and the ruling Princes of India, there was no place for a poor man like me. I had not then been made a 'Mahatma', and if anyone called me by that name, I knew I must have been mistaken for Mahatma Munshiramji, as the late Swami Shradhdhanandji was then called. For there cannot be a number of Mahatmas, and I knew even when I was in South Africa that Munshiramji's great work had entitled him to that name. But Malaviyaji has a knack for detecting servants of the people, however obscure they may be.

The Sun Radiating Heat and Light

Everyone knows that there is no greater beggar than Pandit Malaviyaji on the face of the earth. He has never begged for himself, by the grace of God he has never been in want, but he became a voluntary beggar for causes he has made his own, and God has always filled his bowl in an overflowing measure. But he has an insatiable appetite, and although he got the crore he wanted he is still asking for more. Even at this moment he whispered into my ears that he had a good donation from the Maharaja of Darbhanga, our Chairman.

It is a rare good fortune to have him still in our midst, a living example of a pure life of plain living and high thinking; but I have a fear that, though he is physically in your midst, many of you are untouched by his great example. The fault is wholly yours, not his. The Sun radiates heat and light to all on earth, but how can even the Sun help those who will shut themselves from him? But I am not here to sing Malaviyaji's praises. This platform has rung with them. He has deserved them all. I must now address a few words to you—the teachers and the students of the Vidyapith. When I accepted Sir Radhakrishnan's invitation he had asked me to send a copy of my address to him. I told him that I had no time to write anything; I did not even know what I should be able to say. A feeling of nervousness overpowers me when I am in the midst of learned men. Ever since my return to India my lot has been cast among the poor and the downtrodden—those whom the Congress represents—and whilst in their midst I feel no sense of constraint or hesitation. In your midst I feel tongue-tied. I simply said to Sir Radhakrishnan that I should trust to the inspiration of the moment. That inspiration has come, but I do not know how you will welcome my plain speaking.

A Painful Anomaly

As speaker after speaker spoke and left the dais, I longed for someone who would address the audience in Hindi or Urdu, or Hindustani, aye even in Sanskrit,—even in Marathi, or for that matter any of the Indian languages. But no such good luck befell me and you. Why? We are slaves and have hugged the language of those who have kept us enslaved. It has become a fashion to blame the Englishmen for all our ills. I have not hesitated to blame them for many things they have done. I have never charged them with compelling us to adopt English as the medium of expression. We devote precious years of our lives to learning the English language, our ambition being to be able to speak English as Englishmen, and our breast swells with pride when an Englishman pats us on our back for speaking flawless English. Think of the time and energy of our youth expended on learning the English language, as if it was our mother-tongue, and calculate by simple multiplication the number of years and the volume of precious energy that are lost to the nation.

And yet all this is happening in the Kashi Hindu Vishwavidyalaya which has been extolled today as the living embodiment of Indian culture. Malaviyaji did all that was necessary to draw the best possible teachers by attractive salaries, but he could not do the rest. It was not his fault; Hindi did not take the place of English. The teachers are the product of the tradition which they have inherited, and the students are content to accept what they get from them. They need not be. They go on strikes and even hunger-strikes often for trivial reasons. Why will they not insist on having their tuition in the all-India language? There are, we were told today, 250 students here from the Andhra Province. Let them go to Sir Radhakrishnan and ask for an Andhra section of the University and ask to be taught through the medium of Telugu if they will not learn the all-India language.

Japan's Example

You know what has happened in Japan—a country which I do not regard as essentially great—but which is regarded as great in Asia in that it has successfully challenged the supremacy of the Western nations. The thousands of boys and girls in the Japanese schools and colleges receive their education not through the medium of English but through Japanese. Their script is difficult, but it is no bar to their learning it and they have not given it up in preference to the Roman. Not that they boycott English and other European languages. But they economise their energy. Those who need to learn them do so for enriching the Japanese thought and knowledge which the West alone can give. They take care to turn into Japanese all that is worth taking from the West. That is because the mind of Japan's youth is fresh and alert. The knowledge gained thus has become national property. Our ambition does not go beyond becoming clerks in Government offices, lawyers, barristers, judges, all helplessly serving the system they would fain destroy. And we have not succeeded either in mastering the English language. I get numerous letters from English-educated people—some of them possessing the highest degrees of our universities—but they betray a woeful ignorance of the English language. The reason is simple. Malaviyaji and Radhakrishnans are rare, and the thousands cannot achieve what they have done.

No Discipline

As I was listening to the English speeches I was amazed at the patience and innate courtesy of our people who, though they do not understand a word of what is said, do not mob us, as they well might do. If there is any doubt in your minds about this, I can demonstrate to you by a show of hands how few—even from among the students—have followed the proceedings here.

There is another thing to which I am tempted to draw your attention. I witnessed this morning a scene that I had least expected here. There was the Vasant Panchami day procession of the students who had to march past Malaviyaji's house after receiving his silent blessings. The way in which they were walking betrayed a lack of even elementary physical training. Instead of walking in step, erect and disciplined like soldiers on the march, they walked haphazardly in a desultory fashion.

Give Hindi the Pride of Place

I cannot help saying a word about the sight that greets you as you enter the great portals of the University. Thanks to the money that Malaviyaji can get for the asking, the gate is in consonance with the splendour of the edifices here. But what did I find on the top of the gate?—the bulk of the space (three-fourths) taken up by the words BENARES HINDU UNIVERSITY in English, and the fourth given to the inscription in Hindi which is the language through which you would derive your knowledge. I wondered what need there was of the English language? Just a little thought on the part of those who were in charge of such things would have been enough to tell them that what was needed there was the name written in Devanagari and Persian scripts—which would have symbolised to the people the desire on the part of Malaviyaji's University and Sir Radhakrishnan for communal harmony. It would have been in the fitness of things too, as both Hindi and Urdu are understood in these parts and both the scripts are familiar. The fact is the years we have wasted on English have ossified our minds and stunted our memory and imagination.

Surely it is no difficult thing for a non-Hindi-speaking person to learn Hindi or Hindustani. I can undertake to teach Hindi to anyone knowing Gujarati, Bengali or Marathi in the space of three months. Even the South Indian languages—Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, Kanarese—are full of Sanskrit words, and, if there was just a little fervour and love of the country in us, we should not hesitate to decide to write all the Sanskrit-derived languages as also the Southern group in the Devanagari script. These languages have not only a fairly common vocabulary, there is also a striking resemblance in the scripts. If our minds were not fagged, we would easily know half a dozen Indian languages. Then there is Urdu which should not be difficult to learn, if only our Urdu scholars did not make it a matter of pride to pack it with Persian and Arabic words, as the Pandits pack Hindi with Sanskrit words.

A Distinctive Feature Suggested

One more thought I should like to leave with you. Every university is supposed to have its tradition, its distinctive feature—Oxford and Cambridge, for instance, have theirs. But I am afraid our universities are the blotting-sheets of the West. We have borrowed the superficial features of the Western universities, and flattered ourselves that we have founded living universities here. Do they reflect or respond to the needs of the masses? Now I am told that a special feature of your University is that Engineering and Technology are taught here as nowhere else. I should not consider this a distinguishing feature. Let me suggest one to you. Have you been able to attract to your University youths from Aligarh? Have you been able to identify yourselves with them? That, I think, should be your special work, the special contribution of your University. Money has come in, and more will come in if God keeps Malaviyaji in our midst for a few more years. But no amount of money will achieve the miracle I want—I mean a heart-unity between Hindus and Muslims. I would like you to go out to invite Mussalmans to come here, and not to mind if they reject your advances. You are the representatives of a great civilisation which according to Lokamanya Tilak is 10,000 years old and according to later scholars even older. The special contribution of that civilisation is to befriend the world, to turn so-called foes into friends. Our civilisation has absorbed, like the holy Ganges, many streams from outside, and it is my prayer that the Hindu University which is endeavouring to represent Hindu culture and Hindu civilisation may invite and absorb all that is best in other cultures and be a model to all of communal unity and harmony. That should be its distinctive feature. English will not help you to evolve this. It is our own ancient learning that will teach you this—our scriptures learnt and understood in the proper spirit.

One thing more and I have done. You are living in palatial hostels, but look at the little house in which Panditji lives in utter simplicity and without the least splendour. You enter his room. There is no decoration and barest furniture. You, who will be his heirs, should model your lives accordingly. Many of you are children of poor parents. Don't forget that you have to represent the poor, and that therefore a life of ease and luxury is inconsistent with the poverty of our land. May you be all models of plain and simple living and high thinking like Malaviyaji. May God bless you with long life and the wisdom to carry out what I have said, if it has appealed to you.

PLAIN LIVING AND HIGH THINKING

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"An ideal society is that in which every individual will be able to live a life of progressively increasing wants with a minimum output of labour." Thus writes a friend from Ahmedabad. The proposition is pleasing and is backed by plausible argument which many may accept. The writer forecast that the Viceroy was bound to refuse the Congress proposal. He does not believe in the freedom of the individual, and is therefore of opinion that it was only meet that the Viceroy should turn down the proposal. Because his forecast turned out correct he may even hold his argument to be sound and say, "I told you so." It is therefore necessary for me to take note of the letter.

The writer may not derive any satisfaction from the Viceroy's refusal. All my colleagues had foretold the result. But I wanted to go not so much in the expectation of getting acceptance as, in the event of failure, to return with added strength. Nor does the rejection of the proposal mean in any sense that the Viceroy does not believe in individual freedom. Britain has not gone that length. Europe has no doubt entered upon a new phase in denying individual liberty. If this goes, then surely all is lost, for, if the individual ceases to count, what is left of society? Individual freedom alone can make a man voluntarily surrender himself completely to the service of society. If it is wrested from him, he becomes an automaton and society is ruined. No society can possibly be built on a denial of individual freedom. It is contrary to the very nature of man. Just as a man will not grow horns or a tail, so he will not exist as man if he has no mind of his own. In reality even those who do not believe in the liberty of the individual believe in their own. Modern editions of Chenghiz Khan retain their own.

Just as the writer's ideas on individual liberty are impossible, so also is his other theory. That everyone in this world should be able to maintain as high a standard of life as possible with the least possible output of labour is just as fantastic as to expect a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. The writer's high living would appear to mean luxurious living which is an impossible proposition for any society as a whole. And when there is no limit to luxury where shall we stop? All the scriptures of the world have taught the exact opposite. Plain living and high thinking is the ideal that has been placed before us. The vast majority recognise its truth but are unable to get there because of human frailty. It is, however, perfectly possible to envisage such an existence. That the crores in India should be guaranteed a certain income is only right, and to achieve this ideal large scale machinery is not only not necessary but wholly destructive.

Man falls from the pursuit of the ideal of plain living and high thinking the moment he wants to multiply his daily wants. History gives ample proof of this. Man's happiness really lies in contentment. He who is discontented, however much he possesses, becomes a slave to his desires. And there is really no slavery equal to that of his desires. All the sages have declared from the house-tops that man can be his own worst enemy as well as his best friend. To be free or to be a slave lies in his own hands. And what is true for the individual is true for society.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Unitary Method

Q. You seem to be advocating what you call the unitary method in the solution of many questions. Will you explain it a little more fully than you have done?

A. It is as simple as it is sure. A contract or pact is between two parties. There is also consideration passing from one to the other. Such was the Lucknow Pact between the Congress and the Muslim League. The same thing could have been accomplished by the unitary method. Only then there would have been no compromise dictated by fear and distrust. The Congress could have done, according to its notion, absolute justice, i. e. yielded the maximum consistent with the welfare of the whole nation without the expectation of any consideration from the League. In a well-regulated family the relations are governed by the unitary method. Thus a father gives to his children not as a result of a pact. He gives out of love, a sense of justice without expecting any return therefor. Not that there is none. But everything is natural, nothing is forced. Nothing is done out of fear or distrust. What is true of a well-regulated family is equally true of a well-regulated society which is but an extended family. My advice about the adoption of two scripts by Hindus and Muslims is based on the unitary method. My equal love for all communities dictates its adoption. Properly applied the method never fails. It disarms criticism and opposition. It presupposes a clean conscience and clean action. I propose to unfold in these columns the application of the method in all our communal relations. The views will be personal to me, as are all such since the Bardoli resolution. They will be addressed to Congressmen for adoption only in so far as they appeal to their reason.

Rajaji

Q. What has come over Rajaji? You and he seem to be drifting away from each other.

A. Yes, we seem to be and yet we are not. The seeming drift is but a prelude to a closer bond and clearer understanding. His loyalty is above suspicion. He would have gladly suppressed himself, if I had not strongly encouraged him to propound his views with a view to their adoption by the public. We own allegiance to the same goddess. Our interpretations differ. If he is erring, he will retrace his steps as soon as he discovers it. And he knows that I would do likewise, if I discover mine. I feel, therefore, absolutely safe with him, and I ask all questioners to do likewise.

Untruth

Q. Do you know that you are reported to have said at Benares that it is sinful for any Indian ever to study or speak in English and you are charged with insincerity in that you make such liberal use of the hated language when it suits you?

A. The report is wholly untrue. But once an untruth gets a start it is most difficult to overtake. Many untruths about me have had such a start. They created a temporary sensation and got a decent burial without any effort on my part. So will this one. No untruth has ever done any harm to anyone if there was no bottom to it. I am answering the question, not to protect my reputation but to carry my point further. The charge of insincerity is itself the best refutation of the untruth. For my free use of the English language is not a thing of today. The charge should have been regarded as unworthy of belief. Let it be known that I am a lover of the English language and the English. But my love is wise and intelligent. Therefore I give both the place they deserve. Thus I do not allow the English language to displace the mother-tongue or the natural all-India language—Hindustani. Nor do I let my love of the English displace my fellow-countrymen whose interest I can in no way allow to be injured. I recognise the great importance of the English language for international intercourse. I hold its knowledge as a second language to be indispensable for specified Indians who have to represent the country's interest in the international domain. I regard the English language as an open window for peeping into Western thought and sciences. For this too I should set apart a class. Through them I would spread through the Indian languages the knowledge they have gained from the West. But I would not burden India's children and sap their youthful energy by expecting the expansion of their brains through the medium of a foreign language. I do hold it to be a sin on the part of those who are responsible for producing the unnatural condition under which we are being educated. Such a thing is unknown in any other part of the world. Being too near the scene of the wreck we are unaware of the damage the nation has suffered by it. I can see the enormity of the damage because of my daily and close contact with the dumb and suppressed millions.

Another Untruth

Q. You are reported by the Press to have approvingly referred to the progress made by the Japanese in adopting Western methods with a thoroughness hitherto unknown in the East. Is not this a contradiction of all you have written about the West? Or is there one law for India and another for Japan?

A. This is another untruth like the one about the English Language. The reader will find out for himself from Mahadev Desai's report of my Benares speech as to what I actually said about the Japanese. The burden of my speech was the undesirability of making English the medium of instruction and all-India speech. I said in this connection that, however harmful in my opinion the Japanese adaptation of the West was, the rapid progress was due to the restriction of the learning of the Western mode to a select few and using them for transmission of the new knowledge among the Japanese through their own mother-tongue. Surely it is easy enough to understand that the Japanese could never have adapted themselves to the new mode, if they had had to do so through a foreign medium.

'Other Organisations'

Q. What do you mean by associating with other volunteer organisations working for similar ends? Do you include communal organisations?

A. I do. Unfortunately we have very few other non-communal organisations. 'Similar ends' naturally means constructive ends, using 'constructive' in the widest sense of the term. Thus you will tender your help to a Muslim League, or Hindu Sabha, volunteer in putting out fire or tending the wounded. You will also invite their help in such matters.

On the way to Kashi, 20-1-42

'Constructive Programme'

While I was writing the pamphlet on the thirteen-fold, now fourteenfold, constructive programme, Rajendra Babu was doing likewise in his own way. His pamphlet has now been published by the Navajivan Press, Ahmedabad, at 4 annas (postage 1 anna extra). It may be called a companion to mine. The reader will find much of interest and instruction in Rajendra Babu's treatise. It gives details which I have omitted. No worker should be without either.

BENARES NOTES

Some Features and Comments

Gandhiji in his address to the teachers and the students of the Kashi Vishwavidyalaya referred to what he would like the University to make a distinctive feature of its own. But apart from it there are in the University some special features which attract students to it from far and near. Gandhiji referred to the Engineering and the Technological departments. There are similarly the College of Oriental Learning and the College of Theology as also the Ayurvedic College. It has on its staff some of the most distinguished men in India in the sphere of Mathematics and Physics and some distinguished Orientalists, some who have to their credit text-books on subjects like Geology, and some like Prof. Atreya who is the author of many books both in English and Hindi on philosophy and religion. The departments of Oriental Learning and Ayurveda and the Institute of Agricultural Research have plenty of scope for research, though one does not know if much work has been done in that direction. The College of Theology ought not to rest content with giving degrees of Smriti Ratna, Smriti Sagar, and so on, but these degree-holders should make critical studies of our shastras and produce works of textual and higher criticism as has been done in the case of the Bible by numerous English and European scholars.

The University has besides spacious playgrounds, a well-equipped gymnasium in the Shivaji Hall, and it organises swimming and boat club activities too. In this connection I am tempted to make an observation. A university with 4,000 students has an almost unlimited scope in the direction of organising volunteer work both for the management of big meetings and shows and for the work of communal unity, as I shall presently show. This work, I am sorry to say, was conspicuous by its absence on the day the Convocation was held. It was a tough business to lead Pandit Malaviyaji and Gandhiji on to the dais that afternoon of the 21st. If there was proper organisation, there should have been a clear way prepared for the old leaders to walk to the dais unmolested by the crowds. There was not only no way, but scores of photographers from among the volunteers themselves made a scramble for their darshan and for catching snapshots of them. For a while I wondered whether we were not taking a grave risk in carrying old leaders like Panditji through these unmanageable crowds. And when after very great difficulty they were carried on to the dais a sort of pandemonium prevailed for quite a long time. It was a sad reflection on our education, learning and culture, and it must have been far from pleasant to Dr. Radhakrishnan to appeal to the audience to be quiet in the name of self-respect and dignity, and in the name of honoured guests like Gandhiji, Jawaharlalji and Rajendrababu. Sports and playing grounds and gymnasias are no use, if they cannot teach us the very elements of arranging and organising meetings, no matter how vast.

I have mentioned communal unity. If these four thousand students were to be taught non-violent military drill and to march like soldiers going to the front, they could form a unique peace brigade. A thousand students, nay even a hundred students, clad in khadi uniform can march peacefully to scenes of rioting, and can by daring and courage to go through some amount of suffering successfully quell a riot. If they were to devote a little thought to this, I am sure the students can be the best organisers of communal unity. That, however, is a far cry. Would they organise themselves as spinners? An hourly spinning would be a good preparation for the volunteer-work for communal unity.

Commendable Features

The University has a branch of the Gandhi Ashram Khadi Bhandar, which is managed by the Benares Gandhi Ashram, and under its auspices is a spinning centre too. There is also a Servants Credit Society and a Co-operative Store, both of which are, I hope, running well. I say 'I hope', as I have had no opportunity of going into their working, but they are commendable features in themselves.

But perhaps the most commendable of all are the Students Sevak Mandal, Vidyarthi Sahayak Sabha, and the Students' Self-Help Circle run by Profs. Asrani and Mukut Behari Lal. The Students' Self-Help Circle deserves special notice. It provides work for poor students, e. g. tuition, photography, typewriting, selling milk, ghee, newspapers, stationery, carrying and painting and polishing furniture, whitewashing houses, gardening, boot polishing and so on. Diligent students earn up to Rs. 15 per month by doing these jobs. Pandit Ram Naresh Tripathi tells the story of an M. A. student who met him one early morning going with pails of milk on his cycle. He has three brothers of his also in the University. Their father earns only Rs. 35 per month and cannot possibly find the wherewithal to educate the sons. The sons are, therefore, running a small dairy and selling milk and ghee. A hundred such students are thus finding the expenses of their education through self-help. Prof. Asrani is keenly interested in spinning and cottage industries, and his energetic work in all these directions is worthy of praise. He had collected a little purse for Gandhiji for constructive work, and he also presented Gandhiji with a chudder made out of yarn of the boys' own spinning.

A word, too, about Prof. Satish Kalelkar and his band of students who slaved for us day and night at our camp. Acharya Kripalani, seeing that most of these students were Gujaratis, twitted him with having chosen only Gujarati students for service in Gandhiji's camp. The fault, if fault it was, was Sir Radhakrishnan's who insisted on Gandhiji being served and looked after by those who knew Gandhiji best. And young Satish, who is fast getting popular among the boys, but who is still fresh in the University, selected the boys he knew best. Otherwise being the son of a distinguished father like Kakasaheb Kalelkar he is, I know free from any trace of provincialism, not to say communalism. He has a bright future in front of him, and he could not do better than devote his spare time to organising students in the directions I have indicated in these notes.

Watertight ?

Our stay at the University was all too brief for anything like a study of things there, and what I say in this paragraph is subject to correction. The Women's College is a self-contained one walled off from the other buildings. It has its own staff, though I understand that ladies who go in for science have to attend the science classes along with men students. If that is the case, I do not know what objection there should be to lady students having the benefit of lectures in other subjects by men professors. On the other hand, there may be a distinguished lady professor whose lectures men students may well profit by. There seems to me to be no reason for watertight compartments so far as teaching is concerned.

But I would go a little further. There are the weekly Gita classes. I do not know if lady students are allowed to attend them. If not, they should be. On the second day of our stay Gandhiji received a message from the Women's College that he should not go away without giving the lady students at least a few minutes of his time. He readily agreed, and seeing the beautiful maidan in front of the College, he felt like having the evening prayer there. The students hailed the proposal with delight. Prof. Asrani, who was to present the students' purse and the chudder at prayer time, was also invited to be present there with his students. And for the first time perhaps the lady students and men students had prayers together. At the request of the lady students themselves Gandhiji agreed to listening to a recitation from the Gita by some of them, after the end of the prayer. They recited verses 36 to 46 from the Eleventh Discourse of the Gita. The selection seemed to me to be most appropriate. They could not have thought of a fitter offering of welcome, and it did one's heart good to think that at least some—if not indeed all—students in the Women's College know the Bhagavadgita. I felt that they should have more opportunities for cultural contact with the outside world and always opportunities of listening to an occasional sermon from the venerable Panditji, Dr. Radhakrishnan and others and all leaders who are invited as guests.

Talks with Congress Workers

Pandit Jawaharlal had arranged two meetings of Congress workers for an informal exchange of views with Gandhiji. At one meeting there were the members of the U. P. Provincial Congress Committee Executive, and at the other there were members of the larger Committee. A number of questions were asked—some wise and some otherwise, which provided a lot of merriment to Gandhiji no less than to the audience, who had the opportunity of observing Gandhiji's humour at its best which contributes a good deal to keep him alive and healthy.

Principles and Objective

Q. What is your ultimate object? Do you want the Congress to accept your principles or to achieve its object?

A. Every plan and programme that I have placed before the Congress has been placed with a view to achieving the goal of Independence. Truth and non-violence are a matter of creed for me—you may call it my religion, but it has not been my object to propagate that religion through the Congress. Before the Congress they have been placed as effective means to an end—as political means for a political objective, as I did in South Africa. If it was otherwise, I should cease to be a political worker and occupy the position of a dharmaguru! The political method can be changed whenever expedient, but the change should be honest and deliberate. But one should not pretend to adhere to the method when really in practice one has given it up. That would be deceiving oneself and the world.

Future Programme

Q. We should like to have a glimpse of the next six months or a year as you picture it to yourself. You have often said that this is a fight to the finish, your last fight which will not end until the goal is won. What are likely to be the future developments as you can visualise them?

A. It is a good question, and also a difficult question. Not that I am not clear, but because it takes us into the realm of speculation. I let things and happenings react on me—though I confess I do not follow everything as Jawaharlal with his study of foreign affairs can. Jawaharlal is convinced that the British Empire is finished. We all wish that it may be finished, but I do not think it is finished. We know that the Britishers are tough fighters, we know what the Empire—especially India—means to every home in Britain, and therefore they will never consent to be 'Little Englanders'. Mr. Churchill has said that they are not 'sugar candies', and that they can meet rough with rough. Therefore it will be long before the Empire is finished. There is no doubt, however, that they are nearing the end, and what Jawaharlal has said is very true that, if we could do nothing to prevent the war, we certainly will do much to prevent a peace in which we have no voice. That is what every Congressman has to bear in mind. We have, therefore, to be up and doing. If we sit with folded hands, we may have a peace which we do not desire.

I adhere to the statement that it is my final fight, but we have had to alter our programme because of the latest developments, because war has come to our door. The suspension had nothing to do with my retirement from the official leadership of the Congress. Even if it had continued, how could I today ask Jawaharlal to march back to jail? Of course he will be in jail, if he is prevented from doing the work we have chalked out. But things have happened so rapidly that we had not the slightest idea of what was coming. How then can I talk of a year or even six months ahead? That we are marching swiftly towards Independence I have no doubt. There is no doubt about the programme ahead of us. No Congressman should rest content with just paying his four anna fee. He has to be active all the twentyfour hours. Even the one concrete programme of production of cloth is sufficient to occupy all our energies. There are 400 students in the Benares Hindu University. Will they spin an hour every day? I am talking of spinning because it is a thing nearest my heart, but there are a hundred and one other things. Have the villagers enough food to eat? Have they enough to cover themselves in this bitter cold? These are the questions that occur to me again and again. On our capacity to feed the starving and clothe the naked and generally to serve the masses in the time of their need will depend our capacity to influence the peace whenever it comes. What I have said applies to all parties. Whoever serves the purpose best will survive and have an effective voice.

Q. You think they cannot have a treaty just as they like?

A. I do. The days of secret treaties are gone, I hope. If we behave ourselves, we can have a decisive voice at least so far as we are concerned. But Jawaharlal can explain these things better. I am no student of history or even of contemporary events in the world.

Why Did You Not Divide the House?

Q. Why did you advise the A. I. C. C. members to support the Bardoli resolution, though at one stage you had decided to divide the house? Rajaji's speeches after the A. I. C. C. are against the Bombay resolution, and even expediency dictates that there can be no co-operating with a dying Empire.

A. I am afraid you are 'estopped' from asking the question, if I may use a legal term. But as you have asked the question, and there is nothing to hide, I may answer it. In fact I answered it in my speech before the A. I. C. C., if you listened to it with attention. Well then let me tell you that, though I am old in age, my mind is not decaying. It is ever growing, and the decision not to divide the house indicates my growth or evolution in my own non-violence.

To divide the house appeared to me a piece of violence. If every one of the members of the A. I. C. C. was a pukka believer in political non-violence, it would have been a different matter. But I knew that such was not the case. The Bardoli resolution was a true reflection of the Congress mind. In such matters majority and minority do not count. And there was nothing to prevent the whole-hoggers to go whatever length they liked.

The contingency of co-operation is, if anything, very remote. Until then all have to act in terms of non-violence. When the contingency does arise the whole-hoggers can secede from the Congress. In fact we can then meet again and put the whole matter to vote.

Q. Would it be proper or improper to defend oneself with arms against atayis (confirmed offenders) in case of disturbances?

A. The answer has been already given by me and also by the Congress. And the word atayis is bad for our purpose. And don't ask what is proper and improper. If you were to ask me, I should say it is improper. If you are non-violent, do not have resort to arms. If you cannot muster non-violence of the brave, defend yourself as best you can. The law gives everyone the right of self-defence against a dacoit, and the Congress does not take away the legal right. But in riots or communal disturbances, he who calls himself a Congressman has to act non-violently. That is the resolution of the Congress. Even there if your courage fails you and you use force, the Congress will not censure you, for the simple reason that the Congress never intended to encourage cowardice.

Limits of Co-operation

Q. You are said to have permitted khadi bhandars to sell blankets to Government. Is it not co-operation in the war effort?

A. I did. It was not proper for me to ask whether the blankets were for the use of soldiers or for someone else. The case is different when a man sells fire-arms or swords or poison. The vendor has to inquire how the fire-arms are to be used, and the chemist has to ask for the doctor's certificate. On the other hand a rice-seller will not, and is under no obligation to, inquire who is going to consume the rice.

But you may go further than I did. If you think I erred, you are at liberty to denounce me. If you think a non-violent man may not sell rice or blankets to soldiers, you are welcome to your interpretation of non-violence. I for one will not hesitate to give water or food to a soldier who comes to me with hands red with murder. My humanity would not let me do otherwise.

The question of spurious khadi was next discussed, and Gandhiji said: "A great deal depends on intelligent and wide-awake public opinion. If the public takes it into its mind to prevent the spread of this khadi, it can easily do so. But we have not cultivated what Lord Willingdon used to call the courage to say 'No'. Those who are interested in khadi are all shareholders of the

PRICE CONTROL

One wonders if Government who do not want panic and scares do not often help in creating these. For two or three days after the Japanese radio announced that Rangoon had been bombed the news was left uncontradicted. (I refer to the first news of Rangoon being bombed.) The news might have been contradicted at once and the people might have been told that it was a fair indication of Japan's intention and that they should in case of raids stay indoors and so on. Then there are all kinds of stories that have come from the refugees in Rangoon—one of them being of thousands of people having been killed. The Government might have published a true and accurate account of the happenings.

Then there is the very important matter of price control. The police often swoop down upon a petty trader and haul him up before the authorities. We are told that it is being done to 'teach them a lesson'. We know to our cost what 'teaching them a lesson' means. The Committee of the Indian Chamber of Commerce have, in an important communication addressed to the Government of India, shown what havoc price control is working. The purpose is avowedly to make the necessities of life available to the public at a reasonable price and to prevent profiteering. As pointed out in the Committee's letter, "the effect of the measures which the Government have so far adopted has been largely to defeat the end in view. It has been observed that there is a tendency for measures of price control being followed by scarcity of the article concerned, or even its disappearance from the market, unless proper measures are taken by the Government to safeguard against such scarcity or disturbance. Recently, for instance, since the Government of India fixed the sale prices of wheat, further supplies of the commodity in the Calcutta market have become scarce, and indeed the situation has become so serious that perhaps it would be difficult to obtain wheat in the city after some time unless adequate steps are taken in time to maintain supplies. In the United Kingdom also, last year for instance, immediately after the prices of tomatoes and gooseberries were fixed these fruits disappeared from the market." The same story has been received from other places in India. In one place, we are told, it was impossible to get a seer of wheat for one rupee.

The police action is in most cases indiscriminate, and the Committee have rightly adverted to that aspect of the case also:

"At present what is being done is that whenever it is found that a certain article is not being sold in the market, the police, without going into the causes, take indiscriminate action and arrest a few persons here and there for charging prices higher than the maximum or holding up stocks. Although the Committee do not support the action of those who may be holding up stocks and agree that such practice should be checked, they may point out that such indiscriminate action only tends to dislocate trade, and many small dealers consider it better to discontinue trading in the article concerned rather than carry the risk of being thus maltreated."

Then there is unco-ordinated action by various Provincial Governments.

"For instance, in September last, the Government of U. P. fixed the prices of wheat in the Hapur market without any relation to prices in other centres, and at a level which was low compared to the prices of wheat in other provinces and markets of India, particularly in the Punjab. The result was that, while dealers in other parts of India, e. g. in Calcutta, who had previously contracted for purchases of wheat in the Hapur market at certain rates could not get supplies from the market, large quantities of wheat were attracted to the Punjab markets where the prices were higher."

There are other aspects of the matter into which we need not go. To end the anomalies and hardships pointed out above, the Committee have proposed that, if the price control measures are to succeed,

"(1) The maximum fixed by the Government must bear proper relation to the replacement costs; and

(2) The Government must be prepared to sell the articles concerned at those rates—the prices to be fixed after taking into consideration the total cost of production, transit expenses, availability of raw material, wages and other factors including reasonable profit."

This is an eminently sound proposal, and Government should have no difficulty in giving effect to it. The Committee have made suggestions in this behalf. The Government, they suggest, should, after fixing the maximum prices, establish a few large granaries in different centres of the country and be prepared to sell at that rate any number of bags to customers retail or wholesale. The Government's readiness to sell at a particular price will prevent traders from putting up the prices, as is actually the case with regard to silver.

The proposal should be carefully considered at the Price Control Conference to be held in the first week of February, in consultation with representatives of various trades, and an end should be put to a situation which may soon get out of control.

GO-SEVA SANGH

A Little History

I remember vividly a meeting addressed by Gandhiji during my early days with him. It was in Motihari in 1917 when some good people invited him to visit the local pinjrapol and address a meeting on the occasion of its annual celebration. Some of the sentiments he expressed that day gave those assembled a wholesome shock. They had expected praise from him. Instead they received a hard sermon on the way we had in criminal ignorance neglected the cow instead of protecting her. Ever since he has been dinning into the heads of cow-worshipping Hindus the disasters that lie on the path of their ignorant worship. But we have made little headway. The first cow protection society was formed in 1924 at Belgaum with Gandhiji as president. It then became Go-Seva Sangh, a compact body. It has much solid but unpretentious work to its credit. We had been able to bring into being a tannery of dead cattle's hide, and the Lucknow and Faizpur Exhibitions had courts showing the uses of the remains of dead cattle after they are dead. There was in these exhibitions the tannery section showing how a Brahman family can run a full-fledged tannery in as clean a fashion as it can run a kitchen, and at Faizpur and Haripura there was a dairy court showing eloquently how the cow was one of the most important factors in India's economy, and the ultimately uneconomic nature of the buffalo as compared to that of a good cow. But we are far yet from having been able to draw India's attention to this vital problem, and though the workers in the field met at Faizpur and took some important decisions, they have failed so far in awakening Hindu India's interest in the "only scientific society for effectively protecting the cow" as Gandhiji described the Go-Seva Sangh in 1937.

A definite step forward was taken again when Jamnalalji, who was advised by Gandhiji not to court imprisonment a second time for reasons of health, took the decision last year to devote all his time and energy exclusively to this work. It was at his instance that Gandhiji was encouraged to decide to give the society an all-India character by forming an All India Go-Seva Sangh. Experts in the field like Mr. Kothawala of the Bangalore Dairy, Mr. Sam Higginbottom of the Allahabad Agricultural Institute, Shri Viswanathan of the Agricultural Research Institute, Sir Datar Singh of the Montgomery Dairy Farm, and others were invited to a Conference held for the purpose on the 1st of this month. The venerable Pandit Malaviyaji had also promised to attend, but Gandhiji dissuaded him from undertaking the long journey. Some of the experts who were invited but who could not come sent either their representatives or their suggestions, and the Conference was fully representative in that many who have been working in the field for several years like Shri Chaunde Maharaj of Wai and representatives of about twelve pinjrapoles were also present and took part in the deliberations. Shri Vinoba presided and Gandhiji opened the Conference.

Soul's Outpouring

Although the subject was to Gandhiji as old as the hills he gave it a new setting and delivered a speech as packed with argument as revealing of the agony of his soul.

Many a foreign writer has made fun of the Hindus' religious sentiments about the cow, and in a recent novel England's famous modern novelist Cronin makes a cockney upstart returned to England after a brief stay in India describe his experience thus:

"You might not believe me, Nancy but the cow is a sacred animal to millions of folks out in India. They'll have images of the animal stuck up in all places, and in the streets of the native quarters you'll see great big cows slushing about, with flowers on their horns and garlands of marigolds round their necks, poking their noses everywhere like they owned the place, into the houses and into the stalls, and not a body says 'no' to them. I once saw one of the beasts stop at a stall of fruit and vegetable and before you could say 'knife', it had cleared the place from end to end, and the man what owned the shop was obliged to sit helpless and watch 'it eat up all his stuff, and when it had finished he could do nowt but put up a bit prayer to it or string the remains of his flowers around its big neck."

Gandhiji with biting irony went one better and cast an even more lurid light on the worship of the cow as seen in the streets of Bombay. "We catch her by the tail and sanctify our eyes with its sacred touch. We regard even her urine as sacred and full of medicinal value and drink it. Alas, the poor cow is innocent of all this worship, and so our worship is lost on her. It even scares her. When it scares her she answers our attentions with a kick; when she is not scared she suffers us." He was simply giving in his own language the pathetic picture that Shrimati Perinben Captain, an indefatigable worker of Bombay, had drawn to him of her daily experience in Bhuleshwar, and who on being invited to attend the Conference had declined, saying in effect: "None of this travesty of worship for me. I might attend when you have put it on a rational footing and shown by concrete work that the Hindus really care for the cow. And if you will protect the cow, why not the horse and the dog too — both of them equally noble?"

"All this is too true," he said, "and those who claim to protect the cow betray a criminal ignorance of the real method of protecting her and her progeny. Those who claim to worship the cow cruelly ill-treat the bullocks. Chaunde Maharaj has been working at the problem assiduously for years, but whilst he accepts my facts and even argument, he says, 'what about the public sentiment? they somehow want to save the cow from the butcher.' But they go about the wrong way and succeed in defeating the very object they are trying to achieve. I do not say this in a carping spirit, but shocking ignorance, and want of understanding of the essentials of the problem betrayed by most of the people who run our pinjrapols dismay me."

He referred in passing to the wrong way of protecting the cow from a Mussalman wanting to slaughter her, and said that he would repeat ad nauseam that to quarrel with the Mussalman and to kill him in order to protect the cow was to instigate more slaughter.

The Problem of Ghee

He next referred to the difficulty of procuring pure cow's milk and ghee. "The whole milk and ghee trade is in the hands of the Hindus. But have we been able to ensure a supply of pure milk and ghee? The milk is adulterated, and even the water used for adulteration is not clean. The cruel and criminal process of phooka is well-known. The ghee sold in the market can often be described as poison rather than ghee. The butter we get from New Zealand, Australia or Denmark is guaranteed pure cow's butter, but there is no guarantee about the butter or ghee available here. There is not a shop in Wardha, where some of us are keen on this problem, where one could go and buy a seer of cow's ghee of guaranteed purity."

The Cow and the Buffalo

Every animal—in fact all life—is sacred and should be protected, but unless we really protect the one that was most valuable in national economy, other animals could not be protected. In our neglect of the cow we had brought both the cow and the buffalo at death's door.

"I therefore say," said Gandhiji, "that, if I can really protect the cow by adopting proper ways and means, I would protect the rest of the animals. But it can be done only if we know the true science and economy of it. Only then shall we be able to interest Perinben in the problem. I am amazed at our partiality for buffalo's milk and ghee. Our economics is short-sighted. We look at the immediate gain, but we do not realise that in the last analysis the cow is the more valuable animal. Cow's butter (and ghee) has a naturally yellowish colour which indicates its superiority to buffalo's butter (and ghee) in carotene. It has a flavour all its own. Foreign visitors who come to Sevagram go into raptures over the pure cow's milk they get there. Buffalo's milk and butter are almost unknown in Europe. It is only in India that one finds a prejudice in favour of buffalo's milk and ghee. This has spelt all but extinction of the cow, and that is why I say that, unless we put an exclusive emphasis on the cow, she cannot be saved. It is a tragedy that all the cows and buffaloes put together cannot give us enough milk for the 40 crores of our people. We ought to realise the value of the cow as a good milker and the only source of draught and agricultural cattle. And how far is one to pamper popular prejudices? A cow proves valuable even if she dies, if we would make use of the skin, the bone, the fleshing, the entrails and so on." "But," said Gandhiji, "the good Chaunde Maharaj wonders if people can be persuaded to believe that dead cow's hide is sacred. Why not? I would not hesitate to go into my house with shoes made of dead cow's hide, provided of course the shoes are clean. I should not hesitate to have my meal with such clean shoes on. I have to do all this in order to show that the cow is an asset and not a liability. Today in many places they bury dead cows or sell them away for a song. We despise the Harijans who eat carrion, but we forget that it is for our own fault. If we treated the hide properly, if we knew the manurial value of the fleshing, and the use of the bone and the entrails—which we are demonstrating at Nalwadi—there would be no carrion-eating."

Pinjrapols

He next came to the question of pinjrapols with which almost every town in India is studded, which have plenty of funds, but some of which are grossly mismanaged. "Ever since my return to India from South Africa I have been harping on the question of the reform of pinjrapols. Unless we realise and define their proper functions, they are sure to remain the economic waste they are. Their proper function is to take care of dry, old and disabled cows, of which individual owners cannot possibly take care—certainly not in towns and cities. Their function is not that of a dairy—though they may run a separate dairy if they can—but the care of the old and the disabled animals, and to provide the raw material for a tannery. There should be a well-equipped tannery attached to every pinjrapol. They should maintain the best stud bulls and loan them out for public use, they should provide every facility for the humane and scientific castration of bulls to be turned into bullocks, and they should be instruction centres for the agriculturist and the dairy farmer. Here is plenty of scope for our agricultural and dairy graduates who should receive additional training for the special work and then be attached to every one of our pinjrapols. All the pinjrapols should then be affiliated to our Association which should be the central institution for expert advice, collection and co-ordination of information and statistics, and so on. The Association has made it a rule to have as its members those who take the following pledge:

"I agree with the object and means of the Association.

I promise to use cow's milk and its products exclusively, except for medical purposes or under unavoidable circumstances or in the articles of food containing milk and its products in a negligible quantity. I will refrain from the use of the leather of slaughtered cows, bullocks and calves.

I will donate a sum of rupee one or 2,000 yards of self-spun yarn to the Association every year."

Adverting to this Gandhiji said: "Do not magnify the so-called difficulties and the embarrassment you would cause to your hosts. You can go about with cow's ghee wherever you go—as Kakasaheb does—or you can do without it. It will be good propaganda, and you may succeed in converting your hosts also. But duty is not always easy of performance. To run away from it is the opposite of manliness, opposite of humanity."

HINDI + URDU = HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The following letter was written on the 29th ult. and sent to me by its writer by registered post. It was received at Sevagram on the 31st ult.:

"I was very much impressed by your convocation address at the Benares University. Specially your remarks about making Hindustani the medium of instruction in our educational institutions were very apt on the occasion. But do you really believe that there exists in our country any such language as Hindustani? As a matter of fact there is no such language, and I am afraid that at Benares you advocated the cause of Hindi and not of Hindustani, and that is the way with all the Congressmen. I wonder why you openly don't say what you really mean. Say, you want Hindi. Why call it Hindustani, or still worse Hindi-Hindustani, by which name you wanted to call it some years back and which nobody ever used?

Mahatmaji, you say you have no antipathy towards Urdu; still you openly called it the language of Mussalmans, which is written in the Quranic script. You even said that the Mussalmans may take care of it, if they so please. And on the other hand, you several times presided over the annual sessions of Hindi Sabhas and advocated the cause of Hindi and collected lakhs of rupees for it. Have you ever presided over any meeting held for the propagation of Urdu, or would you agree to preside over one now, and have you ever collected a pie for the advancement of Urdu?

I have heard Congressmen saying, ad nauseam, that the Muslim writers should avoid Persian words and Hindu writers should avoid Sanskrit words, and the resultant language will be Hindustani.

Mahatmaji, you are yourself a very good writer. You must know that practised writers who have developed a style will never be able to avoid Persian or Sanskrit words, if they are part of the language in which they are writing and of which these writers are regarded stylists; so this advice of yours is absolutely impracticable.

But there is a way out. Make both Urdu and Hindi compulsory at least in one province, say U. P., up to the High School standard. By this means, the province in which both the languages are compulsorily taught will have one common language within, say, about fifty years. The language which naturally belongs to us will remain with us, and the other one which we are artificially thrusting upon ourselves will drop out from our lives. It is obvious that when we shall learn both the languages we shall perforce make that one the vehicle of our thoughts which is more developed, more beautiful, more attractive, more concise, and more expressive. Apart from making the path of vernacularisation smooth and easy, this proposal will help a great deal in bridging the wide gulf between the social life of Hindus and Mussalmans. We shall be able to know and sympathise with each other's ideals and beliefs through each other's literature. It is just possible that a new language may evolve out of the mixture of both Hindi and Urdu; then it may be called Hindustani. It will be a natural language when it comes out of the knowledge of both.

Mahatmaji, if you sincerely wish that our country should have one common language, I am sure that you will accept this proposal and will recommend it to the country. But I am sure you will do no such thing. Because you are all along advocating the cause of Hindi and are doing your best to thrust it upon the country. And you must also be knowing that, if both Hindi and Urdu are made compulsory, Urdu will push Hindi out of the field, because Urdu is more chaste, more civilised, more expressive, and more beautiful than Hindi. But my proposal gives equal chances to both the languages. If you believe that Hindi is the natural language of the country, you may confidently hope that it will push off Urdu. There is no use taking shelter under the excuse that you have no power to make both the languages compulsory, as you wrote to me last year. If you only care to recommend the proposal to the country, it will have its effect."

The writer has signed the letter, but as it is marked personal I refrain from giving his name. In any case the name does not matter. What the writer says is, I know, the belief held by many Muslims. My repudiation has not undone the mischief.

But my article, which was written on the 23rd ult. and has appeared in Harijan of the 1st inst., should soothe the writer so far as I am concerned.

I entirely agree with my correspondent that all who want one all-India speech should today learn both the forms—Hindi and Urdu. Those who do will ultimately give us a common language. That form which is more popular and more understood by the masses whether Hindu or Muslim will surely be the all-India speech. But if my proposal finds general acceptance, the language question will cease to be a political issue or a bone of contention.

I do not subscribe to the correspondent's statement that Urdu is "more developed, more beautiful, more attractive, more concise, and more expressive". No language is intrinsically all that the correspondent says. A language becomes what its speakers and writers make it. English had no merit apart from what Englishmen made it. In other words, a language is a human creation and takes the colour of its creators. Every language is capable of infinite expansion. Modern Bengali is what Bankim and Rabindra Nath have made it. If, therefore, it is true that Urdu is more everything than Hindi, it is because its creators are abler than those of Hindi. I can give no opinion, for I have not studied either as a linguist. I know just enough of both for my public work.

But is Urdu a language distinct from Hindi as, say, Bengali is from Marathi? Is not Urdu a direct descendant of Hindi, written in the Persian character with a tendency to borrow new words from Persian and Arabic rather than Sanskrit? If there was no estrangement between the two communities, such a phenomenon would have been welcomed. And when the animosities have died out, as they will one day, our descendants will laugh at our quarrels and will be proud of the common Hindustani speech which will be a mixture of words indifferently borrowed from many languages according to the tastes and equipment of its multitude of writers and speakers.

Let me correct one misimpression of my correspondent. He seems to think that Hindustani will finally displace all the provincial languages. That is neither my dream nor of those who have been thinking of an all-India speech. Their dream is that Hindustani should displace English which has almost become a common medium of communication between the educated classes, resulting in a gulf being created between them and the masses. The tragedy can be prevented only if the common speech spoken by the largest number of India's inhabitants is adopted as the interprovincial speech. The fight, therefore, is not between Hindi and Urdu, but between the two on the one hand and English on the other. The result is a foregone conclusion in spite of the heavy handicap that the sisters are labouring under, not to speak of the temporary mutual quarrel.

My correspondent quarrels with my connection with the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. I am proud of my connection with that body. It has a record of which it has no reason to be ashamed. The name Hindi was common to both the communities. Both have written in Hindi and promoted its growth. Evidently my correspondent is ignorant of what my connection with that body has meant. It was under my instigation that it wisely, and shall I say patriotically and generously, adopted the definition of Hindi to cover Urdu. He asks whether I ever joined an Urdu Anjuman. I have never been seriously asked to join any. If I was, I would have made a stipulation with my inviters similar to the one I made with those who induced me to preside at the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. I would have asked the Urdu-speaking inviters to let me ask the audience to define Urdu so as to include Hindi speech written in Devanagari script. No such luck came my way.

But now, as I have already hinted in my article of the 1st inst. already referred to, I would like to form an Association advocating the learning of both forms of speech and both the scripts by its members and carrying on propaganda to that end in the hope finally of a natural fusion of the two becoming a common interprovincial speech called Hindustani. Then the equation would be not Hindustani = Hindi + Urdu, but Hindustani = Hindi = Urdu.

A. I. S. A., and it is their duty to take up this work. To feed the hungry and clothe the naked is our immediate programme, and you have all to lend a hand effectively. If you all do so, the question of spurious khadi will not arise. No Congressman can deal in spurious khadi."

The last question was about the Congressmen's duty in times of raids and scares and consequent disturbances.

"The emergency is there today," said Gandhiji. "Dacoities are rampant, and unless the Congress asserts itself effectively the situation will go out of our hands. The need for peace brigades was never more urgent than now. The risk of death is there, whether you choose violence or non-violence. Why not then prepare yourselves to die non-violently? It will also enable you to offer effective resistance in case of a civil war. As for the protection of the wounded in air raids, the bulk of the work will come upon yourselves. You will not join the A. R. P., simply because you will be then parts of a machine over which you have no control and you would be active participants in the war effort. But it is certain that the Government will not be able to render assistance everywhere. Did they do so in Rangoon? We have harrowing tales of dead and wounded lying on the streets of Rangoon uncared for. Wherever, therefore, the authorities fail there will be enough scope of work for us. We have to prepare volunteers for this work ready to take risks and to act with initiative. We may have to remove the dead and wounded, take charge of vacant houses, and so on. In this work you will heartily co-operate with the authorities wherever they will accept your co-operation."

To Correspondents

Correspondents will please note that I neither open nor read all the correspondence that comes to me. And now that I have taken up the care of the three weeklies, the fewest possible letters are put before me, and even those I often do not get the time to read. Correspondents should regard the weeklies as my public letter to them. Therefore they may not as a rule expect personal replies. Many apply for admission to the Sevagram Ashram. For one thing there is hardly room for further admissions. Some insist on replies in my own hand. It is not possible to satisfy this desire, much as I should like to. I would therefore request all correspondents to spare me and my overworked assistants as much as possible.

Some Features and Comments

Gandhiji in his address to the teachers and the students of the Kashi Vishwavidyalaya referred to what he would like the University to make a distinctive feature of its own. But apart from it there are in the University some special features which attract students to it from far and near. Gandhiji referred to the Engineering and the Technological departments. There are similarly the College of Oriental Learning and the College of Theology as also the Ayurvedic College. It has on its staff some of the most distinguished men in India in the sphere of Mathematics and Physics and some distinguished Orientalists, some who have to their credit text-books on subjects like Geology, and some like Prof. Atreya who is the author of many books both in English and Hindi on philosophy and religion. The departments of Oriental Learning and Ayurveda and the Institute of Agricultural Research have plenty of scope for research, though one does not know if much work has been done in that direction. The College of Theology ought not to rest content with giving degrees of Smriti Ratna, Smriti Sagar, and so on, but these degree-holders should make critical studies of our shastras and produce works of textual and higher criticism as has been done in the case of the Bible by numerous English and European scholars.

The University has besides spacious playgrounds, a well-equipped gymnasium in the Shivaji Hall, and it organises swimming and boat club activities too. In this connection I am tempted to make an observation. A university with 4,000 students has an almost unlimited scope in the direction of organising volunteer work both for the management of big meetings and shows and for the work of communal unity, as I shall presently show. This work, I am sorry to say, was conspicuous by its absence on the day the Convocation was held. It was a tough business to lead Pandit Malaviyaji and Gandhiji on to the dais that afternoon of the 21st. If there was proper organisation, there should have been a clear way prepared for the old leaders to walk to the dais unmolested by the crowds. There was not only no way, but scores of photographers from among the volunteers themselves made a scramble for their darshan and for catching snapshots of them. For a while I wondered whether we were not taking a grave risk in carrying old leaders like Panditji through these unmanageable crowds. And when after very great difficulty they were carried on to the dais a sort of pandemonium prevailed for quite a long time. It was a sad reflection on our education, learning and culture, and it must have been far from pleasant to Dr. Radhakrishnan to appeal to the audience to be quiet in the name of self-respect and dignity, and in the name of honoured guests like Gandhiji, Jawaharlalji and Rajendrababu. Sports and playing grounds and gymnasias are no use, if they cannot teach us the very elements of arranging and organising meetings, no matter how vast.

I have mentioned communal unity. If these four thousand students were to be taught non-violent military drill and to march like soldiers going to the front, they could form a unique peace brigade. A thousand students, nay even a hundred students, clad in khadi uniform can march peacefully to scenes of rioting, and can by daring and courage to go through some amount of suffering successfully quell a riot. If they were to devote a little thought to this, I am sure the students can be the best organisers of communal unity. That, however, is a far cry. Would they organise themselves as spinners? An hourly spinning would be a good preparation for the volunteer-work for communal unity.

Commendable Features

The University has a branch of the Gandhi Ashram Khadi Bhandar, which is managed by the Benares Gandhi Ashram, and under its auspices is a spinning centre too. There is also a Servants Credit Society and a Co-operative Store, both of which are, I hope, running well. I say 'I hope', as I have had no opportunity of going into their working, but they are commendable features in themselves.

But perhaps the most commendable of all are the Students Sevak Mandal, Vidyarthi Sabhayak Sabha, and the Students' Self-Help Circle run by Profs. Asrani and Mukut Behari Lal. The Students' Self-Help Circle deserves special notice. It provides work for poor students, e. g. tuition, photography, typewriting, selling milk, ghee, newspapers, stationery, carrying and painting and polishing furniture, whitewashing houses, gardening, boot polishing and so on. Diligent students earn up to Rs. 15 per month by doing these jobs. Pandit Ram Naresh Tripathi tells the story of an M. A. student who met him one early morning going with pails of milk on his cycle. He has three brothers of his also in the University. Their father earns only Rs. 35 per month and cannot possibly find the wherewithal to educate the sons. The sons are, therefore, running a small dairy and selling milk and ghee. A hundred such students are thus finding the expenses of their education through self-help. Prof. Asrani is keenly interested in spinning and cottage industries, and his energetic work in all these directions is worthy of praise. He had collected a little purse for Gandhiji for constructive work, and he also presented Gandhiji with a chudder made out of yarn of the boys' own spinning.

A word, too, about Prof. Satish Kalelkar and his band of students who slaved for us day and night at our camp. Acharya Kripalani, seeing that most of these students were Gujaratis, twitted him with having chosen only Gujarati students for service in Gandhiji's camp. The fault, if fault it was, was Sir Radhakrishnan's who insisted on Gandhiji being served and looked after by those who knew Gandhiji best. And young Satish, who is fast getting popular among the boys, but who is still fresh in the University, selected the boys he knew best. Otherwise being the son of a distinguished father like Kakasaheb Kalelkar he is, I know free from any trace of provincialism, not to say communalism. He has a bright future in front of him, and he could not do better than devote his spare time to organising students in the directions I have indicated in these notes.

Watertight?

Our stay at the University was all too brief for anything like a study of things there, and what I say in this paragraph is subject to correction. The Women's College is a self-contained one walled off from the other buildings. It has its own staff, though I understand that ladies who go in for science have to attend the science classes along with men students. If that is the case, I do not know what objection there should be to lady students having the benefit of lectures in other subjects by men professors. On the other hand, there may be a distinguished lady professor whose lectures men students may well profit by. There seems to me to be no reason for watertight compartments so far as teaching is concerned.

But I would go a little further. There are the weekly Gita classes. I do not know if lady students are allowed to attend them. If not, they should be. On the second day of our stay Gandhiji received a message from the Women's College that he should not go away without giving the lady students at least a few minutes of his time. He readily agreed, and seeing the beautiful maidan in front of the College, he felt like having the evening prayer there. The students hailed the proposal with delight. Prof. Asrani, who was to present the students' purse and the chudder at prayer time, was also invited to be present there with his students. And for the first time perhaps the lady students and men students had prayers together. At the request of the lady students themselves Gandhiji agreed to listening to a recitation from the Gita by some of them, after the end of the prayer. They recited verses 36 to 46 from the Eleventh Discourse of the Gita. The selection seemed to me to be most appropriate. They could not have thought of a fitter offering of welcome, and it did one's heart good to think that at least some—if not indeed all—students in the Women's College know the Bhagavadgita. I felt that they should have more opportunities for cultural contact with the outside world and always opportunities of listening to an occasional sermon from the venerable Panditji, Dr. Radhakrishnan and others and all leaders who are invited as guests.

Talks with Congress Workers

Pandit Jawaharlal had arranged two meetings of Congress workers for an informal exchange of views with Gandhiji. At one meeting there were the members of the U. P. Provincial Congress Committee Executive, and at the other there were members of the larger Committee. A number of questions were asked—some wise and some otherwise, which provided a lot of merriment to Gandhiji no less than to the audience, who had the opportunity of observing Gandhiji's humour at its best which contributes a good deal to keep him alive and healthy.

Principles and Objective

Q. What is your ultimate object? Do you want the Congress to accept your principles or to achieve its object?

A. Every plan and programme that I have placed before the Congress has been placed with a view to achieving the goal of Independence. Truth and non-violence are a matter of creed for me—you may call it my religion, but it has not been my object to propagate that religion through the Congress. Before the Congress they have been placed as effective means to an end—as political means for a political objective, as I did in South Africa. If it was otherwise, I should cease to be a political worker and occupy the position of a dharmaguru! The political method can be changed whenever expedient, but the change should be honest and deliberate. But one should not pretend to adhere to the method when really in practice one has given it up. That would be deceiving oneself and the world.

Future Programme

Q. We should like to have a glimpse of the next six months or a year as you picture it to yourself. You have often said that this is a fight to the finish, your last fight which will not end until the goal is won. What are likely to be the future developments as you can visualise them?

A. It is a good question, and also a difficult question. Not that I am not clear, but because it takes us into the realm of speculation. I let things and happenings react on me—though I confess I do not follow everything as Jawaharlal with his study of foreign affairs can. Jawaharlal is convinced that the British Empire is finished. We all wish that it may be finished, but I do not think it is finished. We know that the Britishers are tough fighters, we know what the Empire—especially India—means to every home in Britain, and therefore they will never consent to be 'Little Englanders'. Mr. Churchill has said that they are not 'sugar candies', and that they can meet rough with rough. Therefore it will be long before the Empire is finished. There is no doubt, however, that they are nearing the end, and what Jawaharlal has said is very true that, if we could do nothing to prevent the war, we certainly will do much to prevent a peace in which we have no voice. That is what every Congressman has to bear in mind. We have, therefore, to be up and doing. If we sit with folded hands, we may have a peace which we do not desire.

I adhere to the statement that it is my final fight, but we have had to alter our programme because of the latest developments, because war has come to our door. The suspension had nothing to do with my retirement from the official leadership of the Congress. Even if it had continued, how could I today ask Jawaharlal to march back to jail? Of course he will be in jail, if he is prevented from doing the work we have chalked out. But things have happened so rapidly that we had not the slightest idea of what was coming. How then can I talk of a year or even six months ahead? That we are marching swiftly towards Independence I have no doubt. There is no doubt about the programme ahead of us. No Congressman should rest content with just paying his four anna fee. He has to be active all the twentyfour hours. Even the one concrete programme of production of cloth is sufficient to occupy all our energies. There are 400 students in the Benares Hindu University. Will they spin an hour every day? I am talking of spinning because it is a thing nearest my heart, but there are a hundred and one other things. Have the villagers enough food to eat? Have they enough to cover themselves in this bitter cold? These are the questions that occur to me again and again. On our capacity to feed the starving and clothe the naked and generally to serve the masses in the time of their need will depend our capacity to influence the peace whenever it comes. What I have said applies to all parties. Whoever serves the purpose best will survive and have an effective voice.

Q. You think they cannot have a treaty just as they like?

A. I do. The days of secret treaties are gone, I hope. If we behave ourselves, we can have a decisive voice at least so far as we are concerned. But Jawaharlal can explain these things better. I am no student of history or even of contemporary events in the world.

Why Did You Not Divide the House?

Q. Why did you advise the A. I. C. C. members to support the Bardoli resolution, though at one stage you had decided to divide the house? Rajaji's speeches after the A. I. C. C. are against the Bombay resolution, and even expediency dictates that there can be no co-operating with a dying Empire.

A. I am afraid you are 'estopped' from asking the question, if I may use a legal term. But as you have asked the question, and there is nothing to hide, I may answer it. In fact I answered it in my speech before the A. I. C. C., if you listened to it with attention. Well then let me tell you that, though I am old in age, my mind is not decaying. It is ever growing, and the decision not to divide the house indicates my growth or evolution in my own non-violence.

To divide the house appeared to me a piece of violence. If every one of the members of the A. I. C. C. was a pukka believer in political non-violence, it would have been a different matter. But I knew that such was not the case. The Bardoli resolution was a true reflection of the Congress mind. In such matters majority and minority do not count. And there was nothing to prevent the whole-hoggers to go whatever length they liked.

The contingency of co-operation is, if anything, very remote. Until then all have to act in terms of non-violence. When the contingency does arise the whole-hoggers can secede from the Congress. In fact we can then meet again and put the whole matter to vote.

Q. Would it be proper or improper to defend oneself with arms against *atayat*is (confirmed offenders) in case of disturbances?

A. The answer has been already given by me and also by the Congress. And the word atayati is bad for our purpose. And don't ask what is proper and improper. If you were to ask me, I should say it is improper. If you are non-violent, do not have resort to arms. If you cannot muster non-violence of the brave, defend yourself as best you can. The law gives everyone the right of self-defence against a dacoit, and the Congress does not take away the legal right. But in riots or communal disturbances, he who calls himself a Congressman has to act non-violently. That is the resolution of the Congress. Even there if your courage fails you and you use force, the Congress will not censure you, for the simple reason that the Congress never intended to encourage cowardice.

Limits of Co-operation

Q. You are said to have permitted khadi bhandars to sell blankets to Government. Is it not co-operation in the war effort?

A. I did. It was not proper for me to ask whether the blankets were for the use of soldiers or for someone else. The case is different when a man sells fire-arms or swords or poison. The vendor has to inquire how the fire-arms are to be used, and the chemist has to ask for the doctor's certificate. On the other hand a rice-seller will not, and is under no obligation to, inquire who is going to consume the rice.

But you may go further than I did. If you think I erred, you are at liberty to denounce me. If you think a non-violent man may not sell rice or blankets to soldiers, you are welcome to your interpretation of non-violence. I for one will not hesitate to give water or food to a soldier who comes to me with hands red with murder. My humanity would not let me do otherwise.

The question of spurious khadi was next discussed, and Gandhiji said: "A great deal depends on intelligent and wide-awake public opinion. If the public takes it into its mind to prevent the spread of this khadi, it can easily do so. But we have not cultivated what Lord Willingdon used to call the courage to say 'No'. Those who are interested in khadi are all shareholders of the

One wonders if Government who do not want panic and scares do not often help in creating these. For two or three days after the Japanese radio announced that Rangoon had been bombed the news was left uncontradicted. (I refer to the first news of Rangoon being bombed.) The news might have been contradicted at once and the people might have been told that it was a fair indication of Japan's intention and that they should in case of raids stay indoors and so on. Then there are all kinds of stories that have come from the refugees in Rangoon—one of them being of thousands of people having been killed. The Government might have published a true and accurate account of the happenings.

Then there is the very important matter of price control. The police often swoop down upon a petty trader and haul him up before the authorities. We are told that it is being done to 'teach them a lesson'. We know to our cost what 'teaching them a lesson' means. The Committee of the Indian Chamber of Commerce have, in an important communication addressed to the Government of India, shown what havoc price control is working. The purpose is avowedly to make the necessities of life available to the public at a reasonable price and to prevent profiteering. As pointed out in the Committee's letter, "the effect of the measures which the Government have so far adopted has been largely to defeat the end in view. It has been observed that there is a tendency for measures of price control being followed by scarcity of the article concerned, or even its disappearance from the market, unless proper measures are taken by the Government to safeguard against such scarcity or disturbance. Recently, for instance, since the Government of India fixed the sale prices of wheat, further supplies of the commodity in the Calcutta market have become scarce, and indeed the situation has become so serious that perhaps it would be difficult to obtain wheat in the city after some time unless adequate steps are taken in time to maintain supplies. In the United Kingdom also, last year for instance, immediately after the prices of tomatoes and gooseberries were fixed these fruits disappeared from the market." The same story has been received from other places in India. In one place, we are told, it was impossible to get a seer of wheat for one rupee.

The police action is in most cases indiscriminate, and the Committee have rightly adverted to that aspect of the case also:

"At present what is being done is that whenever it is found that a certain article is not being sold in the market, the police, without going into the causes, take indiscriminate action and arrest a few persons here and there for charging prices higher than the maximum or holding up stocks. Although the Committee do not support the action of those who may be holding up stocks and agree that such practice should be checked, they may point out that such indiscriminate action only tends to dislocate trade, and many small dealers consider it better to discontinue trading in the article concerned rather than carry the risk of being thus maltreated."

Then there is unco-ordinated action by various Provincial Governments.

"For instance, in September last, the Government of U. P. fixed the prices of wheat in the Hapur market without any relation to prices in other centres, and at a level which was low compared to the prices of wheat in other provinces and markets of India, particularly in the Punjab. The result was that, while dealers in other parts of India, e. g. in Calcutta, who had previously contracted for purchases of wheat in the Hapur market at certain rates could not get supplies from the market, large quantities of wheat were attracted to the Punjab markets where the prices were higher."

There are other aspects of the matter into which we need not go. To end the anomalies and hardships pointed out above, the Committee have proposed that, if the price control measures are to succeed,

"(1) The maximum fixed by the Government must bear proper relation to the replacement costs; and

(2) The Government must be prepared to sell the articles concerned at those rates—the prices to be fixed after taking into consideration the total cost of production, transit expenses, availability of raw material, wages and other factors including reasonable profit."

This is an eminently sound proposal, and Government should have no difficulty in giving effect to it. The Committee have made suggestions in this behalf. The Government, they suggest, should, after fixing the maximum prices, establish a few large granaries in different centres of the country and be prepared to sell at that rate any number of bags to customers retail or wholesale. The Government's readiness to sell at a particular price will prevent traders from putting up the prices, as is actually the case with regard to silver.

The proposal should be carefully considered at the Price Control Conference to be held in the first week of February, in consultation with representatives of various trades, and an end should be put to a situation which may soon get out of control.

GO-SEVA SANGH

A Little History

I remember vividly a meeting addressed by Gandhiji during my early days with him. It was in Motihari in 1917 when some good people invited him to visit the local pinjrapol and address a meeting on the occasion of its annual celebration. Some of the sentiments he expressed that day gave those assembled a wholesome shock. They had expected praise from him. Instead they received a hard sermon on the way we had in criminal ignorance neglected the cow instead of protecting her. Ever since he has been dinning into the heads of cow-worshipping Hindus the disasters that lie on the path of their ignorant worship. But we have made little headway. The first cow protection society was formed in 1924 at Belgaum with Gandhiji as president. It then became Go-Seva Sangh, a compact body. It has much solid but unpretentious work to its credit. We had been able to bring into being a tannery of dead cattle's hide, and the Lucknow and Faizpur Exhibitions had courts showing the uses of the remains of dead cattle after they are dead. There was in these exhibitions the tannery section showing how a Brahman family can run a full-fledged tannery in as clean a fashion as it can run a kitchen, and at Faizpur and Haripura there was a dairy court showing eloquently how the cow was one of the most important factors in India's economy, and the ultimately uneconomic nature of the buffalo as compared to that of a good cow. But we are far yet from having been able to draw India's attention to this vital problem, and though the workers in the field met at Faizpur and took some important decisions, they have failed so far in awakening Hindu India's interest in the "only scientific society for effectively protecting the cow" as Gandhiji described the Go-Seva Sangh in 1937.

A definite step forward was taken again when Jamnalalji, who was advised by Gandhiji not to court imprisonment a second time for reasons of health, took the decision last year to devote all his time and energy exclusively to this work. It was at his instance that Gandhiji was encouraged to decide to give the society an all-India character by forming an All India Go-Seva Sangh. Experts in the field like Mr. Kothawala of the Bangalore Dairy, Mr. Sam Higginbottom of the Allahabad Agricultural Institute, Shri Viswanathan of the Agricultural Research Institute, Sir Datar Singh of the Montgomery Dairy Farm, and others were invited to a Conference held for the purpose on the 1st of this month. The venerable Pandit Malaviyaji had also promised to attend, but Gandhiji dissuaded him from undertaking the long journey. Some of the experts who were invited but who could not come sent either their representatives or their suggestions, and the Conference was fully representative in that many who have been working in the field for several years like Shri Chaunde Maharaj of Wai and representatives of about twelve pinjrapols were also present and took part in the deliberations. Shri Vinoba presided and Gandhiji opened the Conference.

Soul's Outpouring

Although the subject was to Gandhiji as old as the hills he gave it a new setting and delivered a speech as packed with argument as revealing of the agony of his soul.

Many a foreign writer has made fun of the Hindus' religious sentiments about the cow, and in a recent novel England's famous modern novelist Cronin makes a cockney upstart returned to England after a brief stay in India describe his experience thus:

"You might not believe me, Nancy, but the cow is a sacred animal to millions of folks out in India. They'll have images of the animal stuck up in all places, and in the streets of the native quarters you'll see great big cows slushing about, with flowers on their horns and garlands of marigolds round their necks, poking their noses everywhere like they owned the place, into the houses and into the stalls, and not a body says 'no' to them. I once saw one of the beasts stop at a stall of fruit and vegetable and before you could say 'knife', it had cleared the place from end to end, and the man what owned the shop was obliged to sit helpless and watch 'it eat up all his stuff, and when it had finished he could do nowt but put up a bit prayer to it or string the remains of his flowers around its big neck."

Gandhiji with biting irony went one better and cast an even more lurid light on the worship of the cow as seen in the streets of Bombay. "We catch her by the tail and sanctify our eyes with its sacred touch. We regard even her urine as sacred and full of medicinal value and drink it. Alas, the poor cow is innocent of all this worship, and so our worship is lost on her. It even scares her. When it scares her she answers our attentions with a kick; when she is not scared she suffers us." He was simply giving in his own language the pathetic picture that Shrimati Perinben Captain, an indefatigable worker of Bombay, had drawn to him of her daily experience in Bhuleshwar, and who on being invited to attend the Conference had declined, saying in effect: "None of this travesty of worship for me. I might attend when you have put it on a rational footing and shown by concrete work that the Hindus really care for the cow. And if you will protect the cow, why not the horse and the dog too—both of them equally noble?"

"All this is too true," he said, "and those who claim to protect the cow betray a criminal ignorance of the real method of protecting her and her progeny. Those who claim to worship the cow cruelly ill-treat the bullocks. Chaunde Maharaj has been working at the problem assiduously for years, but whilst he accepts my facts and even argument, he says, 'what about the public sentiment? they somehow want to save the cow from the butcher.' But they go about the wrong way and succeed in defeating the very object they are trying to achieve. I do not say this in a carping spirit, but shocking ignorance, and want of understanding of the essentials of the problem betrayed by most of the people who run our pinjrapols dismay me."

He referred in passing to the wrong way of protecting the cow from a Mussalman wanting to slaughter her, and said that he would repeat ad nauseam that to quarrel with the Mussalman and to kill him in order to protect the cow was to instigate more slaughter.

The Problem of Ghee

He next referred to the difficulty of procuring pure cow's milk and ghee. "The whole milk and ghee trade is in the hands of the Hindus. But have we been able to ensure a supply of pure milk and ghee? The milk is adulterated, and even the water used for adulteration is not clean. The cruel and criminal process of phooka is well-known. The ghee sold in the market can often be described as poison rather than ghee. The butter we get from New Zealand, Australia or Denmark is guaranteed pure cow's butter, but there is no guarantee about the butter or ghee available here. There is not a shop in Wardha, where some of us are keen on this problem, where one could go and buy a seer of cow's ghee of guaranteed purity."

The Cow and the Buffalo

Every animal — in fact all life — is sacred and should be protected, but unless we really protect the one that was most valuable in national economy, other animals could not be protected. In our neglect of the cow we had brought both the cow and the buffalo at death's door.

"I therefore say," said Gandhiji, "that, if I can really protect the cow by adopting proper ways and means, I would protect the rest of the animals. But it can be done only if we know the true science and economy of it. Only then shall we be able to interest Perinben in the problem. I am amazed at our partiality for buffalo's milk and ghee. Our economics is short-sighted. We look at the immediate gain, but we do not realise that in the last analysis the cow is the more valuable animal. Cow's butter (and ghee) has a naturally yellowish colour which indicates its superiority to buffalo's butter (and ghee) in carotene. It has a flavour all its own. Foreign visitors who come to Sevagram go into raptures over the pure cow's milk they get there. Buffalo's milk and butter are almost unknown in Europe. It is only in India that one finds a prejudice in favour of buffalo's milk and ghee. This has spelt all but extinction of the cow, and that is why I say that, unless we put an exclusive emphasis on the cow, she cannot be saved. It is a tragedy that all the cows and buffaloes put together cannot give us enough milk for the 40 crores of our people. We ought to realise the value of the cow as a good milker and the only source of draught and agricultural cattle. And how far is one to pamper popular prejudices? A cow proves valuable even if she dies, if we would make use of the skin, the bone, the fleshing, the entrails and so on." "But," said Gandhiji, "the good Chaunde Maharaj wonders if people can be persuaded to believe that dead cow's hide is sacred. Why not? I would not hesitate to go into my house with shoes made of dead cow's hide, provided of course the shoes are clean. I should not hesitate to have my meal with such clean shoes on. I have to do all this in order to show that the cow is an asset and not a liability. Today in many places they bury dead cows or sell them away for a song. We despise the Harijans who eat carrion, but we forget that it is for our own fault. If we treated the hide properly, if we knew the manurial value of the fleshing, and the use of the bone and the entrails — which we are demonstrating at Nalwadi — there would be no carrion-eating."

Pinjrapols

He next came to the question of pinjrapols with which almost every town in India is studded, which have plenty of funds, but some of which are grossly mismanaged. "Ever since my return to India from South Africa I have been harping on the question of the reform of pinjrapols. Unless we realise and define their proper functions, they are sure to remain the economic waste they are. Their proper function is to take care of dry, old and disabled cows, of which individual owners cannot possibly take care — certainly not in towns and cities. Their function is not that of a dairy — though they may run a separate dairy if they can — but the care of the old and the disabled animals, and to provide the raw material for a tannery. There should be a well-equipped tannery attached to every pinjrapol. They should maintain the best stud bulls and loan them out for public use, they should provide every facility for the humane and scientific castration of bulls to be turned into bullocks, and they should be instruction centres for the agriculturist and the dairy farmer. Here is plenty of scope for our agricultural and dairy graduates who should receive additional training for the special work and then be attached to every one of our pinjrapols. All the pinjrapols should then be affiliated to our Association which should be the central institution for expert advice, collection and co-ordination of information and statistics, and so on. The Association has made it a rule to have as its members those who take the following pledge:

"I agree with the object and means of the Association.

I promise to use cow's milk and its products exclusively, except for medical purposes or under unavoidable circumstances or in the articles of food containing milk and its products in a negligible quantity. I will refrain from the use of the leather of slaughtered cows, bullocks and calves.

I will donate a sum of rupee one or 2,000 yards of self-spun yarn to the Association every year."

Adverting to this Gandhiji said: "Do not magnify the so-called difficulties and the embarrassment you would cause to your hosts. You can go about with cow's ghee wherever you go — as Kakasaheb does — or you can do without it. It will be good propaganda, and you may succeed in converting your hosts also. But duty is not always easy of performance. To run away from it is the opposite of manliness, opposite of humanity."

HINDI + URDU = HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The following letter was written on the 29th ult. and sent to me by its writer by registered post. It was received at Sevagram on the 31st ult.:

"I was very much impressed by your convocation address at the Benares University. Specially your remarks about making Hindustani the medium of instruction in our educational institutions were very apt on the occasion. But do you really believe that there exists in our country any such language as Hindustani? As a matter of fact there is no such language, and I am afraid that at Benares you advocated the cause of Hindi and not of Hindustani, and that is the way with all the Congressmen. I wonder why you openly don't say what you really mean. Say, you want Hindi. Why call it Hindustani, or still worse Hindi-Hindustani, by which name you wanted to call it some years back and which nobody ever used?

Mahatmaji, you say you have no antipathy towards Urdu; still you openly called it the language of Mussalmans, which is written in the Quranic script. You even said that the Mussalmans may take care of it, if they so please. And on the other hand, you several times presided over the annual sessions of Hindi Sabhas and advocated the cause of Hindi and collected lakhs of rupees for it. Have you ever presided over any meeting held for the propagation of Urdu, or would you agree to preside over one now, and have you ever collected a pie for the advancement of Urdu?

I have heard Congressmen saying, ad nauseam, that the Muslim writers should avoid Persian words and Hindu writers should avoid Sanskrit words, and the resultant language will be Hindustani.

Mahatmaji, you are yourself a very good writer. You must know that practised writers who have developed a style will never be able to avoid Persian or Sanskrit words, if they are part of the language in which they are writing and of which these writers are regarded stylists; so this advice of yours is absolutely impracticable.

But there is a way out. Make both Urdu and Hindi compulsory at least in one province, say U. P., up to the High School standard. By this means, the province in which both the languages are compulsorily taught will have one common language within, say, about fifty years. The language which naturally belongs to us will remain with us, and the other one which we are artificially thrusting upon ourselves will drop out from our lives. It is obvious that when we shall learn both the languages we shall perforce make that one the vehicle of our thoughts which is more developed, more beautiful, more attractive, more concise, and more expressive. Apart from making the path of vernacularisation smooth and easy, this proposal will help a great deal in bridging the wide gulf between the social life of Hindus and Mussalmans. We shall be able to know and sympathise with each other's ideals and beliefs through each other's literature. It is just possible that a new language may evolve out of the mixture of both Hindi and Urdu; then it may be called Hindustani. It will be a natural language when it comes out of the knowledge of both.

Mahatmaji, if you sincerely wish that our country should have one common language, I am sure that you will accept this proposal and will recommend it to the country. But I am sure you will do no such thing. Because you are all along advocating the cause of Hindi and are doing your best to thrust it upon the country. And you must also be knowing that, if both Hindi and Urdu are made compulsory, Urdu will push Hindi out of the field, because Urdu is more chaste, more civilised, more expressive, and more beautiful than Hindi. But my proposal gives equal chances to both the languages. If you believe that Hindi is the natural language of the country, you may confidently hope that it will push off Urdu. There is no use taking shelter under the excuse that you have no power to make both the languages compulsory, as you wrote to me last year. If you only care to recommend the proposal to the country, it will have its effect."

The writer has signed the letter, but as it is marked personal I refrain from giving his name. In any case the name does not matter. What the writer says is, I know, the belief held by many Muslims. My repudiation has not undone the mischief.

But my article, which was written on the 23rd ult. and has appeared in Harijan of the 1st inst., should soothe the writer so far as I am concerned.

I entirely agree with my correspondent that all who want one all-India speech should today learn both the forms—Hindi and Urdu. Those who do will ultimately give us a common language. That form which is more popular and more understood by the masses whether Hindu or Muslim will surely be the all-India speech. But if my proposal finds general acceptance, the language question will cease to be a political issue or a bone of contention.

I do not subscribe to the correspondent's statement that Urdu is "more developed, more beautiful, more attractive, more concise, and more expressive". No language is intrinsically all that the correspondent says. A language becomes what its speakers and writers make it. English had no merit apart from what Englishmen made it. In other words, a language is a human creation and takes the colour of its creators. Every language is capable of infinite expansion. Modern Bengali is what Bankim and Rabindra Nath have made it. If, therefore, it is true that Urdu is more everything than Hindi, it is because its creators are abler than those of Hindi. I can give no opinion, for I have not studied either as a linguist. I know just enough of both for my public work.

But is Urdu a language distinct from Hindi as, say, Bengali is from Marathi? Is not Urdu a direct descendant of Hindi, written in the Persian character with a tendency to borrow new words from Persian and Arabic rather than Sanskrit? If there was no estrangement between the two communities, such a phenomenon would have been welcomed. And when the animosities have died out, as they will one day, our descendants will laugh at our quarrels and will be proud of the common Hindustani speech which will be a mixture of words indifferently borrowed from many languages according to the tastes and equipment of its multitude of writers and speakers.

Let me correct one misimpression of my correspondent. He seems to think that Hindustani will finally displace all the provincial languages. That is neither my dream nor of those who have been thinking of an all-India speech. Their dream is that Hindustani should displace English which has almost become a common medium of communication between the educated classes resulting in a gulf being created between them and the masses. The tragedy can be prevented only if the common speech spoken by the largest number of India's inhabitants is adopted as the interprovincial speech. The fight, therefore, is not between Hindi and Urdu, but between the two on the one hand and English on the other. The result is a foregone conclusion in spite of the heavy handicap that the sisters are labouring under, not to speak of the temporary mutual quarrel.

My correspondent quarrels with my connection with the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. I am proud of my connection with that body. It has a record of which it has no reason to be ashamed. The name Hindi was common to both the communities. Both have written in Hindi and promoted its growth. Evidently my correspondent is ignorant of what my connection with that body has meant. It was under my instigation that it wisely, and shall I say patriotically and generously, adopted the definition of Hindi to cover Urdu. He asks whether I ever joined an Urdu Anjuman. I have never been seriously asked to join any. If I was, I would have made a stipulation with my inviters similar to the one I made with those who induced me to preside at the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. I would have asked the Urdu-speaking inviters to let me ask the audience to define Urdu so as to include Hindi speech written in Devanagari script. No such luck came my way.

But now, as I have already hinted in my article of the 1st inst. already referred to, I would like to form an Association advocating the learning of both forms of speech and both the scripts by its members and carrying on propaganda to that end in the hope finally of a natural fusion of the two becoming a common interprovincial speech called Hindustani. Then the equation would be not Hindustani = Hindi + Urdu, but Hindustani = Hindi = Urdu.

A. I. S. A., and it is their duty to take up this work. To feed the hungry and clothe the naked is our immediate programme, and you have all to lend a hand effectively. If you all do so, the question of spurious khadi will not arise. No Congressman can deal in spurious khadi."

The last question was about the Congressmen's duty in times of raids and scares and consequent disturbances.

"The emergency is there today," said Gandhiji. "Dacoities are rampant, and unless the Congress asserts itself effectively the situation will go out of our hands. The need for peace brigades was never more urgent than now. The risk of death is there, whether you choose violence or non-violence. Why not then prepare yourselves to die non-violently? It will also enable you to offer effective resistance in case of a civil war. As for the protection of the wounded in air raids, the bulk of the work will come upon yourselves. You will not join the A. R. P., simply because you will be then parts of a machine over which you have no control and you would be active participants in the war effort. But it is certain that the Government will not be able to render assistance everywhere. Did they do so in Rangoon? We have harrowing tales of dead and wounded lying on the streets of Rangoon uncared for. Wherever, therefore, the authorities fail there will be enough scope of work for us. We have to prepare volunteers for this work ready to take risks and to act with initiative. We may have to remove the dead and wounded, take charge of vacant houses, and so on. In this work you will heartily co-operate with the authorities wherever they will accept your co-operation."

To Correspondents

Correspondents will please note that I neither open nor read all the correspondence that comes to me. And now that I have taken up the care of the three weeklies, the fewest possible letters are put before me, and even those I often do not get the time to read. Correspondents should regard the weeklies as my public letter to them. Therefore they may not as a rule expect personal replies. Many apply for admission to the Sevagram Ashram. For one thing there is hardly room for further admissions. Some insist on replies in my own hand. It is not possible to satisfy this desire, much as I should like to. I would therefore request all correspondents to spare me and my overworked assistants as much as possible.

Seth Jamnalal Bajaj

In Seth Jamnalal Bajaj death has taken a mighty man. Whenever I wrote of wealthy men becoming trustees of their wealth for the common good I always had this merchant prince principally in mind. If his trusteeship did not reach the ideal, the fault was not his. I deliberately restrained him. I did not want him in his enthusiasm to take a single step which in his cool moments he might regret. His simplicity was all his own. Every house he built for himself became a dharma-shala. His contribution as a satyagrahi was of the highest order. In political discussions he held his own. His judgments were sound. As an act of renunciation his last was the crown of all. He wanted to take up a constructive activity to which he could devote the rest of his life and in which he could use all his abilities. This was the preservation of the cattle wealth of India personified in the cow. He threw himself into the work with a single-mindedness and zeal I had never seen surpassed. His generosity knew no distinction of race, creed or colour. He wanted to perform a rare thing for a busy man. He wanted to control his thoughts so as to prevent a single intruder from coming in. The world is poorer for his death. The country has lost one of the bravest of its servants. Janakidevi, the widow, has decided to take up the work to which he had dedicated himself. She has divested herself of all her personal property valued at about two and a half lacs. May God enable her to fulfil the trust she has undertaken.

Misbehaviour of Troops

I have piteous letters from correspondents complaining of misbehaviour by troops, White and Indian. There are detailed letters from Dohad and Rutlam stations and others too. The troops are said to have molested the hawkers on the platforms, helped themselves to eatables and hit the salesmen who protested. The station masters were powerless to afford protection. I do not know how much credit is to be attached to the descriptions I have received. The evidence is so detailed and given with so much moderation as to command belief. Anyway I draw the attention of the authorities to the complaints. Any such misbehaviour should be put down summarily and repetition made practically impossible, if panic is to be prevented and bitterness avoided. I would advise the aggrieved parties to lodge their complaints to the proper authorities with authentic evidence in support.

Hyderabad State

Swami Ramananda Tirtha of the banned State Congress has issued the following sober statement :

"Some of the workers of the Hyderabad State Congress, which was banned on 2nd March 1940, offered individual satyagraha in the month of September 1940 under the guidance of Mahatma Gandhi. The Government of H. E. H. the Nizam released them unconditionally on 16th December 1941. Immediately after the release, I issued a statement saying that, though the Government had released us, it did not remove the aforesaid ban. It seemed to us, therefore, that it was incumbent upon us to continue the satyagraha till our demand for lifting the ban was conceded by the Government. After our release we consulted Mahatmaji and explained to him the present situation in Hyderabad State and our own point of view. Taking into consideration the present critical phase of the war, he advised us to abstain from reoffering satyagraha at this hour, and directed us to concentrate our energies wholly on the constructive programme. We have, therefore, decided to faithfully follow Mahatmaji's advice. We more and more appreciate the vital importance of the constructive programme and its potentialities. We therefore appeal to the people in general and workers in particular to devote their energies to this programme. We may not even seem to embarrass H. E. H.'s Government at this critical juncture. This suspension, however, does not mean any alteration in our goal which is the attainment of responsible government under the aegis of H. E. H. the Nizam and the Asafjahi Dynasty."

How I wish the Government of H. E. H. the Nizam would remove the ban. They cannot wish to prevent people from carrying on a constitutional movement in favour of responsible government under the aegis of H. E. H. the Nizam. The recent release of the satyagrahis loses all grace if the ban on the State Congress is not removed.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Hindu-Muslim Puzzle

Q. In your proposed solution of the Hindu-Muslim puzzle, do you expect all the Hindus to abstain from the legislatures or only a part? If only a part, will not the most reactionary Hindus get in and make things worse than now? And if you expect Congressmen to affect the Muslim mind from outside, why can't you do the same and perhaps more effectively by being inside?

A. I do not expect all the Hindus to abstain. I know that all Hindu seats will be filled by non-Congress Hindus. Congress Hindus, if they go in, will be ground down between the two stones of the communal chakki without doing any good to anybody. I do not approach the question as a Hindu. I approach it as a Congressman seeking to represent equally all communities. But for the artificial system introduced in the composition of the Indian legislatures, all the members would be representing not communities but their parties grouped according to their non-communal shibboleths. As one representing all communities I would expect not only Hindus but Congress-minded Muslims and others too to avoid the legislatures and elective bodies. These abstainers will hold the scales evenly between all communities and seek to affect the legislatures from outside. Whether they are many or only a few, they will play the role of wise men. If all listened to me, the communal question would disappear from our midst. By entering the legislatures the Congress Hindus become interlopers, and act weakly for fear of offending one party or the other. This I know, that at the present moment the legislatures are, and must become, part of the war machinery. They have no choice. They will not be allowed to function, if they obstruct the war effort. How could the rulers whose sole occupation is to prosecute the war do otherwise?

Why Not in Hindu Majority Provinces?

Q. Why not advise Congressmen to withdraw from the provincial legislatures too where the Hindus are in a majority?

A. Because I do not want the non-Muslim minority parties to act as if they were the majority and carry on the government in these provinces. It would be a false position to which the Congress would be a willing party, if the Congress members withdrew. In these provinces, therefore, abstention cannot solve the communal tangle, and will bring about an unintended and undesirable state of things.

Torturing the Language?

Q. Surely you are torturing the language when you use the word 'unitary' in the place of 'unilateral'. For that is obviously what you mean.

A. I must plead not guilty. 'Unilateral' has a definite legal meaning which does not fit in with what I am struggling to convey. It is not one-sidedness. It is no-sidedness. It has impartiality implied in it. But it is not the method of impartiality. It is something more. I represent a party, say the Congress. For the solution of the problem I apply a method whereby I seek to affect those who are estranged from me. I am not merely impartial, because I may or may not please them. Impartiality has to be felt by the aggrieved party. My conduct is independent of the feeling of the aggrieved party. I go the utmost length to placate the offended party, and trust my out and out pure conduct to affect them. I may not succeed at once. But if there is a real sense of justice in the method, it must succeed. For want of a better word I have called the method 'unitary'. The dictionary meaning satisfies my test which I have imperfectly described here. Sevagram, 3-2-42

ADIVASIS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Adivasis have become the fourteenth item in the constructive programme. But they are not the least in point of importance. Our country is so vast and the races so varied that the best of us, in spite of every effort, cannot know all there is to know of men and their condition. As one comes upon layer after layer of things one ought to know as a national servant, one realises how difficult it is to make good our claim to be one nation whose every unit has a living consciousness of being one with every other.

The Adivasis are 2½ crores in all India, i. e. 6½ per cent of the total population or nearly half of the Harijan population.

Shri Balasaheb Kher has thrown himself with his usual zeal into this much needed service in the Thana District. He says in the pamphlet issued by him on behalf of the Adivasi Seva Mandal of which he is President:

"Many of these aborigines have been reduced to a state of actual slavery. 'Beth' or 'veth' or forced labour is exacted from them without payment of any wages or with only a nominal payment by zamindars, sowkars or forest contractors. As mentioned in Mr. Symington's Report on the Aboriginal and Hill Tribes published by Government in 1939, 'all jungle tract tenants (in the Province of Bombay) are liable to be called upon to work for their landlords. This forced labour is demanded for as many days as are necessary for the landlords' requirements. If they refuse or procrastinate, they are liable to assault or beatings.' Says Mr. Symington: 'I was told, on credible authority, of men being tied up to posts and whipped. There are also rumours of men in the past having been killed.' 'The maximum remuneration of forced labour is one anna per diem. More often rice is given, barely sufficient for one man for one meal.' The report then describes the appalling conditions of their slave life and observes: 'Landlords will not scruple to use their power in fulfilment of their purposes, for instance the use of their tenants' womenfolk for the gratification of their lust.' It will thus be seen that these tribes live a life of perpetual fear, misery and ill-health. They are so illiterate that they cannot count numbers beyond twenty, and are thus easily cheated by landlords, sowkars and contractors. They cannot avail themselves of medical aid, have poor health, and live in insanitary conditions."

Balasaheb has made a modest beginning. He has started with a hostel for Adivasi boys. His work is all unassuming and solid. If he gets the true type of workers, what is a small beginning may one day blossom forth into an all-India organisation covering the whole of the Adivasi population. Truly "the harvest is rich and the labourers few." Who can deny that all such service is not merely humanitarian but solidly national and brings us nearer to true Independence?

INDIVIDUAL OR COLLECTIVE?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Shri Jamnalal Bajaj has bravely taken the burden of the great work of cow service (in other words, cattle preservation) on his shoulders. The most important question for consideration before the recent Go-Seva Sangh Conference was whether cow farming should be in the hands of individuals or done collectively. I myself had no hesitation in saying that she could never be saved by individual farming. Her salvation, and with her that of the buffalo, could only be brought about by collective endeavour. It is quite impossible for an individual farmer to look after the welfare of his cattle in his own home in a proper and scientific manner. Amongst other causes lack of collective effort has been a principal cause of the deterioration of the cow and hence of cattle in general.

The world today is moving towards the ideal of collective or co-operative effort in every department of life. Much in this line has been and is being accomplished. It has come into our country also, but in such a distorted form that our poor have not been able to reap its benefits. Pari passu with the increase in our population land holdings of the average farmer are daily decreasing. Moreover what the individual possesses is often fragmentary. For such farmers to keep cattle in their homes is a suicidal policy; and yet this is their condition today. Those who give the first place to economics and pay scant attention to religious, ethical or humanitarian considerations proclaim from the house-tops that the farmer is being devoured by his cattle due to the cost of their feed which is out of all proportion to what they yield. They say it is folly not to slaughter wholesale all useless animals.

What then should be done by humanitarians is the question. The answer obviously is to find a way whereby we may not only save the lives of our cattle but also see that they do not become a burden. I am sure that co-operative effort can help us in a large measure.

The following comparison may be helpful:

1. Under the collective system no farmer can keep cattle in his house as he does today. They foul the air, and dirty the surroundings. There is neither intelligence nor humanitarianism in living with animals. Man was not meant to do so. The space taken up by the cattle today would be spared to the farmer and his family, if the collective system were adopted.

2. As the number of cattle increases, life becomes impossible for the farmer in his home.

Hence he is obliged to sell the calves and kill the male buffaloes or else turn them out to starve and die. This inhumanity would be averted, if the care of cattle were undertaken on a co-operative basis.

3. Collective cattle farming would ensure the supply of veterinary treatment to animals when they are ill. No ordinary farmer can afford this on his own.

4. Similarly one selected bull can be easily kept for the need of several cows under the collective system. This is impossible otherwise except for charity.

5. Common grazing ground or land for exercising the animals will be easily available under the co-operative system, whereas today generally there is nothing of the kind for individual farmers.

6. The expense on fodder will be comparatively far less under the collective system.

7. The sale of milk at good prices will be greatly facilitated, and there will be no need or temptation for the farmer to adulterate it as he does as an individual.

8. It is impossible to carry out tests of the fitness of every head of cattle individually, but this could easily be done for the cattle of a whole village and would thus make it easier to improve the breed.

9. The foregoing advantages should be sufficient argument in favour of co-operative cattle farming. The strongest argument in its favour is that the individualistic system has been the means of making our own condition as well as that of our cattle pitiable. We can only save ourselves and them by making this essential change.

I firmly believe too that we shall not derive the full benefits of agriculture until we take to co-operative farming. Does it not stand to reason that it is far better for a hundred families in a village to cultivate their lands collectively and divide the income therefrom than to divide the land anyhow into a hundred portions? And what applies to land applies equally to cattle.

It is quite another matter that it may be difficult to convert people to adopt this way of life straightaway. The straight and narrow road is always hard to traverse. Every step in the programme of cow service is strewn with thorny problems. But only by surmounting difficulties can we hope to make the path easier. My purpose for the time being is to show the great superiority of collective cattle farming over the individual effort. I hold further that the latter is wrong and the former only is right. In reality even the individual can only safeguard his independence through co-operation. In cattle farming the individual effort has led to selfishness and inhumanity, whereas the collective effort can abate both the evils, if it does not remove them altogether.

"SUPPOSE GERMANY WINS"

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"Suppose Germany wins with India not having entered the war, would Hitler leave India alone? Certainly not, my dear Mr. Gandhi, he will have a greater say in India than what Britain has now. The difference is this. You can fight the Englishman, but you cannot fight the German once he puts his foot on India's soil. Civil disobedience is the terror of the Englishman, it is the daily bread of the Nazi."

This is a question extracted from a very long and earnest letter from an English correspondent from South Africa. The first fallacy is that India is assumed not to have entered the war when to all intents and purposes she is in the war in spite of the powerful protest of the Congress. She is so much in the war that Great Britain is effectively using all the available fighting material which her generals have brought into being and trained, and is draining all the money she can. Politically-minded Indians have never been trained except for doing the rulers' clerical work. They are certainly holding themselves aloof until certain obviously necessary conditions are fulfilled. I do not see how they can be blamed for demanding the very liberty in defence of which the Allied Powers are said to be fighting. What Indians can do even if their demand is accepted is to give their moral weight to the struggle. This the rulers evidently do not care for. It cannot, in their opinion, turn the scales in their favour. Moral values do not count when each party swears by its material and physical resources. The Congress, with all the will in the world to defeat Nazism, cannot thrust its help on Great Britain which evidently does not want it or about which it is at least indifferent. If, therefore, Great Britain suffers defeat, it will not be for want of Congress co-operation but for causes over which the Congress can have no control.

If the Nazis come to India, the Congress will give them the same fight that it has given Great Britain. I do not underrate the power of satyagraha as the questioner does. But that is pure speculation. Imperialism has kept its grip on India for more than 150 years. If it is overthrown by a worse type of rule, the Congress can have the negative satisfaction of knowing that no other 'ism' can possibly last beyond a few years even if it establishes a foothold in India. That is as I read the Congress mind. Personally I think the end of this giant war will be what happened in the fabled Mahabharata War. The Mahabharata has been aptly described by a Travancorian as the Permanent History of Man. What is described in that great epic is happening today before our very eyes. The warring nations are destroying themselves with such fury and ferocity that the end will be mutual exhaustion. The victor will share the fate that awaited the surviving Pandavas. The mighty warrior Arjuna was looted in broad daylight by a petty robber. And out of this holocaust must arise a new order for which the exploited millions of toilers have so long thirsted. The prayers of peace-lovers cannot go in vain. Satyagraha is itself an unmistakable mute prayer of an agonised soul.

GO-SEVA SANGH

Sink or Swim Together

The depth of Gandhiji's feeling on the whole subject may be measured from the concluding part of his address: "Unless you offer your full co-operation to Jamnalalji, especially on the question of pinjrapols, his best efforts cannot succeed. Today the cow is on the brink of extinction, and I am not sure that our efforts will ultimately succeed. But if she dies, we also die along with her — we, i. e. our civilisation, I mean our essentially non-violent and rural civilisation. We have, therefore, to make our choice. We can choose to be violent and kill all uneconomic cattle. Like Europe we should then breed our cattle for the purposes of milk and meat. But our civilisation is fundamentally different. Our life is wrapped up in our animals. Most of our villagers live with their animals, often under the same roof. Both live together, both starve together. Often enough the owner starves the poor cattle, exploits them, ill-treats them, unmercifully extracts work out of them. But if we reform our ways, we can both be saved. Otherwise we sink together, and it is just as well that we swim or sink together."

"The question today is to solve the problem of our starvation and poverty, but I have confined myself to the problem of the starvation and poverty of our cattle. Our rishis showed us the sovereign remedy. 'Protect the cow,' they said, 'and you protect all.' We have to add to the talents they have left us, and not to waste them. We have invited the experts, and we shall make every use of their advice. Nothing that we laymen say is final, we shall get the experts to test it with their knowledge and experience. We shall, therefore, always seek their advice and invite their criticism."

Cow-worship of the Ancients

Parts of the speech of Shri Vinoba, who presided, might have appropriately preceded Gandhiji's speech, for whereas Gandhiji showed what a pathetic travesty we had made of the ancient ideal of cow-worship, Vinoba showed from his knowledge of the ancient Sanskrit lore what a wonderful ideal it was. The ancient word was, he said, cow-protection (e. g. in the Gita), but go-seva (service of the cow) was deliberately chosen instead, in that protection was too big a bite and we had not the strength to give the cow complete protection. He also showed that the service meant service based on use as also use based on service, but neither divorced from the other. The Vedas had described the cow as yielding a thousand jets of milk ( which incidentally showed that there were in those days cows giving 50-60 lb. of milk, taking a jet as equal to an ounce of milk ), and also as the giver of lustre to a lustreless body, and therefore worthy of the most devoted service. And the ideal of service had not been depicted better than by that unique representative of Hindu civilisation, Kalidas, in Raghuvamsha :

निषेदुषीमासनबंधवीरः ।

जलामिलाषी जलमाददानां

छायेव तां भूतिरन्वगच्छत् ॥

( Stopping as she stopped, and moving with her as she moved along,
Sitting down to guard her when she set her down the trees among,
Drinking water only after she had her fill of drink,
Even like her constant shadow followed her the faithful king.)*

Nowhere in the world's literature was to be found a nobler picture than that of the devoted king Dileepa serving the cow Nandini and following her as her shadow.

Speaking on the pledge, Shri Vinoba said: "The pledge in every sacred task was essential and helpful. The embarrassment it might cause to hosts was negligible when one thought of the service it would render to them. It was no good hiding one's light under a bushel, and we should go on scattering our fragrance as we go."

Citing the experience of a friend about the condition of cattle in famine, he said: "The first to die are male buffaloes, then comes the turn of cows, then that of buffaloes, and the last come the bullocks. Our partiality for the buffalo arises out of considerations of short-sighted economy, and though we know the value of bullocks and try to save them in preference to all other animals, we forget that there would be no bullocks without the cows." "There were some," he added, "who thought that we must discard the bullock and go in for tractors. What is then to be done with the bullocks? They complacently assert that they can be used for food by those who have no scruples against it. They forget that the plan will ruin our agricultural economy—tractors are no good for small holdings—and destroy the cow and her progeny. In the Argentine Republic 10,000 bullocks are slaughtered for meat every day. The war has made this thing impossible there as in Europe, and so medical men are now waxing eloquent on the superior virtues of milk over beef. The fact is there was meat-eating and even beef-eating in India at some period of our history, and it gave place to the exclusive use of milk, when the people saw the ruinous nature of the former from the point of view of national economy."

The Buffalo v. the Cow

The resolutions passed reflect the result of the maximum of unanimity that was possible on some of the most controversial topics. Were the goshalas and pinjrapols to be asked to give exclusive preference to the cows? What was to be done with the buffalo? If she were to be completely 'boycotted', there would be so much dearth of milk and ghee, and a premium would be put upon vegetable ghee, and so on. Sardar Datarsingh had no doubt that a good cow was in the long run a better economic proposition than a good buffalo. His views, which he expressed at length, may be put down in his own words. They were sent to us five years ago, and they have not altered since:

"The buffalo is not an economical animal for the following reasons:

1. A buffalo matures on the average one year later than a good Indian milch bred cow.
2. The dry period, i. e. the time when she goes dry and up to the time she calves, is more than thrice that of a cow.
3. A good cow will give more milk than a buffalo.
4. The male calves of the buffaloes are practically quite useless for agricultural purposes, and if sold fetch very little price, and therefore they are generally slaughtered, while the male calves of a cow are used all over India for agricultural purposes and are equally useful as female calves and fetch good price.
5. A buffalo is more susceptible to diseases than a cow.
6. A buffalo requires more looking after and is only happy when there is a large grazing area with plenty of water which is not in the reach of a small zamindar.
7. A buffalo feels the heat and cold much more, which results in the deterioration of the milk yield; but it is not the case with a cow.
8. The only point in favour of keeping a buffalo is that she gives a much higher percentage of fat than a cow, but if all the details of the production are taken into account, a good cow beats a buffalo even in that respect."

Years ago in the columns of Young India a very interesting controversy took place between Pandit Satavalekar and the late Shri C. V. Vaidya about cow-sacrifice and beef-eating in ancient India. The former, I think, successfully demonstrated that, though the practice was not absent, it was never universal and the Vedic precept was to hold the cow as sacred—अध्या 'not to be killed'. (Rig Veda, viii, 101, 15-16) The discussion had no bearing on the present age beyond showing that beef-eating which was at one time prevalent was wisely given up by those who knew the principles of social economy, and that it is no use running at the throat of beef-eaters, who should be patiently persuaded that cow-slaughter is not in the interest of the nation. Kakasaheb Kalelkar, who was invited to speak on the resolution about pinjrapols, said that it was the cow herself who had taught us non-violence. "The story of Rantideva's sacrifice in the Mahabharata shows that the sacrifice of bovine animals and beef-eating were prevalent at a certain period in our history. But it was only when the cow began to yield sufficient milk and her progeny began to be used for agriculture which gave us enough food and clothes that we ceased to look upon beef as an article of food. Enough clothes means proportionately less food—as I have seen with my own eyes in the case of sadhus—and the bullock as an agricultural animal has gone a great way in taking us near to ahimsa. And if we want to work towards a non-violent state, there is no alternative but to lay exclusive emphasis on protecting the cow and her progeny."

There seemed to be substantial agreement on these propositions, but no one seemed to be clear as regards the attitude to be adopted regarding the buffalo, and no one seemed to see how, if we saved the cow, the buffalo would also be saved. Did Gandhiji mean to say that even as khadi saved the Indian mill cloth, the protection of the cow would mean the protection of the buffalo?

"Yes," said Gandhiji, "but I mean something more. I have often said that I should not shed a single tear, if all the mills were to be destroyed. I would never say this regarding the buffalo."

"No," he said, explaining the matter at greater length. "My point is that, unless we protect the cow today, we will fail to save both the cow and the buffalo. And it is not possible to make a combined endeavour to save both. The combined endeavour will result in the buffalo devouring the cow. The cow is the more neglected animal, and that is why we should concentrate on the cow. But not even if Jamnalalji got a few crores of rupees can we achieve our object until we have converted the people to our view—especially the people who run goshalas and pinjrapols."

"There is no question of 'boycott', much less of the killing of buffaloes. Slaughter is a thing that suggests itself easily to Western economists. That is why they cut the Gordian knot by slaughtering the inferior breed of cows and bulls. But that solution is no good for me. It is my firm conviction that, if we master the real science of saving the cow, the science of saving the buffalo and other animals would automatically be revealed to us."

"But, supposing you were to boycott all the buffaloes in Sevagram, what would happen to them and their owners?" was a question put to Gandhiji.

"I promise to take charge of the buffalo in case you succeed in your mission of the cow to that extent. If the mill-owners voluntarily close down the mills, I shall dance with joy, but not if the owners of the buffaloes were to slaughter them. Western economics is divorced from ethics; our ethics and economics coincide or should, if they do not. My exclusive emphasis on the protection of the cow is due to the undue neglect of the cow although she in my opinion is a sound economic proposition. I do not need the aid of the Vedas to show me this, and this is a matter in which I would test the Vedic precept on the anvil of reason. Reason convinces me that, if I save the cow, I save the cow and the buffalo both. If anyone can convince me that the cow is dead beyond redemption, and that the buffalo alone needs to be protected, I am quite prepared to organise a 'Buffalo Protection Association'. But the reverse is the case. The buffalo needs no special protection, the cow needs it. The buffalo and the goat are as much my mothers as the cow. But I know that the poor goat cannot be saved, that the cow badly needs to be saved, and when we have saved the cow the buffalo will be automatically saved."

Grazing, Tannery, etc.

Various other questions were discussed—the most important one being that of grazing areas. There were several points on which even experts could not give definite guidance. Are grazing areas essential or would stall-feeding be enough for the cows? How far is the complaint just that the gradual disappearance of grazing areas has spelt the extinction of the cow and her progeny? If it is just, there should be an organised agitation for it. Sardar Datarsingh was of opinion that the essential was enough fodder and enough exercising area, and that more emphasis was necessary on fodder crops than on pasture land. Dr. Shahi, who had travelled a lot abroad, said that everywhere in Europe there were grazing areas attached to dairy farms. Shri Shrikant Mishra said that, if we depended entirely on grass land and gave the animal only grass, one head of cattle would require four acres of grass land. But if the land were to be put under fodder crops, an acre would be quite enough for one animal; and in canal areas an acre could maintain three heads of cattle, as three crops would be available. The need was for more production of fodder crops, as availability of grazing areas was very limited.

The whole question was beset with difficulties, and the Go-Seva Sangh will have to do plenty of research work before it can give proper guidance on the subject. Gandhiji tentatively suggested that co-operative owning of cows and co-operative owning of pasture for them would go a great length in improving both the breed and the milk yield and in helping to solve the question of grazing.

Regarding tannery a simple handbook on the essentials of skinning dead cattle, treating the hide, and disposal of the fleshing and the bones, is contemplated, and the experts have been told off to produce it without delay and make it available in all provincial languages.

The Programme

For the next year the Go-Seva Sangh should, suggested Gandhiji, concentrate on making cow's milk available throughout Wardha and its neighbourhood, on sending experts to pinjrapols in order to collect material, throw out suggestions, and help in making them approximate to the ideal pinjrapol contemplated by the Sangh, and on having a laboratory in Wardha for the testing of milk and ghee, and so on. The Sangh will also try to enlist at least a thousand members.

What Shri Vinoba said at the conclusion of the proceedings was worth pondering by every member of the Sangh. "We have had so many Sanghs," he said, "and we have a fresh one now. The A. I. S. A., though it had enlisted hundreds of sacrificing workers, may be said to have only begun the great task that it has to achieve. Then came the Harijan Sevak Sangh. It took me to Nalwadi, where we now have a tannery and a parishramalaya. Then came the Village Industries Association which has set before itself a work as difficult as putting a thousand loose ends together, and in face of bazars teeming with foreign articles it looked almost a forlorn task to popularise village-made articles. Then came 'Nai Talim'—Basic Education—with regard to which we have made as yet little headway, and I have often been wondering whether I should not take up a school myself and work at it. Now this work has come upon us. It is far more difficult than those I have mentioned, and I feel nearly baffled. The whole day I have been thinking what exactly I have done for cow-protection today. For khadi I have done at least some work in that I was all the while plying my takli before you; but what did I do for cow-protection? The work needs all the skill and the resourcefulness and the purity that we can muster. I devoted twelve years to mastering the art and science of khadi, spinning eight hours a day for a long period of time. That has given me an insight which reveals me something new every day. We have, therefore, to apply ourselves to this new task with the devotion of King Dileepa and do something concrete every day for the cow as he did."

BRITISH AND AMERICAN NAZISM

If Dr. George Washington Carver had been born a white man, his name would have been as famous in the world of science as that of Burbank, Edison, or the Curies. But he was born a Negro, and so—in spite of his epoch-making discoveries in the field of science—synthesising the products of pea-nuts and potatoes and making of floor marbles and building boards from waste materials, and showing the immense potentialities of his native soil—he remains in America the shunned Negro that he was nearly 80 years ago. He was born in 1864. And yet a British explorer of the reputation of Sir Harry Johnston wrote about him: "Prof. Carver, who teaches scientific agriculture, botany, agricultural chemistry, etc. at Tuskegee, is an absolute Negro; but in the soundness of his science, he might be professor of Botany, not at Tuskegee, but at Oxford or Cambridge. Any European botanist of distinction, after ten minutes' conversation with this man, would instinctively treat him as a man on a level with himself." Dr. Carver occasionally sends his pamphlets and messages to Gandhiji, and the latest to bring these was Dr. John who was on a visit to America and incidentally visited Tuskegee. "I will not accept the messages," said Gandhiji laughing, "unless Dr. Carver comes and delivers them himself." Dr. John said Dr. Carver was too old now to come to India. But he works nevertheless in his garden, getting up every day at 4 o'clock, and remembers Gandhiji whenever he has an Indian visitor. He is so humble and simple in his habits that for weeks Dr. John mistook him for a gardener. Dr. Carver has now prepared potato powder which can keep for twenty years. The very first question that Gandhiji asked Dr. John about Dr. Carver was: "But even this genius suffers under the handicap of segregation, does not he?"

"Oh yes," said Dr. John, "as much as any Negro."

"And yet these people talk of democracy and equality! It is an utter lie," said Gandhiji in indignation.

"But," said Dr. John, "Dr. Carver is never bitter or resentful."

"I know," said Gandhiji, "that is what we believers in non-violence have to learn from him. But what about the claim of these people who are said to be fighting for democracy?"

Well he is "an absolute Negro", and when "equality" and "democracy" are mentioned the words "of the white races" are understood. That is what may be called American Nazism. The New Statesman of November 22, just to hand, describes what it terms a species of "British Nazism". The Southern Rhodesia Land Apportionment Act of 1941, which came into force in August 1941, divides the country into 49 million acres reserved for white ownership, 29 million acres for native ownership, and the rest as forest area and unassigned; it makes it obligatory on the natives now living in the "white" areas to leave by the end of 1942, unless they are labourers for Europeans. These 49 million acres are reserved for 55,000 Europeans, and the 29 million for 1,100,000 Africans. "The British Government has thus agreed to condemn a million British subjects to restriction to a third of their own country and service-villainage in the rest of it for the benefit of a minority of 55,000 British subjects. And Parliament has had no opportunity to prevent this application of a purely Nazi policy, and one, moreover, in flat contradiction of repeated Governmental statements of colonial principle, within the British Empire."

The League of Coloured Peoples addressed a memorial to the Colonial Secretary, which stated among other things: That the half of the area reserved for the European population (less than one-twentieth of the whole) includes most of the best and easily accessible lands of the country; the "Native areas" are overcrowded, inadequately watered, and infested with tsetse fly; that the policy is not even an honest policy of segregation but of compelling the blacks to toil for the whites and to own no land; that this is Hitler's plan for the conquered countries in Europe; that it is wrong to suggest that the policy is favoured by the natives; that white agriculture is a failure in Southern Rhodesia, propped up by subsidies; and that Lord Cranborne, the Colonial Secretary, should display the "backbone to stand up to the small gang of white settlers who dominate the territory." He has not the backbone. For this letter has elicited a reply signed by a Colonial Office official saying that "no useful purpose would be served by discussing the principles involved."

THE ASHRAM PRAYER

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Ashram prayer has become very popular. Its development has been spontaneous. The Ashram Bhajanavali (Hymn Book) has gone into several editions and is increasingly in demand. The birth and growth of this prayer has not been artificial. There is a history attached to almost every shloka and every selected bhajan. The Bhajanavali contains among others bhajans from Muslim Sufis and Fakirs, from Guru Nanak, and from the Christian Hymnary. Every religion seems to have found a natural setting in the prayer book.

Chinese, Burmese, Jews, Ceylonese, Muslims, Parsis, Europeans and Americans have all lived in the Ashram from time to time. In the same way two Japanese sadhus came to me in Maganwadi in 1935. One of them was with me till the other day when war broke out with Japan. He was an ideal inmate of our home in Sevagram. He took part in every activity with zest. I never heard of his quarrelling with anyone. He was a silent worker. He learnt as much Hindi as he could. He was a strict observer of his vows. Every morning and evening he could be seen going round with his drum and heard chanting his mantra. The evening worship always commenced with his mantra नमो हो रे क्यो, which means "I bow to the Buddha, the giver of true religion." I shall never forget the quickness, the orderliness, and utter detachment with which he prepared himself the day the police came without notice to take him away from the Ashram. He took leave of me after reciting his favourite mantra and left his drum with me. "You are leaving us, but your mantra will remain an integral part of our Ashram prayer," were the words that came spontaneously to my lips. Since then, in spite of his absence, our morning and evening worship has commenced with the mantra. For me it is a constant reminder of Sadhu Keshav's purity and single-eyed devotion. Indeed its efficacy lies in that sacred memory.

While Sadhu Keshav was still with us Bibi Raihana Tyabji also came to stay at Sevagram for a few days. I knew her to be a devout Muslim but was not aware, before the death of her illustrious father, of how well-versed she was in Koran Sharif. When that jewel of Gujarat, Tyabji Saheb, expired no sound of weeping broke the awful silence in his room. The latter echoed with Bibi Raihana's sonorous recitation of verses from the Koran. Such as Abbas Tyabji Saheb cannot die. He is ever alive in the example of national service which he has left behind. Bibi Raihana is an accomplished singer with an ample repertory of bhajans of all kinds. She used to sing daily as well as recite beautiful verses from the Koran. I asked her to teach some verses to any of the inmates who could learn them, and she gladly did so. Like so many who come here she had become one of us. Raihana went away when her visit was over, but she has left a fragrant reminder of herself. The well-known 'al Fateha' has been included in the Ashram worship. The following is a translation of it:

1. I take refuge in Allah from Satan the accursed.
2. Say: He is God, the one and only
God, the Eternal, Absolute,
He begetteth not nor is He begotten,
And there is none like unto Him.
3. Praise be to God,
The Cherisher and Sustainer of the worlds,
Most Gracious, most Merciful,
Master of the Day of Judgment,
Thee do we worship
And Thine aid we seek.
Show us the straight way,
The way of those on whom
Thou hast bestowed Thy Grace,
Those whose (portion) is not wrath
And who go not astray."

I am writing this note in reply to an ardent Hindu friend who has thus gently reproached me: "You have now given the Kalma a place in the Ashram. What further remains to be done to kill your Hinduism?"

I am confident that my Hinduism and that of the other Ashram Hindus has grown thereby. There should be in us an equal reverence for all religions. Badshah Khan, whenever he comes, joins in the worship here with delight. He loves the tune to which the Ramayana is sung, and he listens intently to the Gita. His faith in Islam has not lessened thereby. Then why may I not listen to the Koran with equal reverence and adoration in my heart?

Vinoba and Pyarelal studied Arabic and learnt the Koran in jail. Their Hinduism has been enriched by this study. I believe that Hindu-Muslim unity will come only through such spontaneous mingling of hearts and no other. Rama is not known by only a thousand names. His names are innumerable, and He is the same whether we call him Allah, Khuda, Rahim, Razzak, the Breadgiver, or any name that comes from the heart of a true devotee.

Seth Jamnalal Bajaj

In Seth Jamnalal Bajaj death has taken a mighty man. Whenever I wrote of wealthy men becoming trustees of their wealth for the common good I always had this merchant prince principally in mind. If his trusteeship did not reach the ideal, the fault was not his. I deliberately restrained him. I did not want him in his enthusiasm to take a single step which in his cool moments he might regret. His simplicity was all his own. Every house he built for himself became a dharma-shala. His contribution as a satyagrahi was of the highest order. In political discussions he held his own. His judgments were sound. As an act of renunciation his last was the crown of all. He wanted to take up a constructive activity to which he could devote the rest of his life and in which he could use all his abilities. This was the preservation of the cattle wealth of India personified in the cow. He threw himself into the work with a single-mindedness and zeal I had never seen surpassed. His generosity knew no distinction of race, creed or colour. He wanted to perform a rare thing for a busy man. He wanted to control his thoughts so as to prevent a single intruder from coming in. The world is poorer for his death. The country has lost one of the bravest of its servants. Janakidevi, the widow, has decided to take up the work to which he had dedicated himself. She has divested herself of all her personal property valued at about two and a half lacs. May God enable her to fulfil the trust she has undertaken.

Misbehaviour of Troops

I have piteous letters from correspondents complaining of misbehaviour by troops, White and Indian. There are detailed letters from Dohad and Rutlam stations and others too. The troops are said to have molested the hawkers on the platforms, helped themselves to eatables and hit the salesmen who protested. The station masters were powerless to afford protection. I do not know how much credit is to be attached to the descriptions I have received. The evidence is so detailed and given with so much moderation as to command belief. Anyway I draw the attention of the authorities to the complaints. Any such misbehaviour should be put down summarily and repetition made practically impossible, if panic is to be prevented and bitterness avoided. I would advise the aggrieved parties to lodge their complaints to the proper authorities with authentic evidence in support.

Hyderabad State

Swami Ramananda Tirtha of the banned State Congress has issued the following sober statement:

"Some of the workers of the Hyderabad State Congress, which was banned on 2nd March 1940, offered individual satyagraha in the month of September 1940 under the guidance of Mahatma Gandhi. The Government of H. E. H. the Nizam released them unconditionally on 16th December 1941. Immediately after the release, I issued a statement saying that, though the Government had released us, it did not remove the aforesaid ban. It seemed to us, therefore, that it was incumbent upon us to continue the satyagraha till our demand for lifting the ban was conceded by the Government. After our release we consulted Mahatmaji and explained to him the present situation in Hyderabad State and our own point of view. Taking into consideration the present critical phase of the war, he advised us to abstain from reoffering satyagraha at this hour, and directed us to concentrate our energies wholly on the constructive programme. We have, therefore, decided to faithfully follow Mahatmaji's advice. We more and more appreciate the vital importance of the constructive programme and its potentialities. We therefore appeal to the people in general and workers in particular to devote their energies to this programme. We may not even seem to embarrass H. E. H.'s Government at this critical juncture. This suspension, however, does not mean any alteration in our goal which is the attainment of responsible government under the aegis of H. E. H. the Nizam and the Asafjahi Dynasty."

How I wish the Government of H. E. H. the Nizam would remove the ban. They cannot wish to prevent people from carrying on a constitutional movement in favour of responsible government under the aegis of H. E. H. the Nizam. The recent release of the satyagrahis loses all grace if the ban on the State Congress is not removed.

QUESTION BOX.

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Hindu-Muslim Puzzle

Q. In your proposed solution of the Hindu-Muslim puzzle, do you expect all the Hindus to abstain from the legislatures or only a part? If only a part, will not the most reactionary Hindus get in and make things worse than now? And if you expect Congressmen to affect the Muslim mind from outside, why can't you do the same and perhaps more effectively by being inside?

A. I do not expect all the Hindus to abstain. I know that all Hindu seats will be filled by non-Congress Hindus. Congress Hindus, if they go in, will be ground down between the two stones of the communal chakki without doing any good to anybody. I do not approach the question as a Hindu. I approach it as a Congressman seeking to represent equally all communities. But for the artificial system introduced in the composition of the Indian legislatures, all the members would be representing not communities but their parties grouped according to their non-communal shibboleths. As one representing all communities I would expect not only Hindus but Congress-minded Muslims and others too to avoid the legislatures and elective bodies. These abstainers will hold the scales evenly between all communities and seek to affect the legislatures from outside. Whether they are many or only a few, they will play the role of wise men. If all listened to me, the communal question would disappear from our midst. By entering the legislatures the Congress Hindus become interlopers, and act weakly for fear of offending one party or the other. This I know, that at the present moment the legislatures are, and must become, part of the war machinery. They have no choice. They will not be allowed to function, if they obstruct the war effort. How could the rulers whose sole occupation is to prosecute the war do otherwise?

Why Not in Hindu Majority Provinces?

Q. Why not advise Congressmen to withdraw from the provincial legislatures too where the Hindus are in a majority?

A. Because I do not want the non-Muslim minority parties to act as if they were the majority and carry on the government in these provinces. It would be a false position to which the Congress would be a willing party, if the Congress members withdrew. In these provinces, therefore, abstention cannot solve the communal tangle, and will bring about an unintended and undesirable state of things.

Torturing the Language?

Q. Surely you are torturing the language when you use the word 'unitary' in the place of 'unilateral'. For that is obviously what you mean.

A. I must plead not guilty. 'Unilateral' has a definite legal meaning which does not fit in with what I am struggling to convey. It is not one-sidedness. It is no-sidedness. It has impartiality implied in it. But it is not the method of impartiality. It is something more. I represent a party, say the Congress. For the solution of the problem I apply a method whereby I seek to affect those who are estranged from me. I am not merely impartial, because I may or may not please them. Impartiality has to be felt by the aggrieved party. My conduct is independent of the feeling of the aggrieved party. I go the utmost length to placate the offended party, and trust my out and out pure conduct to affect them. I may not succeed at once. But if there is a real sense of justice in the method, it must succeed. For want of a better word I have called the method 'unitary'. The dictionary meaning satisfies my test which I have imperfectly described here. Sevagram, 3-2-42

ADIVASIS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Adivasis have become the fourteenth item in the constructive programme. But they are not the least in point of importance. Our country is so vast and the races so varied that the best of us, in spite of every effort, cannot know all there is to know of men and their condition. As one comes upon layer after layer of things one ought to know as a national servant, one realises how difficult it is to make good our claim to be one nation whose every unit has a living consciousness of being one with every other.

The Adivasis are 2½ crores in all India, i. e. 6½ per cent of the total population or nearly half of the Harijan population.

Shri Balasaheb Kher has thrown himself with his usual zeal into this much needed service in the Thana District. He says in the pamphlet issued by him on behalf of the Adivasi Seva Mandal of which he is President:

"Many of these aborigines have been reduced to a state of actual slavery. 'Beth' or 'veth' or forced labour is exacted from them without payment of any wages or with only a nominal payment by zamindars; sowkars or forest contractors. As mentioned in Mr. Symington's Report on the Aboriginal and Hill Tribes published by Government in 1939, 'all jungle tract tenants (in the Province of Bombay) are liable to be called upon to work for their landlords. This forced labour is demanded for as many days as are necessary for the landlords' requirements. If they refuse or procrastinate, they are liable to assault or beatings.' Says Mr. Symington: 'I was told, on credible authority, of men being tied up to posts and whipped. There are also rumours of men in the past having been killed.' 'The maximum remuneration of forced labour is one anna per diem. More often rice is given, barely sufficient for one man for one meal.' The report then describes the appalling conditions of their slave life and observes: 'Landlords will not scruple to use their power in fulfilment of their purposes, for instance the use of their tenants' womenfolk for the gratification of their lust.' It will thus be seen that these tribes live a life of perpetual fear, misery and ill-health. They are so illiterate that they cannot count numbers beyond twenty, and are thus easily cheated by landlords, sowkars and contractors. They cannot avail themselves of medical aid, have poor health, and live in insanitary conditions."

Balasaheb has made a modest beginning. He has started with a hostel for Adivasi boys. His work is all unassuming and solid. If he gets the true type of workers, what is a small beginning may one day blossom forth into an all-India organisation covering the whole of the Adivasi population. Truly "the harvest is rich and the labourers few." Who can deny that all such service is not merely humanitarian but solidly national and brings us nearer to true Independence?

Sevagram, 9-2-42

INDIVIDUAL OR COLLECTIVE?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Shri Jamnalal Bajaj has bravely taken the burden of the great work of cow service (in other words, cattle preservation) on his shoulders. The most important question for consideration before the recent Go-Seva Sangh Conference was whether cow farming should be in the hands of individuals or done collectively. I myself had no hesitation in saying that she could never be saved by individual farming. Her salvation, and with her that of the buffalo, could only be brought about by collective endeavour. It is quite impossible for an individual farmer to look after the welfare of his cattle in his own home in a proper and scientific manner. Amongst other causes lack of collective effort has been a principal cause of the deterioration of the cow and hence of cattle in general.

The world today is moving towards the ideal of collective or co-operative effort in every department of life. Much in this line has been and is being accomplished. It has come into our country also, but in such a distorted form that our poor have not been able to reap its benefits. Pari passu with the increase in our population land holdings of the average farmer are daily decreasing. Moreover what the individual possesses is often fragmentary. For such farmers to keep cattle in their homes is a suicidal policy; and yet this is their condition today. Those who give the first place to economics and pay scant attention to religious, ethical or humanitarian considerations proclaim from the house-tops that the farmer is being devoured by his cattle due to the cost of their feed which is out of all proportion to what they yield. They say it is folly not to slaughter wholesale all useless animals.

What then should be done by humanitarians is the question. The answer obviously is to find a way whereby we may not only save the lives of our cattle but also see that they do not become a burden. I am sure that co-operative effort can help us in a large measure.

The following comparison may be helpful:

1. Under the collective system no farmer can keep cattle in his house as he does today. They foul the air, and dirty the surroundings. There is neither intelligence nor humanitarianism in living with animals. Man was not meant to do so. The space taken up by the cattle today would be spared to the farmer and his family, if the collective system were adopted.

2. As the number of cattle increases, life becomes impossible for the farmer in his home.

Hence he is obliged to sell the calves and kill the male buffaloes or else turn them out to starve and die. This inhumanity would be averted, if the care of cattle were undertaken on a co-operative basis.

3. Collective cattle farming would ensure the supply of veterinary treatment to animals when they are ill. No ordinary farmer can afford this on his own.

4. Similarly one selected bull can be easily kept for the need of several cows under the collective system. This is impossible otherwise except for charity.

5. Common grazing ground or land for exercising the animals will be easily available under the co-operative system, whereas today generally there is nothing of the kind for individual farmers.

6. The expense on fodder will be comparatively far less under the collective system.

7. The sale of milk at good prices will be greatly facilitated, and there will be no need or temptation for the farmer to adulterate it as he does as an individual.

8. It is impossible to carry out tests of the fitness of every head of cattle individually, but this could easily be done for the cattle of a whole village and would thus make it easier to improve the breed.

9. The foregoing advantages should be sufficient argument in favour of co-operative cattle farming. The strongest argument in its favour is that the individualistic system has been the means of making our own condition as well as that of our cattle pitiable. We can only save ourselves and them by making this essential change.

I firmly believe too that we shall not derive the full benefits of agriculture until we take to co-operative farming. Does it not stand to reason that it is far better for a hundred families in a village to cultivate their lands collectively and divide the income therefrom than to divide the land anyhow into a hundred portions? And what applies to land applies equally to cattle.

It is quite another matter that it may be difficult to convert people to adopt this way of life straightaway. The straight and narrow road is always hard to traverse. Every step in the programme of cow service is strewn with thorny problems. But only by surmounting difficulties can we hope to make the path easier. My purpose for the time being is to show the great superiority of collective cattle farming over the individual effort. I hold further that the latter is wrong and the former only is right. In reality even the individual can only safeguard his independence through co-operation. In cattle farming the individual effort has led to selfishness and inhumanity, whereas the collective effort can abate both the evils, if it does not remove them altogether.

"SUPPOSE GERMANY WINS"

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"Suppose Germany wins with India not having entered the war, would Hitler leave India alone? Certainly not, my dear Mr. Gandhi, he will have a greater say in India than what Britain has now. The difference is this. You can fight the Englishman, but you cannot fight the German once he puts his foot on India's soil. Civil disobedience is the terror of the Englishman, it is the daily bread of the Nazi."

This is a question extracted from a very long and earnest letter from an English correspondent from South Africa. The first fallacy is that India is assumed not to have entered the war when to all intents and purposes she is in the war in spite of the powerful protest of the Congress. She is so much in the war that Great Britain is effectively using all the available fighting material which her generals have brought into being and trained, and is draining all the money she can. Politically-minded Indians have never been trained except for doing the rulers' clerical work. They are certainly holding themselves aloof until certain obviously necessary conditions are fulfilled. I do not see how they can be blamed for demanding the very liberty in defence of which the Allied Powers are said to be fighting. What Indians can do even if their demand is accepted is to give their moral weight to the struggle. This the rulers evidently do not care for. It cannot, in their opinion, turn the scales in their favour. Moral values do not count when each party swears by its material and physical resources. The Congress, with all the will in the world to defeat Nazism, cannot thrust its help on Great Britain which evidently does not want it or about which it is at least indifferent. If, therefore, Great Britain suffers defeat, it will not be for want of Congress co-operation but for causes over which the Congress can have no control.

If the Nazis come to India, the Congress will give them the same fight that it has given Great Britain. I do not underrate the power of satyagraha as the questioner does. But that is pure speculation. Imperialism has kept its grip on India for more than 150 years. If it is overthrown by a worse type of rule, the Congress can have the negative satisfaction of knowing that no other 'ism' can possibly last beyond a few years even if it establishes a foothold in India. That is as I read the Congress mind. Personally I think the end of this giant war will be what happened in the fabled Mahabharata War. The Mahabharata has been aptly described by a Travancorian as the Permanent History of Man. What is described in that great epic is happening today before our very eyes. The warring nations are destroying themselves with such fury and ferocity that the end will be mutual exhaustion. The victor will share the fate that awaited the surviving Pandavas. The mighty warrior Arjuna was looted in broad daylight by a petty robber. And out of this holocaust must arise a new order for which the exploited millions of toilers have so long thirsted. The prayers of peace-lovers cannot go in vain. Satyagraha is itself an unmistakable mute prayer of an agonised soul.

GO-SEVA SANGH

Sink or Swim Together

The depth of Gandhiji's feeling on the whole subject may be measured from the concluding part of his address: "Unless you offer your full co-operation to Jamnalalji, especially on the question of pinjrapols, his best efforts cannot succeed. Today the cow is on the brink of extinction, and I am not sure that our efforts will ultimately succeed. But if she dies, we also die along with her — we, i. e. our civilisation, I mean our essentially non-violent and rural civilisation. We have, therefore, to make our choice. We can choose to be violent and kill all uneconomic cattle. Like Europe we should then breed our cattle for the purposes of milk and meat. But our civilisation is fundamentally different. Our life is wrapped up in our animals. Most of our villagers live with their animals, often under the same roof. Both live together, both starve together. Often enough the owner starves the poor cattle, exploits them, ill-treats them, unmercifully extracts work out of them. But if we reform our ways, we can both be saved. Otherwise we sink together, and it is just as well that we swim or sink together."

"The question today is to solve the problem of our starvation and poverty, but I have confined myself to the problem of the starvation and poverty of our cattle. Our rishis showed us the sovereign remedy. 'Protect the cow,' they said, 'and you protect all.' We have to add to the talents they have left us, and not to waste them. We have invited the experts, and we shall make every use of their advice. Nothing that we laymen say is final, we shall get the experts to test it with their knowledge and experience. We shall, therefore, always seek their advice and invite their criticism."

Cow-worship of the Ancients

Parts of the speech of Shri Vinoba, who presided, might have appropriately preceded Gandhiji's speech, for whereas Gandhiji showed what a pathetic travesty we had made of the ancient ideal of cow-worship, Vinoba showed from his knowledge of the ancient Sanskrit lore what a wonderful ideal it was. The ancient word was, he said, cow-protection (e. g. in the Gita), but go-seva (service of the cow) was deliberately chosen instead, in that protection was too big a bite and we had not the strength to give the cow complete protection. He also showed that the service meant service based on use as also use based on service, but neither divorced from the other. The Vedas had described the cow as yielding a thousand jets of milk ( which incidentally showed that there were in those days cows giving 50-60 lb. of milk, taking a jet as equal to an ounce of milk ), and also as the giver of lustre to a lustreless body, and therefore worthy of the most devoted service. And the ideal of service had not been depicted better than by that unique representative of Hindu civilisation, Kalidas, in Raghuvamsha :

निषेदुषीमासनवंधीरः ।

जलामिलापी जलमाददानां

छायेव तां भूपतिरन्वगच्छत् ॥

( Stopping as she stopped, and moving with her as she moved along,
Sitting down to guard her when she set her down the trees among,
*Drinking water only after she had her fill of drink,
Even like her constant shadow followed her the faithful king.)*

Nowhere in the world's literature was to be found a nobler picture than that of the devoted king Dileepa serving the cow Nandini and following her as her shadow.

Speaking on the pledge, Shri Vinoba said: "The pledge in every sacred task was essential and helpful. The embarrassment it might cause to hosts was negligible when one thought of the service it would render to them. It was no good hiding one's light under a bushel, and we should go on scattering our fragrance as we go."

Citing the experience of a friend about the condition of cattle in famine, he said: "The first to die are male buffaloes, then comes the turn of cows, then that of buffaloes, and the last come the bullocks. Our partiality for the buffalo arises out of considerations of short-sighted economy, and though we know the value of bullocks and try to save them in preference to all other animals, we forget that there would be no bullocks without the cows." "There were some," he added, "who thought that we must discard the bullock and go in for tractors. What is then to be done with the bullocks? They complacently assert that they can be used for food by those who have no scruples against it. They forget that the plan will ruin our agricultural economy—tractors are no good for small holdings—and destroy the cow and her progeny. In the Argentine Republic 10,000 bullocks are slaughtered for meat every day. The war has made this thing impossible there as in Europe, and so medical men are now waxing eloquent on the superior virtues of milk over beef. The fact is there was meat-eating and even beef-eating in India at some period of our history, and it gave place to the exclusive use of milk, when the people saw the ruinous nature of the former from the point of view of national economy."

* A very free rendering by me. M. D.

The Buffalo v. the Cow

The resolutions passed reflect the result of the maximum of unanimity that was possible on some of the most controversial topics. Were the goshalas and pinjrapols to be asked to give exclusive preference to the cows? What was to be done with the buffalo? If she were to be completely 'boycotted', there would be so much dearth of milk and ghee, and a premium would be put upon vegetable ghee, and so on. Sardar Datarsingh had no doubt that a good cow was in the long run a better economic proposition than a good buffalo. His views, which he expressed at length, may be put down in his own words. They were sent to us five years ago, and they have not altered since:

"The buffalo is not an economical animal for the following reasons:

1. A buffalo matures on the average one year later than a good Indian milch bred cow.
2. The dry period, i. e. the time when she goes dry and up to the time she calves, is more than thrice that of a cow.
3. A good cow will give more milk than a buffalo.
4. The male calves of the buffaloes are practically quite useless for agricultural purposes, and if sold fetch very little price, and therefore they are generally slaughtered, while the male calves of a cow are used all over India for agricultural purposes and are equally useful as female calves and fetch good price.
5. A buffalo is more susceptible to diseases than a cow.
6. A buffalo requires more looking after and is only happy when there is a large grazing area with plenty of water which is not in the reach of a small zamindar.
7. A buffalo feels the heat and cold much more, which results in the deterioration of the milk yield; but it is not the case with a cow.
8. The only point in favour of keeping a buffalo is that she gives a much higher percentage of fat than a cow, but if all the details of the production are taken into account, a good cow beats a buffalo even in that respect."

Years ago in the columns of Young India a very interesting controversy took place between Pandit Satavalekar and the late Shri C. V. Vaidya about cow-sacrifice and beef-eating in ancient India. The former, I think, successfully demonstrated that, though the practice was not absent, it was never universal and the Vedic precept was to hold the cow as sacred—अध्या 'not to be killed'. (Rig Veda, viii, 101, 15-16) The discussion had no bearing on the present age beyond showing that beef-eating which was at one time prevalent was wisely given up by those who knew the principles of social economy, and that it is no use running at the throat of beef-eaters, who should be patiently persuaded that cow-slaughter is not in the interest of the nation. Kakasaheb Kalelkar, who was invited to speak on the resolution about pinjrapols, said that it was the cow herself who had taught us non-violence. "The story of Rantideva's sacrifice in the Mahabharata shows that the sacrifice of bovine animals and beef-eating were prevalent at a certain period in our history. But it was only when the cow began to yield sufficient milk and her progeny began to be used for agriculture which gave us enough food and clothes that we ceased to look upon beef as an article of food. Enough clothes means proportionately less food—as I have seen with my own eyes in the case of sadhus—and the bullock as an agricultural animal has gone a great way in taking us near to ahimsa. And if we want to work towards a non-violent state, there is no alternative but to lay exclusive emphasis on protecting the cow and her progeny."

There seemed to be substantial agreement on these propositions, but no one seemed to be clear as regards the attitude to be adopted regarding the buffalo, and no one seemed to see how, if we saved the cow, the buffalo would also be saved. Did Gandhiji mean to say that even as khadi saved the Indian mill cloth, the protection of the cow would mean the protection of the buffalo?

"Yes," said Gandhiji, "but I mean something more. I have often said that I should not shed a single tear, if all the mills were to be destroyed. I would never say this regarding the buffalo."

"No," he said, explaining the matter at greater length. "My point is that, unless we protect the cow today, we will fail to save both the cow and the buffalo. And it is not possible to make a combined endeavour to save both. The combined endeavour will result in the buffalo devouring the cow. The cow is the more neglected animal, and that is why we should concentrate on the cow. But not even if Jamnalalji got a few crores of rupees can we achieve our object until we have converted the people to our view—especially the people who run goshalas and pinjrapols."

"There is no question of 'boycott', much less of the killing of buffaloes. Slaughter is a thing that suggests itself easily to Western economists. That is why they cut the Gordian knot by slaughtering the inferior breed of cows and bulls. But that solution is no good for me. It is my firm conviction that, if we master the real science of saving the cow, the science of saving the buffalo and other animals would automatically be revealed to us."

"But, supposing you were to boycott all the buffaloes in Sevagram, what would happen to them and their owners?" was a question put to Gandhiji.

"I promise to take charge of the buffalo in case you succeed in your mission of the cow to that extent. If the mill-owners voluntarily close down the mills, I shall dance with joy, but not if the owners of the buffaloes were to slaughter them. Western economics is divorced from ethics; our ethics and economics coincide or should, if they do not. My exclusive emphasis on the protection of the cow is due to the undue neglect of the cow although she in my opinion is a sound economic proposition. I do not need the aid of the Vedas to show me this, and this is a matter in which I would test the Vedic precept on the anvil of reason. Reason convinces me that, if I save the cow, I save the cow and the buffalo both. If anyone can convince me that the cow is dead beyond redemption, and that the buffalo alone needs to be protected, I am quite prepared to organise a

'Buffalo Protection Association'. But the reverse is the case. The buffalo needs no special protection; the cow needs it. The buffalo and the goat are as much my mothers as the cow. But I know that the poor goat cannot be saved, that the cow badly needs to be saved, and when we have saved the cow the buffalo will be automatically saved."

Grazing, Tannery, etc.

Various other questions were discussed—the most important one being that of grazing areas. There were several points on which even experts could not give definite guidance. Are grazing areas essential or would stall-feeding be enough for the cows? How far is the complaint just that the gradual disappearance of grazing areas has spelt the extinction of the cow and her progeny? If it is just, there should be an organised agitation for it. Sardar Datar Singh was of opinion that the essential was enough fodder and enough exercising area, and that more emphasis was necessary on fodder crops than on pasture land. Dr. Shahi, who had travelled a lot abroad, said that everywhere in Europe there were grazing areas attached to dairy farms. Shri Shrikant Mishra said that, if we depended entirely on grass land and gave the animal only grass, one head of cattle would require four acres of grass land. But if the land were to be put under fodder crops, an acre would be quite enough for one animal, and in canal areas an acre could maintain three heads of cattle, as three crops would be available. The need was for more production of fodder crops, as availability of grazing areas was very limited.

The whole question was beset with difficulties, and the Go-Seva Sangh will have to do plenty of research work before it can give proper guidance on the subject. Gandhiji tentatively suggested that co-operative owning of cows and co-operative owning of pasture for them would go a great length in improving both the breed and the milk yield and in helping to solve the question of grazing.

Regarding tannery a simple handbook on the essentials of skinning dead cattle, treating the hide, and disposal of the fleshing and the bones, is contemplated, and the experts have been told off to produce it without delay and make it available in all provincial languages.

The Programme

For the next year the Go-Seva Sangh should, suggested Gandhiji, concentrate on making cow's milk available throughout Wardha and its neighbourhood, on sending experts to pinjrapols in order to collect material, throw out suggestions, and help in making them approximate to the ideal pinjrapol contemplated by the Sangh, and on having a laboratory in Wardha for the testing of milk and ghee, and so on. The Sangh will also try to enlist at least a thousand members.

What Shri Vinoba said at the conclusion of the proceedings was worth pondering by every member of the Sangh. "We have had so many Sanghs," he said, "and we have a fresh one now. The A. I. S. A., though it had enlisted hundreds of sacrificing workers, may be said to have only begun the great task that it has to achieve. Then came the Harijan Sevak Sangh. It took me to Nalwadi, where we now have a tannery and a parishramalaya. Then came the Village Industries Association which has set before itself a work as difficult as putting a thousand loose ends together, and in face of bazars teeming with foreign articles it looked almost a forlorn task to popularise village-made articles. Then came 'Nai Talim'—Basic Education—with regard to which we have made as yet little headway, and I have often been wondering whether I should not take up a school myself and work at it. Now this work has come upon us. It is far more difficult than those I have mentioned, and I feel nearly baffled. The whole day I have been thinking what exactly I have done for cow-protection today. For khadi I have done at least some work in that I was all the while plying my takli before you; but what did I do for cow-protection? The work needs all the skill and the resourcefulness and the purity that we can muster. I devoted twelve years to mastering the art and science of khadi, spinning eight hours a day for a long period of time. That has given me an insight which reveals me something new every day. We have, therefore, to apply ourselves to this new task with the devotion of King Dileepa and do something concrete every day for the cow as he did."

BRITISH AND AMERICAN NAZISM

If Dr. George Washington Carver had been born a white man, his name would have been as famous in the world of science as that of Burbank, Edison, or the Curies. But he was born a Negro, and so—in spite of his epoch-making discoveries in the field of science—synthesising the products of pea-nuts and potatoes and making of floor marbles and building boards from waste materials, and showing the immense potentialities of his native soil—he remains in America the shunned Negro that he was nearly 80 years ago. He was born in 1864. And yet a British explorer of the reputation of Sir Harry Johnston wrote about him: "Prof. Carver, who teaches scientific agriculture, botany, agricultural chemistry, etc. at Tuskegee, is an absolute Negro; but in the soundness of his science, he might be professor of Botany, not at Tuskegee, but at Oxford or Cambridge. Any European botanist of distinction, after ten minutes' conversation with this man, would instinctively treat him as a man on a level with himself." Dr. Carver occasionally sends his pamphlets and messages to Gandhiji, and the latest to bring these was Dr. John who was on a visit to America and incidentally visited Tuskegee. "I will not accept the messages," said Gandhiji laughing, "unless Dr. Carver comes and delivers them himself." Dr. John said Dr. Carver was too old now to come to India. But he works nevertheless in his garden, getting up every day at 4 o'clock, and remembers Gandhiji whenever he has an Indian visitor. He is so humble and simple in his habits that for weeks Dr. John mistook him for a gardener. Dr. Carver has now prepared potato powder which can keep for twenty years. The very first question that Gandhiji asked Dr. John about Dr. Carver was: "But even this genius suffers under the handicap of segregation, does not he?"

"Oh yes," said Dr. John, "as much as any Negro."

"And yet these people talk of democracy and equality! It is an utter lie," said Gandhiji in indignation.

"But," said Dr. John, "Dr. Carver is never bitter or resentful."

"I know," said Gandhiji, "that is what we believers in non-violence have to learn from him. But what about the claim of these people who are said to be fighting for democracy?"

Well he is "an absolute Negro", and when "equality" and "democracy" are mentioned the words "of the white races" are understood. That is what may be called American Nazism. The New Statesman of November 22, just to hand, describes what it terms a species of "British Nazism". The Southern Rhodesia Land Apportionment Act of 1941, which came into force in August 1941, divides the country into 49 million acres reserved for white ownership, 29 million acres for native ownership, and the rest as forest area and unassigned; it makes it obligatory on the natives now living in the "white" areas to leave by the end of 1942, unless they are labourers for Europeans. These 49 million acres are reserved for 55,000 Europeans, and the 29 million for 1,100,000 Africans. "The British Government has thus agreed to condemn a million British subjects to restriction to a third of their own country and service-villainage in the rest of it for the benefit of a minority of 55,000 British subjects. And Parliament has had no opportunity to prevent this application of a purely Nazi policy, and one, moreover, in flat contradiction of repeated Governmental statements of colonial principle, within the British Empire."

The League of Coloured Peoples addressed a memorial to the Colonial Secretary, which stated among other things: That the half of the area reserved for the European population (less than one-twentieth of the whole) includes most of the best and easily accessible lands of the country; the "Native areas" are overcrowded, inadequately watered, and infested with tsetse fly; that the policy is not even an honest policy of segregation but of compelling the blacks to toil for the whites and to own no land; that this is Hitler's plan for the conquered countries in Europe; that it is wrong to suggest that the policy is favoured by the natives; that white agriculture is a failure in Southern Rhodesia, propped up by subsidies; and that Lord Cranborne, the Colonial Secretary, should display the "backbone to stand up to the small gang of white settlers who dominate the territory." He has not the backbone. For this letter has elicited a reply signed by a Colonial Office official saying that "no useful purpose would be served by discussing the principles involved."

THE ASHRAM PRAYER

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Ashram prayer has become very popular. Its development has been spontaneous. The Ashram Bhajanavali (Hymn Book) has gone into several editions and is increasingly in demand. The birth and growth of this prayer has not been artificial. There is a history attached to almost every shloka and every selected bhajan. The Bhajanavali contains among others bhajans from Muslim Sufis and Fakirs, from Guru Nanak, and from the Christian Hymnary. Every religion seems to have found a natural setting in the prayer book.

Chinese, Burmese, Jews, Ceylonese, Muslims, Parsis, Europeans and Americans have all lived in the Ashram from time to time. In the same way two Japanese sadhus came to me in Maganwadi in 1935. One of them was with me till the other day when war broke out with Japan. He was an ideal inmate of our home in Sevagram. He took part in every activity with zest. I never heard of his quarrelling with anyone. He was a silent worker. He learnt as much Hindi as he could. He was a strict observer of his vows. Every morning and evening he could be seen going round with his drum and heard chanting his mantra. The evening worship always commenced with his mantra नम्यो हो रणे क्यो, which means "I bow to the Buddha, the giver of true religion." I shall never forget the quickness, the orderliness, and utter detachment with which he prepared himself the day the police came without notice to take him away from the Ashram. He took leave of me after reciting his favourite mantra and left his drum with me. "You are leaving us, but your mantra will remain an integral part of our Ashram prayer," were the words that came spontaneously to my lips. Since then, in spite of his absence, our morning and evening worship has commenced with the mantra. For me it is a constant reminder of Sadhu Keshav's purity and single-eyed devotion. Indeed its efficacy lies in that sacred memory.

While Sadhu Keshav was still with us Bibi Raihana Tyabji also came to stay at Sevagram for a few days. I knew her to be a devout Muslim but was not aware, before the death of her illustrious father, of how well-versed she was in Koran Sharif. When that jewel of Gujarat, Tyabji Saheb, expired no sound of weeping broke the awful silence in his room. The latter echoed with Bibi Raihana's sonorous recitation of verses from the Koran. Such as Abbas Tyabji Saheb cannot die. He is ever alive in the example of national service which he has left behind. Bibi Raihana is an accomplished singer with an ample repertory of bhajans of all kinds. She used to sing daily as well as recite beautiful verses from the Koran. I asked her to teach some verses to any of the inmates who could learn them, and she gladly did so. Like so many who come here she had become one of us. Raihana went away when her visit was over, but she has left a fragrant reminder of herself. The well-known 'al Fateha' has been included in the Ashram worship. The following is a translation of it:

1. I take refuge in Allah from Satan the accursed,
2. Say: He is God, the one and only
God, the Eternal, Absolute,
He begetteth not nor is He begotten,
And there is none like unto Him.
3. Praise be to God,
The Cherisher and Sustainer of the worlds,
Most Gracious, most Merciful,
Master of the Day of Judgment,
Thee do we worship
And Thine aid we seek.
Show us the straight way,
The way of those on whom
Thou hast bestowed Thy Grace,
Those whose (portion) is not wrath
And who go not astray."

I am writing this note in reply to an ardent Hindu friend who has thus gently reproached me: "You have now given the Kalma a place in the Ashram. What further remains to be done to kill your Hinduism?"

I am confident that my Hinduism and that of the other Ashram Hindus has grown thereby. There should be in us an equal reverence for all religions. Badshah Khan, whenever he comes, joins in the worship here with delight. He loves the tune to which the Ramayana is sung, and he listens intently to the Gita. His faith in Islam has not lessened thereby. Then why may I not listen to the Koran with equal reverence and adoration in my heart?

Vinoba and Pyarelal studied Arabic and learnt the Koran in jail. Their Hinduism has been enriched by this study. I believe that Hindu-Muslim unity will come only through such spontaneous mingling of hearts and no other. Rama is not known by only a thousand names. His names are innumerable, and He is the same whether we call him Allah, Khuda, Rahim, Razzak, the Breadgiver, or any name that comes from the heart of a true devotee.

JAMNALALJI

"The angel

Came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,

And lo! Sheth Jaman's name led all the rest."

Those who knew Jamnalalji — and the hundreds of telegrams that have been pouring in from places far and near show that the number of that blessed company was great — will not feel unhappy over the alteration I have made in Leigh Hunt's famous lines about Abou Ben Adhem. I do not know if on the fateful afternoon of the 11th Jamnalalji had a vision of any Angel come to receive him in the region of the blessed. But if he had, I am sure he must have spoken to him:

"Low but cheerly still; and said,

I pray thee then,

Write me as one that loves his fellowmen."

* * *

Never since the sudden and premature death of Maganlal Gandhi in 1928 had any bereavement dealt such a staggering blow on Gandhiji as the sudden and premature death of Jamnalalji. Words fail me when I attempt to describe his feeling of desolation. For two days he bore up bravely consoling the bereaved widow and the aged mother, but on the third day he broke down as he was saying: "Childless people adopt sons. But Jamnalalji adopted me as father. He should have been an heir to my all. Instead he has left me an heir to his all." The feeling of desolation is, if I may say so, universal. Wardha and Sevagram, even with Bapu and Ba in it, look dreary without Jamnalalji. The numerous institutions he had founded or helped in founding will experience a piercing sense of void without his sunny presence. Even the meetings of the Congress Working Committee must be dull and dreary without his scintillating and outspoken commonsense.

The feeling of loneliness that has come over most of us may be judged from these few lines from Vallabhbhai's letter:

"He had vowed not to sit in a train or a motor car, and his vow was to terminate on the 15th. He had promised thereafter to come and have rest with me in Hajira. Instead he has gone to his eternal rest. No death could have been better. But as the proverb goes, 'Let a hundred die, but not the nourisher of a hundred.' Hundreds upon hundreds of our workers in various parts of our country must be shedding silent tears in their cottages. Bapu has lost a true son; Jankidevi and the family a true shelter; the country a loyal servant; the Congress a stately pillar; the cow her true friend and many institutions their patron; and we have lost a beloved blood brother. I feel so desolate and forlorn."

* * *

Everyone mourns his loss. Amongst the mourners are not only his friends of the Working Committee, not only his friends in the business world like the Birlas and the Tatas, Sir Purushottamdas and others, not only his numerous co-workers the humblest of whom he had brothered and befriended, but countless others who received his help without the world ever knowing it. The meeting to mourn his death held in Wardha was addressed by members of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Muslim League, and a Muslim barrister paid him a fine tribute. He said without Jamnalalji's sympathy and timely help the Anglo-Urdu School would not have been in existence. He had the priceless gift of friendship which endeared him to all, and everyone under his roof felt completely at home. He had literally broken the barriers of the family of his blood relationship, and made himself member of a vaster family to which men and women of all races and creeds belonged. Above all he had broken the barrier that wealth and position often create. His employees and his servants were members of his family, and they shared their joys and sorrows with him in an unstinted measure. There are few wealthy men on earth so utterly void of affectation and snobbery, so utterly innocent of possession and propriety (I mean ownership), so utterly free from communalism or provincialism, and so overflowing with the milk of human kindness.

Like some of those rare men who are gifted with the power of sublimating their desires and their passions, he was gifted with the power to sublimate his sense of possession. He followed the master cheerfully through all the numerous vicissitudes of the latter's life, because although 'he had great possessions', he had divested himself of the sense of proprietorship in them. Born of an obscure family in a waterless village in Jaipur State, he was adopted by a rich man from the same State who had settled in Wardha. Even the poor parents would not part with their child, until the rich Bachhrajji from Wardha promised to dig a well in the village. The boy was brought up by the adoptive father, and after two or three years in a Hindi school was put into business. Once he incurred the rage of this hot-tempered father who reminded him of the riches he had come into possession of without labouring for them. He was just 17 then. He addressed a letter to the father couched in terms of humility and firmness characteristic of the Jamnalalji of future years. The letter is in Marwadi, and some of the idiom of the language is untranslatable. But the substance may be given here :

"You were so angry with me today. It was God's will, and you had a right to be angry in that you have adopted me. It is not your fault, rather is it the fault of those who gave me in adoption. The money is yours, and you may do whatever you like with it. I am sorry for the expenses you have incurred on me so far, but from this moment I will not touch a pie out of your money. I have no right against you, and I would implore you not to be anxious about me. May God keep you for many more years. Wherever I go I shall pray for your welfare. Pray pardon me for having irritated you. I hope you never believed that I served you because of your money. Please dismiss that thought from your mind, if you ever had it. I care not for wealth, I pray that I may never forget the name of God who alone can keep me happy in this and in the next life. And pray be of good cheer and don't sorrow over my going. All earthly relationship is hollow. The worldly possessions hold you in their grip. Thank God you have freed me today from their deadly grip. And please rest assured that I will not go to law to claim a pie of what is yours. This is a regular release-deed on a stamped paper, and it declares that you owe me no obligation whatsoever. I owe no debts that you need repay. Use your money in charity, swear not at sadhus and others, as is your wont, but please them with whatever money you can give. I am taking nothing from the house — nothing but the clothes that cover me."

The father relented, implored the son tearfully to stay, and he stayed. Sturdy commonsense and innate business skill enabled him to earn lakhs and give in charity five times the wealth he had inherited from the adoptive father. If he stayed home in response to the father's importunations, he knew he was a trustee of the father's wealth. Consciously or unconsciously that was his first lesson in the theory of trusteeship. The father who had adopted him taught that first lesson, the father he later adopted initiated him into the deep implications of it.

Similarly he had the virtue of fearlessness which the absence of a slavish education had left unimpaired. He had silenced Tommies travelling first and second and trying to bully him; he would not serve wines at a party he gave in honour of a Governor; to a Commissioner who said that the Chief Commissioner would not open his school unless he promised to be more loyal, he had said he would do without that costly privilege, and to a D. S. P. whom he was interviewing and who had remarked: "How I wish the boat that is carrying Tilak to England may go to the bottom of the sea," he had said: "You forget that there are numerous Englishmen on the boat!"

This fearlessness came into full play during the twenty years of his public life under Gandhiji's leadership. President Kruger was unlettered and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek knows no English. Ignorance of English was no handicap to them. It had in fact left the native vigour of their minds unspoilt. Even so with Jamnalalji. He could see the implications of an intricately worded Congress resolution quicker than many other members, and he would often raise his warning voice lest the Committee should put their foot into seemingly innocent propositions. It was he who raised earliest the question of moral and material co-operation in the war and who said that a nation of shopkeepers could not be duped by the promise of moral co-operation.

Treasurer of the nation's wealth he was also the treasurer of the nation's honour. He was among the very few capitalists who recklessly threw themselves in the fray for the nation's freedom and bore the rigours of imprisonment every time the call was made. His faith burnt brightest when that of others flickered in times of stress and strain and dark despair. It was to revive the faith of others that when Gandhiji was in jail under a six years' term of imprisonment that he donated Rs. 2,50,000 and founded the Gandhi Seva Sangh. Politics he could understand, but he often regarded it as a sorry game which might soil one's heart and soul. And so he had early set his heart on the constructive part of the Congress programme: Khadi to which he gave his wealth, his time, his organising ability and his devotion; Harijan uplift for which he risked the wrath of his hide-bound community, threw open the first big temple in India to the Harijans, and gave to Gandhiji the whole of the income of the Harijan village — Sevagram — for the Harijans' welfare; Hindu-Muslim unity for which he cheerfully bore heavy blows in the course of a riot, and earnestness for which won him distinguished men like the Khan Sahebs as brothers and women like Raihanaben and the Captain Sisters as sisters; Village industries for which he gave away a precious part of his patrimony; Women's cause to which he devoted a good deal of his wealth and time; and the Cow to whose cause he dedicated his life.

Who could have been blessed with a richer life of service? And yet one could notice in various utterances of his a longing for something he had not yet achieved. His sense of truth and justice was keen even to harshness, so far at any rate as he was concerned. Before he met Gandhiji he had worshipped at many shrines. Gandhiji seemed to settle his mind, and Gandhiji's fierce passion for truth made him long to be his son. "Blessed will be the moment when I shall be worthy of being known as Mahatmaji's son," he wrote in 1923. "It is due to his infinite mercy that I have learnt at least to see my weaknesses and failings." He was often overwhelmed by a sense of his spiritual shortcomings, and he often longed to retire from all public activities. It was this spirit that endeared him to Gandhiji more than the sacrifice of material possessions, almost incomparably great as this was. And that was what made him the proud recipient of two characteristic letters from Gandhiji written from jail. In one of these he wrote:

"As I proceed in my search for truth it grows upon me that Truth comprehends everything. It is not in ahimsa, but ahimsa is in it. What is perceived by a pure heart and intellect is truth for that moment. Cling to it, and it enables one to reach pure Truth. There is no question there of a divided duty. But often enough it is difficult to decide what is ahimsa. For instance, the use of disinfectants is himsa, and yet we cannot do without it. We have to live a life of ahimsa in the midst of a world of himsa, and that is possible only if we cling to truth. That is how I deduce ahimsa from truth. Out of truth emanate love, tenderness, humility. A votary of truth has to be humble as the dust. His humility increases with his observance of truth. I see this every moment of my life. I have a much vivid sense of truth and of my own littleness than I had a year ago. The wonderful implication of the great truth 'Brahma satyam jaganmithya' (Brahman is real, all else unreal) grows on me from day to day. It teaches us patience. This will purge us of harshness and add to our tolerance. It will make us magnify the mole-hills of our errors into mountains, and minimise the mountains of others' errors into mole-hills. The body persists because of egoism. The utter extinction of the body of egoism is moksha. He who has achieved this will be the very image of Truth, or one may call it Brahman.

Therefore the loving name of God is Dasanudas (Servant of servants). Wife, children, friends, possessions—all should be held subservient to Truth. Each one of these should be sacrificed in the search for Truth. Only then can one be a satyagrahi. I have thrown myself into this movement with a view to making the observance of this principle comparatively easy, and it is with the same object that I do not hesitate to plunge men like you in it. Its outward form is Hind Swaraj. This Swaraj is being delayed because there is yet to be found a satyagrahi of that type. This, however, need not dismay us. It should spur us on to greater effort."

And another:

"Moksha is liberation from impure thought. Complete extinction of impure thought is impossible without ceaseless penance. There is only one way to achieve this. The moment an impure thought arises, confront it with a pure one. This is possible only with God's grace, and God's grace comes through ceaseless communion with Him and complete self-surrender. This communion may in the beginning be just a lip repetition of His name even disturbed by impure thoughts. But ultimately what is on the lips will possess the heart. And there is another thing to bear in mind. The mind may wander, but let not the senses wander with it. If the senses wander where the mind takes them, one is done for. But he who keeps control of the physical senses will some day be able to bring impure thoughts under control. . . . Impure thoughts need not dismay you. We are monarchs of the domain of Effort. God is sole Monarch of the domain of Result. . . . You know what to do to create a pure atmosphere about you. Spare diet, sight fixed on the earth below, and impatience with oneself to the extent of plucking the eye out if 'it offends thee'."

Nourished on food like this, he grew from self-introspection to more self-introspection. Constant companionship with Vinoba, who had managed the Satyagrahashram at Wardha since the beginning, was a great help in the process. He had immense self-confidence. He knew that, if some day the crown of thorns of Congress Presidentship were to be bestowed on him, he would be equal to the burden. But his heart quailed when he thought of the spiritual journey he had still to do before entering the Kingdom of Heaven. It was not because he had riches. Ownership in these he had cast away. But there were other things needed. And in order to purge himself of all dross he took the greatest step of his life—dedicating himself to the service of the cow. He left his house—the house which had lodged guests like Presidents of the Congress, Lord Lothian, H. E. Tai Chi Tao, Dr. John Mott, and the Egyptian Delegation—and went to live in a hut which he called Gopuri. Here he did his spinning, tended his cows with the devotion of King Dileepa, and kept a careful record of his thoughts and acts from day to day. As we visited the hut on the day he passed away we saw on the little desk in front of his feet his diary written up complete to the day of his death. Even so his life was complete and regular and God-fearing. He had dedicated this to Mother Cow, in order that she may be for him the Kamadugha* that Cow Nandini had been to King Dileepa. Whether the death that came to him was the blessing given him by the Cow it is difficult to say. Perhaps it was. For no death could be more desirable. Almost until the last moment he was thinking of his Cow and his Gopuri, and when the end came it was so sudden and so quick that it seemed as though he had slipped into blissful peace. But whether the Cow had really proved his Kamadugha, there is no doubt that by his dedicated life he had rendered himself Gandhiji's Kamadugha. It was he who had made it possible for Gandhiji to settle first in Wardha and then in Sevagram, and it was he who was the living link between the outside world and Gandhiji. His death removes the link and leaves both Gandhiji and the outside world much poorer.

PLEA FOR CALMNESS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The recent British reverses ought not to create panic in the land. In all the wars that Britain has fought or in which she has been engaged there have been reverses some of which may be considered disastrous. But the British have a knack of surviving them and turning them into stepping-stones to success. Hence the saying peculiar to them that they blunder through to success. Failures do not dismay or demoralise them. They take them with calmness and in a sportsmanlike spirit. Wars are for them a national game like football. The defeated team heartily congratulates the successful one almost as if it was a joint victory, and drowns the sorrow of defeat in an exchange of glasses of whisky. If we have learnt nothing worth from the contact with the British, let us at least learn their calmness in the face of misfortunes.

And is there the slightest cause for alarm? Certainly not for those who believe in non-violence. For fear and distrust of self are no part of their composition, nor are they part of a panoplied soldier. The attribute of non-violence is perhaps only a copy book maxim. We do not see it in actual practice in any measure. But this war is abundant proof that neither party though steeped in violence betrays any fear or distrust. I am filled with amazement and admiration at the reckless bravery displayed by combatants on either side. This war is a demonstration of the unthinkable nerve that human beings are capable of possessing. Looked at from either standpoint, therefore, we should be ashamed of fear, distrust and nervelessness in the face of danger. It is, therefore, the sacred duty of every worker to steel himself against cowardly panic and prevent its spread as far as he can. "Cowards die many times before their death." Let this not be proved of us.

The true danger exists only for cities. It may be very near due to the fall of Singapore and probable loss of Burma. One of the best precautions consists in those people who are not wanted in the cities or those who want to shun danger, migrating to the villages in an orderly manner. There should be no panicky rush. Those who must remain in the cities whether for business or otherwise should carry out instructions that may be issued by the authorities from time to time. Those who will not, for any reason whatsoever, should clear out in good time. If this simple precaution is taken, we may face the future without perturbation. More I cannot say, for we are a house divided against itself and there is no living bond between the rulers and the ruled. It is tragic but it is true. The tragedy is deepened by the knowledge that all parties feel so helpless.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Eternal Problem

Q. Why can't you see that whilst there is possession it must be defended against all odds? Therefore your insistence that violence should be eschewed in all circumstances is utterly unworkable and absurd. I think non-violence is possible only for select individuals.

A. This question has been answered often enough in some form or other in these columns as also in those of Young India. But it is an evergreen. I must answer it as often as it is put, especially when it comes from an earnest seeker as this one does. I claim that even now, though the social structure is not based on a conscious acceptance of non-violence, all the world over mankind lives and men retain their possessions on the sufferance of one another. If they had not done so, only the fewest and the most ferocious would have survived. But such is not the case. Families are bound together by ties of love, and so are groups in the so-called civilised society called nations. Only they do not recognise the supremacy of the law of non-violence. It follows, therefore, that they have not investigated its vast possibilities. Hitherto out of sheer inertia, shall I say, we have taken it for granted that complete non-violence is possible only for the few who take the vow of non-possession and the allied abstinences. Whilst it is true that the votaries alone can carry on research work and declare from time to time the new possibilities of the great eternal law governing man, if it is the law, it must hold good for all. The many failures we see are not of the law but of the followers, many of whom do not even know that they are under that law wilfully. When a mother dies for her child she unknowingly obeys the law. I have been pleading for the past fifty years for a conscious acceptance of the law and its zealous practice even in the face of failures. Fifty years' work has shown marvellous results and strengthened my faith. I do claim that by constant practice we shall come to a state of things when lawful possession will command universal and voluntary respect. No doubt such possession will not be tainted. It will not be an insolent demonstration of the inequalities that surround us everywhere. Nor need the problem of unjust and unlawful possessions appal the votary of non-violence. He has at his disposal the non-violent weapon of satyagraha and non-cooperation which hitherto has been found to be a complete substitute of violence whenever it has been applied honestly in sufficient measure. I have never claimed to present the complete science of non-violence. It does not lend itself to such treatment. So far as I know no single physical science does, not even the very precise science of mathematics. I am but a seeker, and I have fellow seekers like the questioner whom I invite to accompany me in the very difficult but equally fascinating search.

NOT NECESSARILY IMPURE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Thus writes Shri Shankerrao Dev:

"In the last issue of Harijan, in your article 'A Deplorable Incident' you say to the rich: 'Earn your crores by all means. But understand that your wealth is not yours; it belongs to the people. Take what you require for your legitimate needs, and use the remainder for society.' When I read this, the first question that arose in my mind was: 'Why first earn crores and then use them for society? As society today is constituted the means of earning crores are bound to be impure; and one who earns crores by impure means cannot be expected to follow the mantram तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः; because in the very process of earning crores by impure means the man's character is bound to be tainted or vitiated. And moreover you have always been emphasising the purity of means. But I am afraid that there is a possibility of people misunderstanding that you are laying an emphasis here more on the ends than on the means.

I request you to emphasise as much, if not more, the purity of means of earning money as on spending. If purity of means is strictly observed, then, according to me, crores could not be accumulated at all and the difficulty of spending for society will assume a very minor prospect."

I must demur. Surely a man may conceivably make crores through strictly pure means, assuming that a man may legitimately possess riches. For the purpose of my argument, I have assumed that private possession itself is not held to be impure. If I own a mining lease and I tumble upon a diamond of rare value, I may suddenly find myself a millionaire without being held guilty of having used impure means. This actually happened when Cullinan diamond, much more valuable than the Kohinoor, was found. Such instances can be easily multiplied. My argument was surely addressed to such men. I have no hesitation in endorsing the proposition that generally rich men and for that matter most men are not particular as to the way they make money. In the application of the method of non-violence one must believe in the possibility of every person, however depraved, being reformed under humane and skilled treatment. We must appeal to the good in human beings and expect response. Is it not conducive to the well-being of society that every member uses all his talents, only not for personal aggrandisement but for the good of all? We do not want to produce a dead equality where every person becomes or is rendered incapable of using his ability to the utmost possible extent. Such a society must ultimately perish. I therefore suggest that my advice that monied men may earn their crores (honestly only, of course) but so as to dedicate them to the service of all is perfectly sound. तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः is a mantra based on uncommon knowledge. It is the surest method to evolve a new order of life of universal benefit in the place of the present one where each one lives for himself without regard to what happens to his neighbour.

NOT QUITE

(By K. G. Mashruwala)

"A pedagogue and psychiatrist" sends a short essay on 'The problem of violence' in which inter alia he says:

"Non-violence is not a negation of anything. It is a positive assertion of moral courage to take risks for resisting forces of evil. It is developed by an irresistible will for self-purification.....

The cure of violence consists in adopting an attitude of sympathetic indifference to its struggles and benevolent neutrality in its conflicts. Believers in non-violence should resort to a policy of non-participation and non-opposition to its attempts. It should be allowed to relax and be benefited by the punishment of its actions as it fails to profit by appeals of reason, fair play and justice.....

The whole life of violence is patterned on the Telugu proverb, Maku arogyam, maku ayushyam, maku dhanam, miku rinam (To us health, to us life, to us wealth, to you obligations)."

The conception of non-violence as expressed in the second paragraph of the correspondent's letter is not altogether correct. On closer examination it will be seen that it takes away a good deal of what is stated in the first paragraph. Non-violence would not justify itself fully, if it satisfied itself simply by "adopting an attitude of sympathetic indifference" and "benevolent neutrality" towards violence and resorting to a policy of "non-opposition to its attempts", and allowing it "to relax and be benefited by the punishment of its actions".

The fact that in the present war it is not possible to go beyond this attitude should not be taken to mean that non-violence has evolved and worked itself out to its fullest extent. It is the result of the unpreparedness of pacifists, who are yet no more than children in the kindergarten of non-violence.

If non-violence is a truly effective force, it should develop sufficient strength to intervene in violent conflicts in a very effective manner, and bring about a peaceful solution of the points of dispute before and not after the belligerents are exhausted and 'punished' by their own actions. It will have been no virtue of non-violence, if there is peace as a result of total destruction.

Extinguishing agents can take no credit, when a fire is extinguished because there is no more of inflammable material left for it to burn.

I have often heard it said that this total war itself is going to pave the way for a non-violent order. This is quite possible. But the compulsory adoption of a non-violent civilisation will not necessarily bring contentment and happiness to the world. Violence asleep is no more non-violence than the peace of 1918 was an end of war. Peace and non-violent order that will contribute to man's progress and happiness must result from the true awakening of the nations to an appreciation of non-violence and not from a state of coma after the war.

PASSING OF THE FIRST STAGE OF THE A. I. V. I. A.

( By J. C. Kumarappa )

The A. I. V. I. A. has just passed its first seven years and has entered the second and therefore more responsible stage. Thanks to our education most of us sophisticated ones are strangers to village industries and village conditions. We learn Western capitalistic economics and shout for "facts and figures", without knowing how to read them. We are strangers in our own land. It is this phenomenon that has necessitated the A. I. V. I. A. having to pass through this early stage. In these seven years we have cultivated a nodding acquaintance with a few village industries, have begun to recognise the rudiments of village economics, carried on a few experiments in the processes, and attempted a reorganisation of some industries.

Necessarily during this period the Association worked within a restricted area in a highly centralised manner. We now pass to the second stage. We find the country is awaiting a well-formulated constructive programme. In order to facilitate the spreading of the work of the Association we have to decentralise its work. To this end a new constitution has been framed so as to provide for provincial organisations working under Sanchalaks and Secretaries. Gandhiji himself has assumed the helm as President of the Association to steer it through the uncharted course before us in the immediate future, and the following members form the new Board of Management :

1. Shri Laxmidas P. Asar, 2. Shri Shankerlal Banker, 3. Smt. Goshiben Captain, 4. Shri Jairamdas Doulatram, 5. Shri Profulla Chandra Ghosh, 6. Shri Shrikrishnadas Jaju, 7. Shri Bharatan Kumarappa, 8. Shri J. C. Kumarappa (Secretary), 9. Shri Vaikunthrai L. Mehta, 10. Shri Dhiren Mazumdar, 11. Shri Shoorji Vallabhdas.

The provincial organisations will develop their own methods of carrying out the policy laid down by the Board. They may have a central institution, like Maganwadi, in a convenient rural setting where teaching and training of workers will go on side by side with the practical working of some industries chosen from the promising industries of the province. They will carry on propaganda to popularise the products of village industries and educate the people in the underlying philosophy of this movement. This war has helped to demonstrate to us, more clearly than ever, that our salvation lies in the strength of our village organisations. The seed of destruction innate in centralised organisations has sprouted with a vengeance, dispersing the overcrowded population of the cities, threatened by the avarice of invaders, back to the safety of their villages.

The Board met early this month and has framed rules to govern affiliation of allied institutions, recognition of producing centres, and certification of dealers in village products.

In view of the fact that most of the village tanned leather is from non-slaughtered animals, it decided to give the support of the Association to the village tanning industry by confining sales of leather goods at shops certified by the Association to those made out of hide of non-slaughtered buffaloes, cows and bullocks.

We hope that in the next few years, with the unstinted co-operation of those who have a living faith in this non-violent foundation of economic structure of human activities, the country will be studded with A. I. V. I. A. centres radiating hope to the desperate, bringing food to the hungry and happiness to all.

[One would have thought that I had enough on my hands without taking the additional burden of the Presidentship of the A. I. V. I. A. I have been its guide ever since its inception, but the importunity of the Board was irresistible. Readers will lighten my task by sharing it with me by (a) becoming members, (b) contributing funds, (c) contributing solid work.

Three Essentials

Assuming the presence of the will among the millions, rapid spread of hand-spinning is possible only by the adoption of the following three things :

1. Use of unginne cotton from the nearest spot when it is not grown on one's own plot.

2. Ginning it on a polished board with an iron or smooth wooden rod and carding the cotton by manipulation of the cotton with fingers assisted by a wooden knife made on the spot. This process is called tunai (तुनाई).

3. Spinning the slivers on the dhanush takli.

Hand gins cannot be manufactured to order today. All available unginne cotton should be prepared first by the method explained in 2 above.

Where unginne cotton is not available ginned cotton from factories has got to be used. It too lends itself to tunai, though much more time is required for carding by the tunai process when bale cotton has to be used. Where a carding bow is available, naturally it will be used. But what is true of ginning is equally true of carding. It is not possible to manufacture bows and gut in a moment. Tunai is a method devised and being perfected by Shri Vinoba with an artist's skill and ardour.

When spinning spreads among the millions it will be impossible to supply slivers from a centre or centres. The utmost that is possible is for families or groups to set apart one or two hands per a fixed number for carding. The ideal, the best, and in the long run the quickest, way is for each one to prepare his own slivers. It makes spinning more interesting, and the variety of occupation breaks the monotony.

I suggest that, though the crisis is not yet felt and the mills are working, khadi workers will do well from now to adopt the suggestions I have made. When the crisis does come, we shall then be found ready.

GOSEVA SANGH RESOLUTIONS

(Passed at the Conference recently held at Wardha)

1. Whereas India is primarily an agricultural country, 80 per cent of its people being dependent on agriculture, and whereas Indian agriculture depends on bullocks, and whereas the cow is not only the milk-and-ghee-giver but also the sole means of providing bullocks, this Conference is definitely of opinion that the improvement of the present condition and economic status of the cow and her progeny is more important than that of other cattle and indispensable in any scheme of economic planning on a national basis.

2. Whereas to underfeed animals, to keep them in an insanitary condition, to overload them, to take more work from them than they can give, to beat them, to torture them with spikes, and the cruel 'phooka' is wholly against humanitarian principles, and whereas such practices decrease the utility of the animals, this Conference appeals to the general public and in a special way to the members of the Goseva Sangh and other cow lovers to arouse the public conscience and make the utmost effort to put a stop to such inhuman treatment and where necessary to seek the assistance of the law.

3. Whereas the real object of pinjrapols and charitable goshalas is to give asylum to diseased, old and disabled cattle and save them from pain and slaughter, this Conference is of opinion that in order effectively to achieve the object the following reforms in their management and programme of work are essential:

(a) Every institution should provide proper maintenance and veterinary and other scientific facilities for cattle. These facilities should also be made available to the neighbouring public.

(b) It should be the duty of the institution to see to it that scrub animals are not allowed to procreate. It should be incumbent on the management to arrange for proper feeding and care of well-bred cows as also for improvement in the breed of cattle with a view to producing cows who will yield more milk and bullocks capable of doing more work.

(c) Every institution should keep good bulls whose services should be available to the general public also.

(d) Every institution should, as far as possible, make provision for spacious dry cattle farms where the dry cows and calves of the neighbouring public may be kept at concession rates. Good bulls should also be kept.

(e) Every institution should make arrangements for producing green grass and fodder in ample measure and for preserving the same by means of silage etc.

(f) The buildings of pinjrapols should be constructed so as to ensure cleanliness and healthy living. Wells, water troughs, etc. should be scientifically planned on a uniform model.

(g) There should be an expert in animal husbandry in charge of each institution. He should have thorough knowledge of cattle farming, fodder cultivation and veterinary science.

4. Whereas it is desirable that all those institutions which accept the Conference resolution regarding pinjrapols should be conducted on uniform lines and efficiently managed, the Conference recommends to them to obtain certificates from and affiliate themselves with the Goseva Sangh.

The Conference recommends to the Goseva Sangh to frame the necessary rules in order to facilitate certification and affiliation of institutions, and to invite existing pinjrapols and goshalas to get themselves affiliated to the Sangh.

FOUR YEARS' WORK

The Basic Scheme of Education as propounded by Gandhiji over four years ago has met and continues to meet with a storm of opposition from certain quarters. It is in the nature of things that anything so wholly revolutionary should be opposed by those who have been nurtured on certain traditions. Most people admit that the present system of education has not been of the type suited to our conditions of life or in keeping with our rich heritage of culture, all deplore the fact that the vast majority in this land are wholly illiterate and uneducated, and yet because of political differences any scheme emanating from however pure a motive is apt to create prejudices in the minds of those belonging to a different school of political thought and therefore does not always get a fair trial. The Wardha scheme has had to battle against such odds. Inasmuch as compulsory primary education has always been declared impossible because of lack of funds, Gandhiji claimed that his scheme, apart from its own intrinsic value of method, had the additional qualification of becoming self-supporting up to a point and after a certain stage if the State would make provision for the sale of the articles produced in the schools. He still adheres to this claim, but nowhere did he even say that the schools would be self-supporting straightaway. It stands to reason that in all craft schools there must be an initial cost of equipment. Spinning was chosen in the first instance as the craft pre-eminently suitable for children of all ages and for village children in particular. It is the one craft about which, thanks to him, there is expert knowledge in our country. The main objections, however, to the scheme are that after a couple of years or in some cases only after a year the schools are not self-supporting and that spinning has not proved a suitable craft. There is nothing in the Zakir Husain Report to show that the sponsors of the scheme wanted spinning to be the only craft. But experts and text-books are lacking and cannot be produced in a day. Moreover the lack of trained teachers in an entirely new type of education cannot be made good in a short time either. All these handicaps the Talimi Sangh has had to face. In addition, Congress popular Governments, who were out to give the scheme as fair a trial as possible, went out of office, and hence in certain provinces the scheme suffered. Notwithstanding all these difficulties the third annual report of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh just published makes interesting reading and should be studied with an impartial mind.

Basic Schools

The Governments of the C. P. and Berar, Bihar, U. P., and Orissa started a certain number of schools and training schools as an official experiment.

So have done the States of Kashmir and Rajgarh. In addition there are some non-government agencies who have taken up the scheme, such as the Jamia Millia Islamia in Delhi, The Rashtriya Gramshala at Thamna, Kheda Dt. Gujarat, the Tilak Maharashtra Vidyapith, Poona, the Gurukul at Kangri, the Ramakrishna Vidyalaya at Periyarayanpalayam, Coimbatore District, the Friends' Settlement at Hoshangabad, and the Vijay Vidyamandir of Avidha (Rajpipla State). The District Council of Raipur (C. P.) has had its teachers trained at the Vidyamandir training schools and has introduced the basic syllabus in 15 of its schools.

Progress

Naturally progress of the experiment varies from province to province and from institution to institution according to the interpretation of the fundamental principles of the scheme and the faith and efficiency of the teachers. But the various reports give one ample hope that, given the right type of workers, the experiment will fulfil its original expectations.

The Bihar Government, through its Board of Basic Education composed of officials and non-official educationists, was the only Government to make a careful assessment of the result of the experiment in its province, and the Sangh has published their report in the form of a booklet. Conferences and exhibitions, of which two have been held in Poona and Delhi, have been another means of finding out what progress is being made. The Delhi Conference among its various findings recorded "with satisfaction that the reports on the working of basic schools run by the Government, local bodies and by private enterprise are almost unanimous that general standards of health and behaviour as well as intellectual attainment are very encouraging. The children in basic schools are more active, cheerful, self-reliant, their power of self-expression is well developed, they are acquiring habits of co-operative work, and social prejudices are breaking down." The following from the report of the Board of Inspectors in Bihar bears quotation: "Champaran was specially selected as the first field of experiment as one of the most backward areas in the province. At the time of the introduction of basic education there were only five primary schools and one middle school in the entire area. . . . Everything in the home and life of the child tends to hinder the growth of children. . . . We had not only to examine whether the required habits of body and mind and the proper spirit were being acquired by the children, but also to find out how far the same could be attributed to the use of the media to which basic education attached importance." They then give their findings in detail. In regard to skill and efficiency in the craft the children had attained a fair measure of success, there being a marked improvement over the previous year. In regard to discipline too there seemed to be distinct progress not only in the class room but also in the playing field and in meetings and gatherings. There was an absence of noise and scramble for places, jostling and pushing, which are always present in children's gatherings. Development of intelligence had been achieved to an appreciable extent. "Considering the backwardness of the area the results obtained were really very encouraging." Lethargy and listlessness were being gradually overcome, and children were finding pleasure in good work for its own sake. The progress in the development of habits of systematic and thorough work was not up to the required standard, nor had the children developed enough of the spirit of inquiry and power of observation. They were, however, becoming aware of their social environment, and there was noticeable progress in co-operation and service. Personal cleanliness, a sense of orderliness, self-expression had definitely developed, and there was a definite development in the whole personality of the child.

Kashmir reports that the mental content of the pupils has been considerably enriched under the basic syllabus. Teachers are looked upon as friends. The children are definitely neater, tidier, smarter, and show signs of an awakened sense of responsibility. The average attendance has shown a marked upward tendency, the children show a fairly good sense of colour harmony in their picture sketches, they take a delight in flowers and pet animals, and are keenly inquisitive, always eager to know the why, how and wherefore of the things and persons surrounding them, they take a keen interest in decorating their class rooms and the school museum, they have their own garden, they thoroughly enjoy monthly excursions, they edit their daily news bulletins themselves, they run a stationery shop and a savings bank of their own, the cleanliness of the class rooms is their own responsibility, they help in the village and in their homes in sweeping and scavenging, they have even repaired roads and dug drains.

The C. P. Government admits that children working under this syllabus are more alert, well-behaved, cleaner and more systematic in work than those in ordinary schools.

The Bombay Special Officer of Basic Education says their boys have been making steady progress in mental and physical development. A sense of service has been generated, and children are more attentive, accurate and frugal in habits.

The Vijay Vidyamandir in Rajpipla State notes a great change in the attitude of the children. They are cleaner and more keen on their studies, more alert and quick. They are slowly becoming self-supporting.

FIERY ORDEAL

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Twentytwo years ago a young man with the bloom of thirty springs upon him came to me and said, "I want to ask something of you."

"Ask, and it shall be given, if it is at all within my power to give," I replied with some surprise.

"Regard me as your son Devadas," the young man said.

"Agreed," I replied. "Only I am giving nothing, you are the giver."

The young man was no other than Jamnalal Bajaj. People know something of what this sacrament meant. But few know the extent of the part played by the self-adopted son. Never before, I can say, was a mortal blessed with a 'son' like him. Of course I have many sons and daughters in the sense that they have done some of my work. But Jamnalalji surrendered himself and his without reservation. There is hardly any activity of mine in which I did not receive his full-hearted co-operation and in which it did not prove to be of the greatest value. He was gifted with a quick intelligence. He was a merchant prince. He placed at my disposal his ample possessions. He became guardian of my time and my health. And he did it all for the public good. The day he died he and Jankidevi were to come to me. But he died almost at the very hour he should have been with me. Never before have I felt so forlorn except when Maganlal was snatched from me fourteen years ago. But I had no doubt then, as I have none now, that a calamity of that kind is a blessing in disguise. God wants to try me through and through. I live in the faith that He will give me the strength too to pass through the ordeal.

Mean and Vindictive

Owing to my preoccupations due to the untimely death of Jamnalalji I have not been able to attend to even important matters. I have just learnt of the arrests of Shri Hare Krushna Mahtab, a staunch believer in non-violence, and other workers. Shri Mahtab wanted to be bailed out. But the application has been rejected. I hope the matter will be taken to the High Court. It is preposterous that bail should be refused in such cases. I have learnt further that the Orissa Ministry has effected these arrests in order to prevent a motion of no confidence being carried at the forthcoming meeting of the Orissa Legislature. If this is true, the action is mean and vindictive. Let us hope that the members of the Orissa Assembly will have the courage and gentlemanliness to support the motion of no confidence irrespective of party bias.

Oasis in a Desert

In the midst of the desert of adverse but ill-thought criticism of Government officials of basic education it is refreshing to find the following appreciation of the basic schools of Bihar from the pen of Mr. E. R. J. R. Cousins, Adviser to H. E. the Governor of Bihar, received by Shri Aryanayakam, Secretary of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh:

"I am sorry that my programme for the inspection of the basic schools was interfered with by heavy rain and had to be curtailed. But I was able to meet the teachers and pupils of 18 out of the 27 schools, 6 at Brindaban-Rampurva and 12 at Chaubetola-Parukia, and I was extremely interested in all that I saw. We shall not of course be able to judge the experiment fully until the completion of all seven grades, but I was impressed with the cleanliness, intelligence and obvious pleasure of the pupils in their work, and I am confident that we are proceeding on the right lines, and that children of 14 who have gone through the entire basic curriculum will not fail in comparison with those who have gone through the ordinary school course up to the same age.

A particular encouraging feature, and one upon which I place the greatest emphasis, is that the schools have undoubtedly succeeded in capturing the goodwill and interest of the village people, and as long as this can be retained it is impossible for the system to fail of being a success. The public spirit displayed by the proprietors and the villagers of Chaubetola-Parukia in providing such excellent playgrounds for the school, in preparing roads and equipping the scouts troop, which is one of the largest I have ever seen, and above all in insisting that the village boys shall attend the school regularly is most commendable, and I am assured that similar proofs of public interest are exhibited in connection with other schools which I was not able to see. I feel confident that the efforts of the villagers will be well repaid, and that in addition to education in the ordinary sense the village boys of the future will acquire at the schools such attributes of mental alertness, manual dexterity, health and cleanliness as will make the villagers in 'future more healthy, attractive and enlightened places than they have been in the past.'

Eyes to the Blind

Though I had heard a lot about the reputation of Dr. Mathuradas of Moga, I had never had occasion to witness any of his famous operations for cataract, until I saw them in Wardha last month. He came specially at the invitation of Jamnalalji, and with his assistants restored eyes to about three hundred people who had been blinded by cataract.

These mass operations have been described as a yajna (sacrifice). And yajna it certainly is, as any act of selfless service is a sacrifice. This yajna began some years ago in the Bhagavad Bhakti Ashram at Rewari, with which Jamnalalji was closely connected. He therefore invited the doctor this time to Wardha. I bowed to Dr. Mathuradas in admiration for his unerring and quick surgical hand. He performed operations at the rate of one in a minute, there was scarcely a mishap. Thousands thus get back their eyes free, as he charges no fee to the poor.

The doctor told me that nowhere except in India was cataract so common as was also rhino-plasty. These operations, therefore, place him in the forefront of the surgeons for cataract throughout the world. No doubt many doctors have now taken up the work and copy his example. It is just as it should be, for the medical profession should be one of selfless service. And there was no humanitarian mission for which Jamnalalji was not ready. It came to him as naturally as any of his business enterprises. That was why he had a scheme in hand for making these operations a periodical feature in C. P.

I hope that the scheme will not be interrupted by his death, and Dr. Mathuradas is always ready for these yajnas.

Limbdi Exodus Anniversary

The Limbdi exodus has entered upon its fourth year. The Hijratīs who took part in it deserve congratulations. Some have dropped out, out of weakness, as happens in all movements. Not all that are born into this world live. Quite a lot die at birth. Many survive their childhood. Only a few cover the full span of life. Even so it is with human endeavour. Many rally to the call, but only a few persevere till the end. But those who do, vindicate the sacrifice of those who have dropped by the wayside, and serve as beacon-lights to subsequent generations. The Hijratīs must be prepared to prove their mettle in the final heat. Success will be theirs, only if they show themselves to be capable of making full sacrifice for the cause which they hold dear and to which they have dedicated themselves.

'Nai Talim'

With its January number Nai Talim, the organ of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh, entered on its fourth year of life. It began publication six months after the Talimi Sangh came into being and the experiment in basic education commenced. Workers were few; the road before the pioneers was beset with thorns. Nai Talim was started in order to help those who had dedicated their lives in this endeavour. The experiment in basic education is a revolutionary one. It is only by pooling experiences and recording failures no less than successes that we can hope to achieve our goal. Those engaged in the work must continue to help in making Nai Talim the source of information and guidance that is its role.

The office is being shifted to Patna. Acharya Badrinath, who has played an important part in making the experiment in Bihar a success, will now share the burden of editorship with Shrimati Ashadevi. The fact that there is a basic training centre in Patna and several basic schools in Champaran district should help Nai Talim to be in the closest touch with this new experiment.

While the organ is meant primarily to serve those engaged in teaching and promoting basic education, the Hindi and Urdu reading public will benefit themselves if they subscribe to this monthly. After all the aim of basic education is to make useful and good citizens of our children. The scheme should, therefore, arouse the interest of all who are keen on bringing in a system which claims to bring light and life where so far there has been darkness and deadness.

The subscription is Rs. 1/4 per annum including postage, and the monthly can be had from the Talimi Sangh Office, Sevagram. There is an Urdu edition also published from the Jamia Millia, Delhi.

HELL IN AJMER

(By Rameshwari Nehru)

During our recent wanderings Thakkar Bapa and I had the opportunity of going round the Harijan bastis in Ajmer City. As was expected by us we had almost to wade through pools of filth in the Mehtars' localities. The lanes seemed never to have even cultivated an acquaintance with the broom. Open drains fouled the whole atmosphere, and these were the habitations of the very people who kept the whole city clean!

But the most painful sight was the night-soil reservoir, of the city, unmentionably dirty but situated close to many sweepers' and other houses. Six years ago I saw it, though, in spite of my efforts, I could not stop there to watch its working. But its memory had stayed with me like a nightmare. I had tried then to get the public of Ajmer as well as others interested in it. The matter was also brought to the notice of the authorities of the Municipality. But evidently to no effect.

Learning that this reservoir was still in the same old condition, Thakkar Bapa and I went to see it, though once again I found it impossible to stand there for long. Thakkar Bapa, of course, courageously and carefully went round the whole place and said with a simplicity, characteristic of him, that he could swear in a court of law that nowhere else in India did such a bad system of night-soil disposal exist. And Thakkar Bapa knows almost every Harijan basti in our country!

The reservoir consists of two rectangular tanks, about 100'x20'x10' each, which are used alternately. The night-soil mixed up with sewage water is shovelled into one of the tanks from a platform above, from a distance, thus exposing to view all the dirt. A Mehtar has to shovel the matter into the tank with something like a scraper attached to a long pole while his feet are immersed in the semi-liquid filth. The tanks are open, and the foul smell from the night-soil of a whole city of one and a quarter lakhs of population can better be imagined than described.

The most painful and inhuman part of the whole business is that about half a dozen Mehtars have every day to get right down into the tank in the midst of all the filth it contains, in order to see that the outlet from the tank is not choked with solid material. They have to wade through liquid filth, 1 to 2 ft. deep. While doing so it is difficult for them to save even their hands and other parts of the body from getting soiled. From the tank the liquid is taken out in an open channel, 2 miles long, and then utilised as manure. The whole thing is a revolting sight and a standing disgrace to civilised society.

We approached the President of the Municipal Committee and impressed on him the need to cover these tanks, to arrange for the shifting of night-soil straight from the cart to the tank through man-holes, and to provide sanitary implements for the Mehtars to do the work so that they may not be forced to touch the filth with their hands or feet. The present arrangement is inhuman and must be replaced by more scientific and sanitary arrangements. It is the least that can be expected from the Municipality. The President gave us an assurance that our suggestions would be accepted by the Committee. We anxiously await the results.

MODEL SCHOOLS FOR HARIJANS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Seth Ghanashyamdas Birla, President of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, writes:

"We are thinking of establishing a few residential schools mainly for educating Harijan boys, though not exclusively. So far, whenever we have talked of Harijan, hostels or schools, we have thereby meant cheap schools or cheap hostels conducted by ill-educated and ill-paid teachers and wardens with boys half-starved. So long as we educate Harijans or children of poor parents in these cheap institutions, the boys will never succeed in shedding the inferiority complex from which they often suffer. And what will they learn from these unqualified and ill-paid teachers? These boys never get the opportunity to mix with the other boys. The harm due to this lack of contact between the poor and the well-to-do or between Harijans and Savarnas is mutual. I therefore propose that we should have a few residential schools established in pleasing environment. They should be of a standard that would compare favourably in every respect with a well-conducted public school. We should start a few such schools first of all as a trial.

They should be of the matriculation standard and affiliated to a university. They should, of course, be mostly residential. Personal attention to students should be a speciality. Education should be imparted through the medium of the mother-tongue. English should be taught as a second language. During the period of this education, the boys should be taught useful handicrafts chosen for their educative value.

In order to make this education thorough and self-sufficient, we should take two years more than the time needed for the matriculation examination. These two years should be utilised in giving extra training to the boys besides what they learn for the matriculation course.

We propose to have three crafts, one of which will be taken up by every boy at his option. These will be:

Either (1) Carding, Spinning, Weaving, Dyeing and Bleaching; or (2) Carpentry and Smithy; or (3) Paper-making, Book-binding, and Ordinary Composing.

It is intended to employ a superior staff, adequately paid, to ensure good qualifications. The underlying idea is that the boys may not feel the want of a college education. There will be no bar to such. The boys, it is hoped, will not find it difficult to earn an honest livelihood after finishing the course. It will be the duty of the Board to accommodate such boys as may like to be.

Besides the university course and craft, special attention will be given to increasing their general knowledge and hygiene. Music, games, exercises, riding, swimming, etc. should be taught. Religious or moral training should not be neglected. Equal respect for all religions should be inculcated, along with a good grounding in the principles of Hinduism and the peculiar beauties of our own culture.

Half the number of the students should be Harijans who would have free education and free boarding and lodging. The other half of the students, i. e. Savarnas, should be charged fees.

This is a very rough and brief outline of my idea of a good high school.

But there is difference amongst us about this outline. Some say: Why should we have the matriculation course? Others say: We should not undertake costly education as this will be a bad example to set. It is argued that we may employ most qualified men, but only if they come on a bare maintenance and out of a spirit of sacrifice. In other words, in their opinion, in this school there would be no room for teachers other than those prepared to lead a simple life of sacrifice. Some go to the extent of saying that we should rather have no school than start one which is not manned by a highly self-sacrificing staff.

I consider all this impractical. I need not give my arguments. They are obvious.

Will you express your views on this question?"

I whole-heartedly support Seth Ghanashyamdas's scheme. The arguments advanced in opposition seem to be based more on caution than on principle. I too should side with the opposition, if the scheme was to be financed out of the meagre funds of the Harijan Board. But I assume that the model schools would be financed by special donations enough to guarantee their full working. Having lived in South Africa for twenty years where every Indian is treated almost as a pariah, I know how sensitive the mind becomes under unnatural treatment. I took some time to regain my balance though I never lost the sensitiveness. I felt that I was a strange creature in the company of the general body of Europeans. The plight of Harijans in India is much worse because of their much greater ignorance and still greater poverty. Therefore, if we are to break down the double complex, we have to bring up a fair number of Harijan lads in surroundings in no way inferior to those that are available to the well-to-do class boys. The scheme under examination does not contemplate the production of clerks who would be too big for their boots and who would be naturally discontented because no one would have them as clerks. Boys trained under the scheme would be in no way inferior in knowledge to the other matriculates. But these will be better placed because their bodies will be specially looked after and their hands will have their cunning fully developed. Such boys will have their future assured. They will have self-confidence. They will not be torn from their kith and kin; on the contrary, they will be expected to serve fellow Harijans and give them benefit of the teaching they have received.

It may be objected that I am inconsistent in that I have written and spoken against the present system of education. The objection would be superficial. In the first place, the worst features of the system will be eliminated in that the training will be in the mother-tongue and the boys will be taught handicrafts which should enable them to earn an independent and decent living. Secondly, an objection that may be applicable to boys who can be better educated cannot be held good in the case of boys who have no choice and who smart under the knowledge that they cannot have the education that thousands of boys have simply because they are not Harijans. I would not insult Harijan lads by arguing with them that what the thousands of non-Harijan lads are doing is wrong, and that therefore they had better be satisfied with the shanties which Seth Ghanashyamdas has referred to in his letter.

I plump for his scheme. I wish him all success. The sooner it is launched, the better for Harijans and better for India. These schools will be potent instruments for exorcising the demon of untouchability.

FROM THE OLDEST CONGRESSMAN

Dear Mahatmaji,

I congratulate you upon your dissociation with the believers of violence as far as possible. God gave you an opportunity to do so at Poona, but at Bombay you forgot all about that God-given opportunity. At Bardoli God gave you that opportunity again. I am exceedingly glad that you did not make the same mistake at Wardha as you had done at Bombay. God never forsakes him whose surrender to Him is complete.

Life of everything other than the Eternal is limited by the laws of Nature. Violence was created by God who gave it a limited life. God in His infinite wisdom now finds that violence was given a trial and found wanting in preserving world peace. How and for what purpose armament was created is not known, but it is now certain that armament at the present time is used by violence for indiscriminate man-slaughter throughout the world, and the inevitable result is annihilation of mankind and a deluge of blood all over the world. This is threatening the whole world with wholesale extermination of mankind. The only reassuring circumstance is that Nature gave both violence and armament only limited life to live, and it is high time that they should quit the world. All that violence and armament did during their tenure of life was war and nothing but war. Now the world war is complete, and violence and armament are exhausting themselves to be entirely finished.

This world war may not be the longest but it must be the last, and a new world with perfect peace and tranquillity will emerge out of the ashes of violence and armament for the benefit of mankind.

The outgoing world is almost entirely enveloped by a cloud of disbelief in God. A considerable number of the disbelievers not only deny the very existence of God but they assert that belief in God is a moral weakness, if not delinquency and a bar to human progress. The rest of the disbelievers think that God is more dead than alive, and that they are the masters of all they survey. The total number of these disbelievers is the largest, and they are responsible for the world war. Then come the waverers who entertain the idea of God differently in accordance with their different temperaments. The pictures of God that they draw up in their minds are accordingly different. But those waverers agree in forgetting that God is more living than they suppose Him to be. To them the words 'Omnipresent', 'Omniscient' and 'Omnipotent' are for the expression of lip-loyalty to God and not for the enlightenment of their minds about Him.

God-believing India will not have man-given violence and armament-controlled freedom for exploiting the weaker section of humanity. She must have God-given freedom for their service — seva.

God-given freedom can be obtained only by satyagraha, sufferings for which can be successfully undertaken only by those whose surrender to Him is complete. The number of satyagrahis is steadily increasing. Let the advocates of violence say and do whatever they may, the number of believers in non-violence will steadily go on increasing and the world will have real peace.

JAMNALALJI

"The angel

Came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had
blessed,

And lo! Sheth Jaman's name led all the rest."

Those who knew Jamnalalji — and the hundreds of telegrams that have been pouring in from places far and near show that the number of that blessed company was great — will not feel unhappy over the alteration I have made in Leigh Hunt's famous lines about Abou Ben Adhem. I do not know if on the fateful afternoon of the 11th Jamnalalji had a vision of any Angel come to receive him in the region of the blessed. But if he had, I am sure he must have spoken to him:

"Low but cheerily still; and said,
I pray thee then,

Write me as one that loves his fellowmen."

Never since the sudden and premature death of Maganlal Gandhi in 1928 had any bereavement dealt such a staggering blow on Gandhiji as the sudden and premature death of Jamnalalji. Words fail me when I attempt to describe his feeling of desolation. For two days he bore up bravely consoling the bereaved widow and the aged mother, but on the third day he broke down as he was saying: "Childless people adopt sons. But Jamnalalji adopted me as father. He should have been an heir to my all. Instead he has left me an heir to his all." The feeling of desolation is, if I may say so, universal. Wardha and Sevagram, even with Bapu and Ba in it, look dreary without Jamnalalji. The numerous institutions he had founded or helped in founding will experience a piercing sense of void without his sunny presence. Even the meetings of the Congress Working Committee must be dull and dreary without his scintillating and outspoken commonsense.

The feeling of loneliness that has come over most of us may be judged from these few lines from Vallabhbhai's letter:

"He had vowed not to sit in a train or a motor car, and his vow was to terminate on the 15th. He had promised thereafter to come and have rest with me in Hajira. Instead he has gone to his eternal rest. No death could have been better. But as the proverb goes, 'Let a hundred die, but not the nourisher of a hundred.' Hundreds upon hundreds of our workers in various parts of our country must be shedding silent tears in their cottages. Bapu has lost a true son; Jankidevi and the family a true shelter; the country a loyal servant; the Congress a stately pillar; the cow her true friend and many institutions their patron; and we have lost a beloved blood brother. I feel so desolate and forlorn."

Everyone mourns his loss. Amongst the mourners are not only his friends of the Working Committee, not only his friends in the business world like the Birlas and the Tatas, Sir Purushottamdas and others, not only his numerous co-workers the humblest of whom he had brothered and befriended, but countless others who received his help without the world ever knowing it. The meeting to mourn his death held in Wardha was addressed by members of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Muslim League, and a Muslim barrister paid him a fine tribute. He said without Jamnalalji's sympathy and timely help the Anglo-Urdu School would not have been in existence. He had the priceless gift of friendship which endeared him to all, and everyone under his roof felt completely at home. He had literally broken the barriers of the family of his blood relationship, and made himself member of a vaster family to which men and women of all races and creeds belonged. Above all he had broken the barrier that wealth and position often create. His employees and his servants were members of his family, and they shared their joys and sorrows with him in an unstinted measure. There are few wealthy men on earth so utterly void of affectation and snobbery, so utterly innocent of possession and propriety (I mean ownership), so utterly free from communalism or provincialism, and so overflowing with the milk of human kindness.

Like some of those rare men who are gifted with the power of sublimating their desires and their passions, he was gifted with the power to sublimate his sense of possession. He followed the master cheerfully through all the numerous vicissitudes of the latter's life, because although 'he had great possessions', he had divested himself of the sense of proprietorship in them. Born of an obscure family in a waterless village in Jaipur State, he was adopted by a rich man from the same State who had settled in Wardha. Even the poor parents would not part with their child, until the rich Bachhrajji from Wardha promised to dig a well in the village. The boy was brought up by the adoptive father, and after two or three years in a Hindi school was put into business. Once he incurred the rage of this hot-tempered father who reminded him of the riches he had come into possession of without labouring for them. He was just 17 then. He addressed a letter to the father couched in terms of humility and firmness characteristic of the Jamnalalji of future years. The letter is in Marwadi, and some of the idiom of the language is untranslatable. But the substance may be given here :

"You were so angry with me today. It was God's will, and you had a right to be angry in that you have adopted me. It is not your fault, rather is it the fault of those who gave me in adoption. The money is yours, and you may do whatever you like with it. I am sorry for the expenses you have incurred on me so far, but from this moment I will not touch a pie out of your money. I have no right against you, and I would implore you not to be anxious about me. May God keep you for many more years. Wherever I go I shall pray for your welfare. Pray pardon me for having irritated you. I hope you never believed that I served you because of your money. Please dismiss that thought from your mind, if you ever had it. I care not for wealth, I pray that I may never forget the name of God who alone can keep me happy in this and in the next life. And pray be of good cheer and don't sorrow over my going. All earthly relationship is hollow. The worldly possessions hold you in their grip. Thank God you have freed me today from their deadly grip. And please rest assured that I will not go to law to claim a pie of what is yours. This is a regular release-deed on a stamped paper, and it declares that you owe me no obligation whatsoever. I owe no debts that you need repay. Use your money in charity, swear not at sadhus and others, as is your wont, but please them with whatever money you can give. I am taking nothing from the house — nothing but the clothes that cover me."

The father relented, implored the son tearfully to stay, and he stayed. Sturdy commonsense and innate business skill enabled him to earn lakhs and give in charity five times the wealth he had inherited from the adoptive father. If he stayed home in response to the father's importunations, he knew he was a trustee of the father's wealth. Consciously or unconsciously that was his first lesson in the theory of trusteeship. The father who had adopted him taught that first lesson, the father he later adopted initiated him into the deep implications of it.

Similarly he had the virtue of fearlessness which the absence of a slavish education had left unimpaired. He had silenced Tommies travelling first and second and trying to bully him; he would not serve wines at a party he gave in honour of a Governor; to a Commissioner who said that the Chief Commissioner would not open his school unless he promised to be more loyal, he had said he would do without that costly privilege, and to a D. S. P. whom he was interviewing and who had remarked: "How I wish the boat that is carrying Tilak to England may go to the bottom of the sea," he had said: "You forget that there are numerous Englishmen on the boat!"

This fearlessness came into full play during the twenty years of his public life under Gandhiji's leadership. President Kruger was unlettered and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek knows no English. Ignorance of English was no handicap to them. It had in fact left the native vigour of their minds unspoilt. Even so with Jamnalalji. He could see the implications of an intricately worded Congress resolution quicker than many other members, and he would often raise his warning voice lest the Committee should put their foot into seemingly innocent propositions. It was he who raised earliest the question of moral and material co-operation in the war and who said that a nation of shopkeepers could not be duped by the promise of moral co-operation.

Treasurer of the nation's wealth he was also the treasurer of the nation's honour. He was among the very few capitalists who recklessly threw themselves in the fray for the nation's freedom and bore the rigours of imprisonment every time the call was made. His faith burnt brightest when that of others flickered in times of stress and strain and dark despair. It was to revive the faith of others that when Gandhiji was in jail under a six years' term of imprisonment that he donated Rs. 2,50,000 and founded the Gandhi Seva Sangh. Politics he could understand, but he often regarded it as a sorry game which might soil one's heart and soul. And so he had early set his heart on the constructive part of the Congress programme: Khadi to which he gave his wealth, his time, his organising ability and his devotion; Harijan uplift for which he risked the wrath of his hide-bound community, threw open the first big temple in India to the Harijans, and gave to Gandhiji the whole of the income of the Harijan village — Sevagram — for the Harijans' welfare; Hindu-Muslim unity for which he cheerfully bore heavy blows in the course of a riot, and earnestness for which won him distinguished men like the Khan Sahebs as brothers and women like Raihanaben and the Captain Sisters as sisters; Village industries for which he gave away a precious part of his patrimony; Women's cause to which he devoted a good deal of his wealth and time; and the Cow to whose cause he dedicated his life.

Who could have been blessed with a richer life of service? And yet one could notice in various utterances of his a longing for something he had not yet achieved. His sense of truth and justice was keen even to harshness, so far at any rate as he was concerned. Before he met Gandhiji he had worshipped at many shrines. Gandhiji seemed to settle his mind, and Gandhiji's fierce passion for truth made him long to be his son. "Blessed will be the moment when I shall be worthy of being known as Mahatmaji's son," he wrote in 1923. "It is due to his infinite mercy that I have learnt at least to see my weaknesses and failings." He was often overwhelmed by a sense of his spiritual shortcomings, and he often longed to retire from all public activities. It was this spirit that endeared him to Gandhiji more than the sacrifice of material possessions, almost incomparably great as this was. And that was what made him the proud recipient of two characteristic letters from Gandhiji written from jail. In one of these he wrote:

"As I proceed in my search for truth it grows upon me that Truth comprehends everything. It is not in ahimsa, but ahimsa is in it. What is perceived by a pure heart and intellect is truth for that moment. Cling to it, and it enables one to reach pure Truth. There is no question there of a divided duty. But often enough it is difficult to decide what is ahimsa. For instance, the use of disinfectants is himsa, and yet we cannot do without it. We have to live a life of ahimsa in the midst of a world of himsa, and that is possible only if we cling to truth. That is how I deduce ahimsa from truth. Out of truth emanate love, tenderness, humility. A votary of truth has to be humble as the dust. His humility increases with his observance of truth. I see this every moment of my life. I have a much vivid sense of truth and of my own littleness than I had a year ago. The wonderful implication of the great truth 'Brahma satyam jaganmilhya' (Brahman is real, all else unreal) grows on me from day to day. It teaches us patience. This will purge us of harshness and add to our tolerance. It will make us magnify the mole-hills of our errors into mountains, and minimise the mountains of others' errors into mole-hills. The body persists because of egoism. The utter extinction of the body of egoism is moksha. He who has achieved this will be the very image of Truth, or one may call it Brahman.

Therefore the loving name of God is Dasanudas (Servant of servants). Wife, children, friends, possessions—all should be held subservient to Truth. Each one of these should be sacrificed in the search for Truth. Only then can one be a satyagrahi. I have thrown myself into this movement with a view to making the observance of this principle comparatively easy, and it is with the same object that I do not hesitate to plunge men like you in it. Its outward form is Hind Swaraj. This Swaraj is being delayed because there is yet to be found a satyagrahi of that type. This, however, need not dismay us. It should spur us on to greater effort."

And another:

"Moksha is liberation from impure thought. Complete extinction of impure thought is impossible without ceaseless penance. There is only one way to achieve this. The moment an impure thought arises, confront it with a pure one. This is possible only with God's grace, and God's grace comes through ceaseless communion with Him and complete self-surrender. This communion may in the beginning be just a lip repetition of His name even disturbed by impure thoughts. But ultimately what is on the lips will possess the heart. And there is another thing to bear in mind. The mind may wander, but let not the senses wander with it. If the senses wander where the mind takes them, one is done for. But he who keeps control of the physical senses will some day be able to bring impure thoughts under control. . . . Impure thoughts need not dismay you. We are monarchs of the domain of Effort. God is sole Monarch of the domain of Result. . . . You know what to do to create a pure atmosphere about you. Spare diet, sight fixed on the earth below, and impatience with oneself to the extent of plucking the eye out if 'it offends thee'."

Nourished on food like this, he grew from self-introspection to more self-introspection. Constant companionship with Vinoba, who had managed the Satyagrahashram at Wardha since the beginning, was a great help in the process. He had immense self-confidence. He knew that, if some day the crown of thorns of Congress Presidentship were to be bestowed on him, he would be equal to the burden. But his heart quailed when he thought of the spiritual journey he had still to do before entering the Kingdom of Heaven. It was not because he had riches. Ownership in these he had cast away. But there were other things needed. And in order to purge himself of all dross he took the greatest step of his life—dedicating himself to the service of the cow. He left his house—the house which had lodged guests like Presidents of the Congress, Lord Lothian, H. E. Tai Chi Tao, Dr. John Mott, and the Egyptian Delegation—and went to live in a hut which he called Gopuri. Here he did his spinning, tended his cows with the devotion of King Dileepa, and kept a careful record of his thoughts and acts from day to day. As we visited the hut on the day he passed away we saw on the little desk in front of his feet his diary written up complete to the day of his death. Even so his life was complete and regular and God-fearing. He had dedicated this to Mother Cow, in order that she may be for him the Kamadugha* that Cow Nandini had been to King Dileepa. Whether the death that came to him was the blessing given him by the Cow it is difficult to say. Perhaps it was. For no death could be more desirable. Almost until the last moment he was thinking of his Cow and his Gopuri, and when the end came it was so sudden and so quick that it seemed as though he had slipped into blissful peace. But whether the Cow had really proved his Kamadugha, there is no doubt that by his dedicated life he had rendered himself Gandhiji's Kamadugha. It was he who had made it possible for Gandhiji to settle first in Wardha and then in Sevagram, and it was he who was the living link between the outside world and Gandhiji. His death removes the link and leaves both Gandhiji and the outside world much poorer.

PLEA FOR CALMNESS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The recent British reverses ought not to create panic in the land. In all the wars that Britain has fought or in which she has been engaged there have been reverses some of which may be considered disastrous. But the British have a knack of surviving them and turning them into stepping-stones to success. Hence the saying peculiar to them that they blunder through to success. Failures do not dismay or demoralise them. They take them with calmness and in a sportsmanlike spirit. Wars are for them a national game like football. The defeated team heartily congratulates the successful one almost as if it was a joint victory, and drowns the sorrow of defeat in an exchange of glasses of whisky. If we have learnt nothing worth from the contact with the British, let us at least learn their calmness in the face of misfortunes.

And is there the slightest cause for alarm? Certainly not for those who believe in non-violence. For fear and distrust of self are no part of their composition, nor are they part of a panoplied soldier. The attribute of non-violence is perhaps only a copy book maxim. We do not see it in actual practice in any measure. But this war is abundant proof that neither party though steeped in violence betrays any fear or distrust. I am filled with amazement and admiration at the reckless bravery displayed by combatants on either side. This war is a demonstration of the unthinkable nerve that human beings are capable of possessing. Looked at from either standpoint, therefore, we should be ashamed of fear, distrust and nervelessness in the face of danger. It is, therefore, the sacred duty of every worker to steel himself against cowardly panic and prevent its spread as far as he can. "Cowards die many times before their death." Let this not be proved of us.

The true danger exists only for cities. It may be very near due to the fall of Singapore and probable loss of Burma. One of the best precautions consists in those people who are not wanted in the cities or those who want to shun danger, migrating to the villages in an orderly manner. There should be no panicky rush. Those who must remain in the cities whether for business or otherwise should carry out instructions that may be issued by the authorities from time to time. Those who will not, for any reason whatsoever, should clear out in good time. If this simple precaution is taken, we may face the future without perturbation. More I cannot say, for we are a house divided against itself and there is no living bond between the rulers and the ruled. It is tragic but it is true. The tragedy is deepened by the knowledge that all parties feel so helpless.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Eternal Problem

Q. Why can't you see that whilst there is possession it must be defended against all odds? Therefore your insistence that violence should be eschewed in all circumstances is utterly unworkable and absurd. I think non-violence is possible only for select individuals.

A. This question has been answered often enough in some form or other in these columns as also in those of Young India. But it is an evergreen. I must answer it as often as it is put, especially when it comes from an earnest seeker as this one does. I claim that even now, though the social structure is not based on a conscious acceptance of non-violence, all the world over mankind lives and men retain their possessions on the sufferance of one another. If they had not done so, only the fewest and the most ferocious would have survived. But such is not the case. Families are bound together by ties of love, and so are groups in the so-called civilised society called nations. Only they do not recognise the supremacy of the law of non-violence. It follows, therefore, that they have not investigated its vast possibilities. Hitherto out of sheer inertia, shall I say, we have taken it for granted that complete non-violence is possible only for the few who take the vow of non-possession and the allied abstinences. Whilst it is true that the votaries alone can carry on research work and declare from time to time the new possibilities of the great eternal law governing man, if it is the law, it must hold good for all. The many failures we see are not of the law but of the followers, many of whom do not even know that they are under that law willynilly. When a mother dies for her child she unknowingly obeys the law. I have been pleading for the past fifty years for a conscious acceptance of the law and its zealous practice even in the face of failures. Fifty years' work has shown marvellous results and strengthened my faith. I do claim that by constant practice we shall come to a state of things when lawful possession will command universal and voluntary respect. No doubt such possession will not be tainted. It will not be an insolent demonstration of the inequalities that surround us everywhere. Nor need the problem of unjust and unlawful possessions appal the votary of non-violence. He has at his disposal the non-violent weapon of satyagraha and non-cooperation which hitherto has been found to be a complete substitute of violence whenever it has been applied honestly in sufficient measure. I have never claimed to present the complete science of non-violence. It does not lend itself to such treatment. So far as I know no single physical science does, not even the very precise science of mathematics. I am but a seeker, and I have fellow seekers like the questioner whom I invite to accompany me in the very difficult but equally fascinating search.

NOT NECESSARILY IMPURE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Thus writes Shri Shankarrao Dev:

"In the last issue of Harijan, in your article 'A Deplorable Incident' you say to the rich: 'Earn your crores by all means. But understand that your wealth is not yours; it belongs to the people. Take what you require for your legitimate needs, and use the remainder for society.' When I read this, the first question that arose in my mind was: 'Why first earn crores and then use them for society? As society today is constituted the means of earning crores are bound to be impure; and one who earns crores by impure means cannot be expected to follow the mantram तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः; because in the very process of earning crores by impure means the man's character is bound to be tainted or vitiated. And moreover you have always been emphasising the purity of means. But I am afraid that there is a possibility of people misunderstanding that you are laying an emphasis here more on the ends than on the means.

I request you to emphasise as much, if not more, the purity of means of earning money as on spending. If purity of means is strictly observed, then, according to me, crores could not be accumulated at all and the difficulty of spending for society will assume a very minor prospect."

I must demur. Surely a man may conceivably make crores through strictly pure means, assuming that a man may legitimately possess riches. For the purpose of my argument, I have assumed that private possession itself is not held to be impure. If I own a mining lease and I tumble upon a diamond of rare value, I may suddenly find myself a millionaire without being held guilty of having used impure means. This actually happened when Cullinan diamond, much more valuable than the Kohinoor, was found. Such instances can be easily multiplied. My argument was surely addressed to such men. I have no hesitation in endorsing the proposition that generally rich men and for that matter most men are not particular as to the way they make money. In the application of the method of non-violence one must believe in the possibility of every person, however depraved, being reformed under humane and skilled treatment. We must appeal to the good in human beings and expect response. Is it not conducive to the well-being of society that every member uses all his talents, only not for personal aggrandisement but for the good of all? We do not want to produce a dead equality where every person becomes or is rendered incapable of using his ability to the utmost possible extent. Such a society must ultimately perish. I therefore suggest that my advice that monied men may earn their crores (honestly only, of course) but so as to dedicate them to the service of all is perfectly sound. तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः is a mantra based on uncommon knowledge. It is the surest method to evolve a new order of life of universal benefit in the place of the present one where each one lives for himself without regard to what happens to his neighbour. ## NOT QUITE

(By K. G. Mashruwala)

"A pedagogue and psychiatrist" sends a short essay on 'The problem of violence' in which inter alia he says:

"Non-violence is not a negation of anything. It is a positive assertion of moral courage to take risks for resisting forces of evil. It is developed by an irresistible will for self-purification.....

The cure of violence consists in adopting an attitude of sympathetic indifference to its struggles and benevolent neutrality in its conflicts. Believers in non-violence should resort to a policy of non-participation and non-opposition to its attempts. It should be allowed to relax and be benefited by the punishment of its actions as it fails to profit by appeals of reason, fair play and justice.....

The whole life of violence is patterned on the Telugu proverb, Maku arogyam, maku ayushyam, maku dhanam, miku rinam (To us health, to us life, to us wealth, to you obligations)."

The conception of non-violence as expressed in the second paragraph of the correspondent's letter is not altogether correct. On closer examination it will be seen that it takes away a good deal of what is stated in the first paragraph. Non-violence would not justify itself fully, if it satisfied itself simply by "adopting an attitude of sympathetic indifference" and "benevolent neutrality" towards violence and resorting to a policy of "non-opposition to its attempts", and allowing it "to relax and be benefited by the punishment of its actions".

The fact that in the present war it is not possible to go beyond this attitude should not be taken to mean that non-violence has evolved and worked itself out to its fullest extent. It is the result of the unpreparedness of pacifists, who are yet no more than children in the kindergarten of non-violence.

If non-violence is a truly effective force, it should develop sufficient strength to intervene in violent conflicts in a very effective manner, and bring about a peaceful solution of the points of dispute before and not after the belligerents are exhausted and 'punished' by their own actions. It will have been no virtue of non-violence, if there is peace as a result of total destruction.

Extinguishing agents can take no credit, when a fire is extinguished because there is no more of inflammable material left for it to burn.

I have often heard it said that this total war itself is going to pave the way for a non-violent order. This is quite possible. But the compulsory adoption of a non-violent civilisation will not necessarily bring contentment and happiness to the world. Violence asleep is no more non-violence than the peace of 1918 was an end of war. Peace and non-violent order that will contribute to man's progress and happiness must result from the true awakening of the nations to an appreciation of non-violence and not from a state of coma after the war.

PASSING OF THE FIRST STAGE OF THE A. I. V. I. A.

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

The A. I. V. I. A. has just passed its first seven years and has entered the second and therefore more responsible stage. Thanks to our education most of us sophisticated ones are strangers to village industries and village conditions. We learn Western capitalistic economics and shout for "facts and figures", without knowing how to read them. We are strangers in our own land. It is this phenomenon that has necessitated the A. I. V. I. A. having to pass through this early stage. In these seven years we have cultivated a nodding acquaintance with a few village industries, have begun to recognise the rudiments of village economics, carried on a few experiments in the processes, and attempted a reorganisation of some industries.

Necessarily during this period the Association worked within a restricted area in a highly centralised manner. We now pass to the second stage. We find the country is awaiting a well-formulated constructive programme. In order to facilitate the spreading of the work of the Association we have to decentralise its work. To this end a new constitution has been framed so as to provide for provincial organisations working under Sanchalaks and Secretaries. Gandhiji himself has assumed the helm as President of the Association to steer it through the uncharted course before us in the immediate future, and the following members form the new Board of Management:

1. Shri Laxmidas P. Asar, 2. Shri Shankerlal Banker, 3. Smt. Goshiben Captain, 4. Shri Jairamdas Doulatram, 5. Shri Profulla Chandra Ghosh, 6. Shri Shrikrishnadas Jaju, 7. Shri Bharatan Kumarappa, 8. Shri J. C. Kumarappa (Secretary), 9. Shri Vaikunthrai L. Mehta, 10. Shri Dhiren Mazumdar, 11. Shri Shoorji Vallabhdas.

The provincial organisations will develop their own methods of carrying out the policy laid down by the Board. They may have a central institution, like Maganwadi, in a convenient rural setting where teaching and training of workers will go on side by side with the practical working of some industries chosen from the promising industries of the province. They will carry on propaganda to popularise the products of village industries and educate the people in the underlying philosophy of this movement. This war has helped to demonstrate to us, more clearly than ever, that our salvation lies in the strength of our village organisations. The seed of destruction innate in centralised organisations has sprouted with a vengeance, dispersing the overcrowded population of the cities, threatened by the avarice of invaders, back to the safety of their villages.

The Board met early this month and has framed rules to govern affiliation of allied institutions, recognition of producing centres, and certification of dealers in village products.

In view of the fact that most of the village tanned leather is from non-slaughtered animals, it decided to give the support of the Association to the village tanning industry by confining sales of leather goods at shops certified by the Association to those made out of hide of non-slaughtered buffaloes, cows and bullocks.

We hope that in the next few years, with the unstinted co-operation of those who have a living faith in this non-violent foundation of economic structure of human activities, the country will be studded with A. I. V. I. A. centres radiating hope to the desperate, bringing food to the hungry and happiness to all.

[One would have thought that I had enough on my hands without taking the additional burden of the Presidentship of the A. I. V. I. A. I have been its guide ever since its inception, but the importunity of the Board was irresistible. Readers will lighten my task by sharing it with me by (a) becoming members, (b) contributing funds, (c) contributing solid work.

Three Essentials

Assuming the presence of the will among the millions, rapid spread of hand-spinning is possible only by the adoption of the following three things:

1. Use of unginned cotton from the nearest spot when it is not grown on one's own plot.

2. Ginning it on a polished board with an iron or smooth wooden rod and carding the cotton by manipulation of the cotton with fingers assisted by a wooden knife made on the spot. This process is called tunai (तुनाई).

3. Spinning the slivers on the dhanush takli.

Hand gins cannot be manufactured to order today. All available unginned cotton should be prepared first by the method explained in 2 above.

Where unginned cotton is not available ginned cotton from factories has got to be used. It too lends itself to tunai, though much more time is required for carding by the tunai process when bale cotton has to be used. Where a carding bow is available, naturally it will be used. But what is true of ginning is equally true of carding. It is not possible to manufacture bows and gut in a moment. Tunai is a method devised and being perfected by Shri Vinoba with an artist's skill and ardour.

When spinning spreads among the millions it will be impossible to supply slivers from a centre or centres. The utmost that is possible is for families or groups to set apart one or two hands per a fixed number for carding. The ideal, the best, and in the long run the quickest, way is for each one to prepare his own slivers. It makes spinning more interesting, and the variety of occupation breaks the monotony.

I suggest that, though the crisis is not yet felt and the mills are working, khadi workers will do well from now to adopt the suggestions I have made. When the crisis does come, we shall then be found ready.

GOSEVA SANGH RESOLUTIONS

(Passed at the Conference recently held at Wardha)

1. Whereas India is primarily an agricultural country, 80 per cent of its people being dependent on agriculture, and whereas Indian agriculture depends on bullocks, and whereas the cow is not only the milk-and-ghee-giver but also the sole means of providing bullocks, this Conference is definitely of opinion that the improvement of the present condition and economic status of the cow and her progeny is more important than that of other cattle and indispensable in any scheme of economic planning on a national basis.

2. Whereas to underfeed animals, to keep them in an insanitary condition, to overload them, to take more work from them than they can give, to beat them, to torture them with spikes, and the cruel 'phooka' is wholly against humanitarian principles, and whereas such practices decrease the utility of the animals, this Conference appeals to the general public and in a special way to the members of the Goseva Sangh and other cow lovers to arouse the public conscience and make the utmost effort to put a stop to such inhuman treatment and where necessary to seek the assistance of the law.

3. Whereas the real object of pinjrapols and charitable goshalas is to give asylum to diseased, old and disabled cattle and save them from pain and slaughter, this Conference is of opinion that in order effectively to achieve the object the following reforms in their management and programme of work are essential:

(a) Every institution should provide proper maintenance and veterinary and other scientific facilities for cattle. These facilities should also be made available to the neighbouring public.

(b) It should be the duty of the institution to see to it that scrub animals are not allowed to procreate. It should be incumbent on the management to arrange for proper feeding and care of well-bred cows as also for improvement in the breed of cattle with a view to producing cows who will yield more milk and bullocks capable of doing more work.

(c) Every institution should keep good bulls whose services should be available to the general public also.

(d) Every institution should, as far as possible, make provision for spacious dry cattle farms where the dry cows and calves of the neighbouring public may be kept at concession rates. Good bulls should also be kept.

(e) Every institution should make arrangements for producing green grass and fodder in ample measure and for preserving the same by means of silage etc.

(f) The buildings of pinjrapols should be constructed so as to ensure cleanliness and healthy living. Wells, water troughs, etc. should be scientifically planned on a uniform model.

(g) There should be an expert in animal husbandry in charge of each institution. He should have thorough knowledge of cattle farming, fodder cultivation and veterinary science.

4. Whereas it is desirable that all those institutions which accept the Conference resolution regarding pinjrapols should be conducted on uniform lines and efficiently managed, the Conference recommends to them to obtain certificates from and affiliate themselves with the Goseva Sangh.

The Conference recommends to the Goseva Sangh to frame the necessary rules in order to facilitate certification and affiliation of institutions, and to invite existing pinjrapols and goshalas to get themselves affiliated to the Sangh.

FOUR YEARS' WORK

I

The Basic Scheme of Education as propounded by Gandhiji over four years ago has met and continues to meet with a storm of opposition from certain quarters. It is in the nature of things that anything so wholly revolutionary should be opposed by those who have been nurtured on certain traditions. Most people admit that the present system of education has not been of the type suited to our conditions of life or in keeping with our rich heritage of culture, all deplore the fact that the vast majority in this land are wholly illiterate and uneducated, and yet because of political differences any scheme emanating from however pure a motive is apt to create prejudices in the minds of those belonging to a different school of political thought and therefore does not always get a fair trial. The Wardha scheme has had to battle against such odds. Inasmuch as compulsory primary education has always been declared impossible because of lack of funds, Gandhiji claimed that his scheme, apart from its own intrinsic value of method, had the additional qualification of becoming self-supporting up to a point and after a certain stage if the State would make provision for the sale of the articles produced in the schools. He still adheres to this claim, but nowhere did he even say that the schools would be self-supporting straightaway. It stands to reason that in all craft schools there must be an initial cost of equipment. Spinning was chosen in the first instance as the craft pre-eminently suitable for children of all ages and for village children in particular. It is the one craft about which, thanks to him, there is expert knowledge in our country. The main objections, however, to the scheme are that after a couple of years or in some cases only after a year the schools are not self-supporting and that spinning has not proved a suitable craft. There is nothing in the Zakir Husain Report to show that the sponsors of the scheme wanted spinning to be the only craft. But experts and text-books are lacking and cannot be produced in a day. Moreover the lack of trained teachers in an entirely new type of education cannot be made good in a short time either. All these handicaps the Talimi Sangh has had to face. In addition, Congress popular Governments, who were out to give the scheme as fair a trial as possible, went out of office, and hence in certain provinces the scheme suffered. Notwithstanding all these difficulties the third annual report of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh just published makes interesting reading and should be studied with an impartial mind.

Basic Schools

The Governments of the C. P. and Berar, Bihar, U. P., and Orissa started a certain number of schools and training schools as an official experiment.

So have done the States of Kashmir and Rajgarh. In addition there are some non-government agencies who have taken up the scheme, such as the Jamia Millia Islamia in Delhi, The Rashtriya Gramshala at Thamna, Kheda Dt. Gujarat, the Tilak Maharashtra Vidyapith, Poona, the Gurukul at Kangri, the Ramakrishna Vidyalyaya at Periyannayakanpalayam, Coimbatore District, the Friends' Settlement at Hoshangabad, and the Vijay Vidyamandir of Avidha (Rajpipla State). The District Council of Raipur (C. P.) has had its teachers trained at the Vidya-mandir training schools and has introduced the basic syllabus in 15 of its schools.

Progress

Naturally progress of the experiment varies from province to province and from institution to institution according to the interpretation of the fundamental principles of the scheme and the faith and efficiency of the teachers. But the various reports give one ample hope that, given the right type of workers, the experiment will fulfil its original expectations.

The Bihar Government, through its Board of Basic Education composed of officials and non-official educationists, was the only Government to make a careful assessment of the result of the experiment in its province, and the Sangh has published their report in the form of a booklet. Conferences and exhibitions, of which two have been held in Poona and Delhi, have been another means of finding out what progress is being made. The Delhi Conference among its various findings recorded "with satisfaction that the reports on the working of basic schools run by the Government, local bodies and by private enterprise are almost unanimous that general standards of health and behaviour as well as intellectual attainment are very encouraging. The children in basic schools are more active, cheerful, self-reliant, their power of self-expression is well developed, they are acquiring habits of co-operative work, and social prejudices are breaking down." The following from the report of the Board of Inspectors in Bihar bears quotation: "Champaran was specially selected as the first field of experiment as one of the most backward areas in the province. At the time of the introduction of basic education there were only five primary schools and one middle school in the entire area. . . . Everything in the home and life of the child tends to hinder the growth of children. . . . We had not only to examine whether the required habits of body and mind and the proper spirit were being acquired by the children, but also to find out how far the same could be attributed to the use of the media to which basic education attached importance." They then give their findings in detail. In regard to skill and efficiency in the craft the children had attained a fair measure of success, there being a marked improvement over the previous year. In regard to discipline too there seemed to be distinct progress not only in the class room but also in the playing field and in meetings and gatherings. There was an absence of noise and scramble for places, jostling and pushing, which are always present in children's gatherings. Development of intelligence had been achieved to an appreciable extent. "Considering the backwardness of the area the results obtained were really very encouraging." Lethargy and listlessness were being gradually overcome, and children were finding pleasure in good work for its own sake. The progress in the development of habits of systematic and thorough work was not up to the required standard, nor had the children developed enough of the spirit of inquiry and power of observation. They were, however, becoming aware of their social environment, and there was noticeable progress in co-operation and service. Personal cleanliness, a sense of orderliness, self-expression had definitely developed, and there was a definite development in the whole personality of the child.

Kashmir reports that the mental content of the pupils has been considerably enriched under the basic syllabus. Teachers are looked upon as friends. The children are definitely neater, tidier, smarter, and show signs of an awakened sense of responsibility. The average attendance has shown a marked upward tendency, the children show a fairly good sense of colour harmony in their picture sketches, they take a delight in flowers and pet animals, and are keenly inquisitive, always eager to know the why, how and wherefore of the things and persons surrounding them, they take a keen interest in decorating their class rooms and the school museum, they have their own garden, they thoroughly enjoy monthly excursions, they edit their daily news bulletins themselves, they run a stationery shop and a savings bank of their own, the cleanliness of the class rooms is their own responsibility, they help in the village and in their homes in sweeping, and scavenging, they have even repaired roads and dug drains.

The C. P. Government admits that children working under this syllabus are more alert, well-behaved, cleaner and more systematic in work than those in ordinary schools.

The Bombay Special Officer of Basic Education says their boys have been making steady progress in mental and physical development. A sense of service has been generated, and children are more attentive, accurate and frugal in habits.

The Vijay Vidyamandir in Rajpipla State notes a great change in the attitude of the children. They are cleaner and more keen on their studies, more alert and quick. They are slowly becoming self-supporting.

FIERY ORDEAL

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Twentytwo years ago a young man with the bloom of thirty springs upon him came to me and said, "I want to ask something of you."

"Ask, and it shall be given, if it is at all within my power to give," I replied with some surprise.

"Regard me as your son Devadas," the young man said.

"Agreed," I replied. "Only I am giving nothing, you are the giver."

The young man was no other than Jamnalal Bajaj. People know something of what this sacrament meant. But few know the extent of the part played by the self-adopted son. Never before, I can say, was a mortal blessed with a 'son' like him. Of course I have many sons and daughters in the sense that they have done some of my work. But Jamnalalji surrendered himself and his without reservation. There is hardly any activity of mine in which I did not receive his full-hearted co-operation and in which it did not prove to be of the greatest value. He was gifted with a quick intelligence. He was a merchant prince. He placed at my disposal his ample possessions. He became guardian of my time and my health. And he did it all for the public good. The day he died he and Jankidevi were to come to me. But he died almost at the very hour he should have been with me. Never before have I felt so forlorn except when Maganlal was snatched from me fourteen years ago. But I had no doubt then, as I have none now, that a calamity of that kind is a blessing in disguise. God wants to try me through and through. I live in the faith that He will give me the strength too to pass through the ordeal.

Mean and Vindictive

Owing to my preoccupations due to the untimely death of Jamnalalji I have not been able to attend to even important matters. I have just learnt of the arrests of Shri Hare Krushna Mahtab, a staunch believer in non-violence, and other workers. Shri Mahtab wanted to be bailed out. But the application has been rejected. I hope the matter will be taken to the High Court. It is preposterous that bail should be refused in such cases. I have learnt further that the Orissa Ministry has effected these arrests in order to prevent a motion of no confidence being carried at the forthcoming meeting of the Orissa Legislature. If this is true, the action is mean and vindictive. Let us hope that the members of the Orissa Assembly will have the courage and gentlemanliness to support the motion of no confidence irrespective of party bias.

Oasis in a Desert

In the midst of the desert of adverse but ill-thought criticism of Government officials of basic education it is refreshing to find the following appreciation of the basic schools of Bihar from the pen of Mr. E. R. J. R. Cousins, Adviser to H. E. the Governor of Bihar, received by Shri Aryanayakam, Secretary of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh:

"I am sorry that my programme for the inspection of the basic schools was interfered with by heavy rain and had to be curtailed. But I was able to meet the teachers and pupils of 18 out of the 27 schools, 6 at Brindaban-Rampurva and 12 at Chaubetola-Parukia, and I was extremely interested in all that I saw. We shall not of course be able to judge the experiment fully until the completion of all seven grades, but I was impressed with the cleanliness, intelligence and obvious pleasure of the pupils in their work, and I am confident that we are proceeding on the right lines, and that children of 14 who have gone through the entire basic curriculum will not fail in comparison with those who have gone through the ordinary school course up to the same age.

A particular encouraging feature, and one upon which I place the greatest emphasis, is that the schools have undoubtedly succeeded in capturing the goodwill and interest of the village people, and as long as this can be retained it is impossible for the system to fail of being a success. The public spirit displayed by the proprietors and the villagers of Chaubetola-Parukia in providing such excellent playgrounds for the school, in preparing roads and equipping the scouts troop, which is one of the largest I have ever seen, and above all in insisting that the village boys shall attend the school regularly is most commendable, and I am assured that similar proofs of public interest are exhibited in connection with other schools which I was not able to see. I feel confident that the efforts of the villagers will be well repaid, and that in addition to education in the ordinary sense the village boys of the future will acquire at the schools such attributes of mental alertness, manual dexterity, health and cleanliness as will make the villagers in future more healthy, attractive and enlightened places than they have been in the past."

Eyes to the Blind

Though I had heard a lot about the reputation of Dr. Mathuradas of Moga, I had never had occasion to witness any of his famous operations for cataract, until I saw them in Wardha last month. He came specially at the invitation of Jamnalalji, and with his assistants restored eyes to about three hundred people who had been blinded by cataract.

These mass operations have been described as a yajna (sacrifice). And yajna it certainly is, as any act of selfless service is a sacrifice. This yajna began some years ago in the Bhagavad Bhakti Ashram at Rewari, with which Jamnalalji was closely connected. He therefore invited the doctor this time to Wardha. I bowed to Dr. Mathuradas in admiration for his unerring and quick surgical hand. He performed operations at the rate of one in a minute, there was scarcely a mishap. Thousands thus get back their eyes free, as he charges no fee to the poor.

The doctor told me that nowhere except in India was cataract so common as was also rhino-plasty. These operations, therefore, place him in the forefront of the surgeons for cataract throughout the world. No doubt many doctors have now taken up the work and copy his example. It is just as it should be, for the medical profession should be one of selfless service. And there was no humanitarian mission for which Jamnalalji was not ready. It came to him as naturally as any of his business enterprises. That was why he had a scheme in hand for making these operations a periodical feature in C. P.

I hope that the scheme will not be interrupted by his death, and Dr. Mathuradas is always ready for these yajnas.

Limbdi Exodus Anniversary

The Limbdi exodus has entered upon its fourth year. The *Hijrat*is who took part in it deserve congratulations. Some have dropped out, out of weakness, as happens in all movements. Not all that are born into this world live. Quite a lot die at birth. Many survive their childhood. Only a few cover the full span of life. Even so it is with human endeavour. Many rally to the call, but only a few persevere till the end. But those who do, vindicate the sacrifice of those who have dropped by the wayside, and serve as beacon-lights to subsequent generations. The *Hijrat*is must be prepared to prove their mettle in the final heat. Success will be theirs, only if they show themselves to be capable of making full sacrifice for the cause which they hold dear and to which they have dedicated themselves.

'Nai Talim'

With its January number Nai Talim, the organ of the Hindustani Talimi Sangh, entered on its fourth year of life. It began publication six months after the Talimi Sangh came into being and the experiment in basic education commenced. Workers were few; the road before the pioneers was beset with thorns. Nai Talim was started in order to help those who had dedicated their lives in this endeavour. The experiment in basic education is a revolutionary one. It is only by pooling experiences and recording failures no less than successes that we can hope to achieve our goal. Those engaged in the work must continue to help in making Nai Talim the source of information and guidance that is its role.

The office is being shifted to Patna. Acharya Badrinath, who has played an important part in making the experiment in Bihar a success, will now share the burden of editorship with Shrimati Asha-devi. The fact that there is a basic training centre in Patna and several basic schools in Champaran district should help Nai Talim to be in the closest touch with this new experiment.

While the organ is meant primarily to serve those engaged in teaching and promoting basic education, the Hindi and Urdu reading public will benefit themselves if they subscribe to this monthly. After all the aim of basic education is to make useful and good citizens of our children. The scheme should, therefore, arouse the interest of all who are keen on bringing in a system which claims to bring light and life where so far there has been darkness and deadness.

The subscription is Rs. 1/4 per annum including postage, and the monthly can be had from the Talimi Sangh Office, Sevagram. There is an Urdu edition also published from the Jamia Millia, Delhi, Sevagram, 21-1-42

HELL IN AJMER

(By Rameshwari Nehru)

During our recent wanderings Thakkar Bapa and I had the opportunity of going round the Harijan bastis in Ajmer City. As was expected by us we had almost to wade through pools of filth in the Mehtars' localities. The lanes seemed never to have even cultivated an acquaintance with the broom. Open drains fouled the whole atmosphere, and these were the habitations of the very people who kept the whole city clean!

But the most painful sight was the night-soil reservoir of the city, unmentionably dirty but situated close to many sweepers' and other houses. Six years ago I saw it, though, in spite of my efforts, I could not stop there to watch its working. But its memory had stayed with me like a nightmare. I had tried then to get the public of Ajmer as well as others interested in it. The matter was also brought to the notice of the authorities of the Municipality. But evidently to no effect.

Learning that this reservoir was still in the same old condition, Thakkar Bapa and I went to see it, though once again I found it impossible to stand there for long. Thakkar Bapa, of course, courageously and carefully went round the whole place and said with a simplicity, characteristic of him, that he could swear in a court of law that nowhere else in India did such a bad system of night-soil disposal exist. And Thakkar Bapa knows almost every Harijan basti in our country!

The reservoir consists of two rectangular tanks, about 100'x20'x10' each, which are used alternately. The night-soil mixed up with sewage water is shovelled into one of the tanks from a platform above, from a distance, thus exposing to view all the dirt. A Mehtar has to shovel the matter into the tank with something like a scraper attached to a long pole while his feet are immersed in the semi-liquid filth. The tanks are open, and the foul smell from the night-soil of a whole city of one and a quarter lakhs of population can better be imagined than described.

The most painful and inhuman part of the whole business is that about half a dozen Mehtars have every day to get right down into the tank in the midst of all the filth it contains, in order to see that the outlet from the tank is not choked with solid material. They have to wade through liquid filth, 1 to 2 ft. deep. While doing so it is difficult for them to save even their hands and other parts of the body from getting soiled. From the tank the liquid is taken out in an open channel, 2 miles long, and then utilised as manure. The whole thing is a revolting sight and a standing disgrace to civilised society.

We approached the President of the Municipal Committee and impressed on him the need to cover these tanks, to arrange for the shifting of night-soil straight from the cart to the tank through man-holes, and to provide sanitary implements for the Mehtars to do the work so that they may not be forced to touch the filth with their hands or feet. The present arrangement is inhuman and must be replaced by more scientific and sanitary arrangements. It is the least that can be expected from the Municipality. The President gave us an assurance that our suggestions would be accepted by the Committee. We anxiously await the results.

MODEL SCHOOLS FOR HARIJANS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Seth Ghanashyamdas Birla, President of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, writes:

"We are thinking of establishing a few residential schools mainly for educating Harijan boys, though not exclusively. So far, whenever we have talked of Harijan hostels or schools, we have thereby meant cheap schools or cheap hostels conducted by ill-educated and ill-paid teachers and wardens with boys half-starved. So long as we educate Harijans or children of poor parents in these cheap institutions, the boys will never succeed in shedding the inferiority complex from which they often suffer. And what will they learn from these unqualified and ill-paid teachers? These boys never get the opportunity to mix with the other boys. The harm due to this lack of contact between the poor and the well-to-do or between Harijans and Savarnas is mutual. I therefore propose that we should have a few residential schools established in pleasing environment. They should be of a standard that would compare favourably in every respect with a well-conducted public school. We should start a few such schools first of all as a trial.

They should be of the matriculation standard and affiliated to a university. They should, of course, be mostly residential. Personal attention to students should be a speciality. Education should be imparted through the medium of the mother-tongue. English should be taught as a second language. During the period of this education, the boys should be taught useful handicrafts chosen for their educative value.

In order to make this education thorough and self-sufficient, we should take two years more than the time needed for the matriculation examination. These two years should be utilised in giving extra training to the boys besides what they learn for the matriculation course.

We propose to have three crafts, one of which will be taken up by every boy at his option. These will be:

Either (1) Carding, Spinning, Weaving, Dyeing and Bleaching; or (2) Carpentry and Smithy; or (3) Paper-making, Book-binding, and Ordinary Composing.

It is intended to employ a superior staff, adequately paid, to ensure good qualifications. The underlying idea is that the boys may not feel the want of a college education. There will be no bar to such. The boys, it is hoped, will not find it difficult to earn an honest livelihood after finishing the course. It will be the duty of the Board to accommodate such boys as may like to be.

Besides the university course and craft, special attention will be given to increasing their general knowledge and hygiene. Music, games, exercises, riding, swimming, etc. should be taught. Religious or moral training should not be neglected. Equal respect for all religions should be inculcated, along with a good grounding in the principles of Hinduism and the peculiar beauties of our own culture.

Half the number of the students should be Harijans who would have free education and free boarding and lodging. The other half of the students, i. e. Savarnas, should be charged fees.

This is a very rough and brief outline of my idea of a good high school.

But there is difference amongst us about this outline. Some say: Why should we have the matriculation course? Others say: We should not undertake costly education as this will be a bad example to set. It is argued that we may employ most qualified men, but only if they come on a bare maintenance and out of a spirit of sacrifice. In other words, in their opinion, in this school there would be no room for teachers other than those prepared to lead a simple life of sacrifice. Some go to the extent of saying that we should rather have no school than start one which is not manned by a highly self-sacrificing staff.

I consider all this unpractical. I need not give my arguments. They are obvious.

Will you express your views on this question?"

I whole-heartedly support Seth Ghanashyamdas's scheme. The arguments advanced in opposition seem to be based more on caution than on principle. I too should side with the opposition, if the scheme was to be financed out of the meagre funds of the Harijan Board. But I assume that the model schools would be financed by special donations enough to guarantee their full working. Having lived in South Africa for twenty years where every Indian is treated almost as a pariah, I know how sensitive the mind becomes under unnatural treatment. I took some time to regain my balance though I never lost the sensitiveness. I felt that I was a strange creature in the company of the general body of Europeans. The plight of Harijans in India is much worse because of their much greater ignorance and still greater poverty. Therefore, if we are to break down the double complex, we have to bring up a fair number of Harijan lads in surroundings in no way inferior to those that are available to the well-to-do class boys. The scheme under examination does not contemplate the production of clerks who would be too big for their boots and who would be naturally discontented because no one would have them as clerks. Boys trained under the scheme would be in no way inferior in knowledge to the other matriculates. But these will be better placed because their bodies will be specially looked after and their hands will have their cunning fully developed. Such boys will have their future assured. They will have self-confidence. They will not be torn from their kith and kin; on the contrary, they will be expected to serve fellow Harijans and give them benefit of the teaching they have received.

It may be objected that I am inconsistent in that I have written and spoken against the present system of education. The objection would be superficial. In the first place, the worst features of the system will be eliminated in that the training will be in the mother-tongue and the boys will be taught handicrafts which should enable them to earn an independent and decent living. Secondly, an objection that may be applicable to boys who can be better educated cannot be held good in the case of boys who have no choice and who smart under the knowledge that they cannot have the education that thousands of boys have simply because they are not Harijans. I would not insult Harijan lads by arguing with them that what the thousands of non-Harijan lads are doing is wrong, and that therefore they had better be satisfied with the shanties which Seth Ghanashyamdas has referred to in his letter.

I plump for his scheme. I wish him all success. The sooner it is launched, the better for Harijans and better for India. These schools will be potent instruments for exorcising the demon of untouchability.

FROM THE OLDEST CONGRESSMAN

Dear Mahatmaji,

I congratulate you upon your dissociation with the believers of violence as far as possible. God gave you an opportunity to do so at Poona, but at Bombay you forgot all about that God-given opportunity. At Bardoli God gave you that opportunity again. I am exceedingly glad that you did not make the same mistake at Wardha as you had done at Bombay. God never forsakes him whose surrender to Him is complete.

Life of everything other than the Eternal is limited by the laws of Nature. Violence was created by God who gave it a limited life. God in His infinite wisdom now finds that violence was given a trial and found wanting in preserving world peace. How and for what purpose armament was created is not known, but it is now certain that armament at the present time is used by violence for indiscriminate man-slaughter throughout the world, and the inevitable result is annihilation of mankind and a deluge of blood all over the world. This is threatening the whole world with wholesale extermination of mankind. The only reassuring circumstance is that Nature gave both violence and armament only limited life to live, and it is high time that they should quit the world. All that violence and armament did during their tenure of life was war and nothing but war. Now the world war is complete, and violence and armament are exhausting themselves to be entirely finished.

This world war may not be the longest but it must be the last, and a new world with perfect peace and tranquillity will emerge out of the ashes of violence and armament for the benefit of mankind.

The outgoing world is almost entirely enveloped by a cloud of disbelief in God. A considerable number of the disbelievers not only deny the very existence of God but they assert that belief in God is a moral weakness, if not delinquency and a bar to human progress. The rest of the disbelievers think that God is more dead than alive, and that they are the masters of all they survey. The total number of these disbelievers is the largest, and they are responsible for the world war. Then come the waverers who entertain the idea of God differently in accordance with their different temperaments. The pictures of God that they draw up in their minds are accordingly different. But those waverers agree in forgetting that God is more living than they suppose Him to be. To them the words 'Omnipresent', 'Omniscient' and 'Omnipotent' are for the expression of lip-loyalty to God and not for the enlightenment of their minds about Him.

God-believing India will not have man-given violence and armament-controlled freedom for exploiting the weaker section of humanity. She must have God-given freedom for their service — seva.

God-given freedom can be obtained only by satyagraha, sufferings for which can be successfully undertaken only by those whose surrender to Him is complete. The number of satyagrahis is steadily increasing. Let the advocates of violence say and do whatever they may, the number of believers in non-violence will steadily go on increasing and the world will have real peace.

A HISTORIC MEETING

Why in Calcutta ?

So much has appeared in the press about the possibility of Gandhiji meeting the Generalissimo of China, that a few facts must be placed before the reader. The very first intimation of the Generalissimo's desire to see Gandhiji at Sevagram was received from Pandit Jawaharlal. The next intimation came from the Deputy Commissioner at Wardha who had received a message from the Governor to go and enquire of Gandhiji if he would meet the Generalissimo. Gandhiji was expecting to hear about the date of the distinguished visitor's coming. But after this nothing was heard of the visit until Pandit Jawaharlal informed us that for some reasons beyond the Generalissimo's control the visit could not come off, that he would be the last man to think of troubling Gandhiji to go to Delhi, and that it would be with the deepest regret that he would have to go away without seeing him. Thereupon Gandhiji sent a letter to General Chiang Kai-shek expressing his willingness to go to any place in India, and also sent a telegram to the same effect. The Deputy Commissioner at Wardha was all the while asking me when the guest was coming! And I kept on telling him that I was no less ignorant than he. At last when we had almost given the thing up, came a message from Jawaharlalji to the effect that General Chiang Kai-shek could not possibly go away without seeing Gandhiji, and asking me if Gandhiji could possibly go to Shantiniketan where the Generalissimo was expected to arrive on the 18th. This, I said, was impossible, for Gandhiji had to be back for the important meeting of Jamnalalji's friends that Gandhiji had called on the 20th to consider the ways and means of continuing his great work. Then Pandit Jawaharlalji suggested Calcutta. Gandhiji immediately agreed, and he said he would gladly perform the 48 hours' journey, if only to have five or six precious hours with the Hero of China.

That is how the meeting came about. We were staying in Birla Park where the Generalissimo and his distinguished wife were good enough to call on Gandhiji within an hour of his arrival. The plan was to have a sort of 'courtesy' meeting and then for both to meet again in the afternoon. "I would not think of asking you to come to the Government House," said the Generalissimo. "We would come again, after you have had your meal and rest." "But," said Gandhiji, "I have had my meal on the train in order to give you the whole of my time here, and I would suggest, if it were not inconvenient to you, to stay here, have an Indian meal with us, and we can then talk until the minute of my departure. We can thus save the time of going to and coming back from Barrackpore." And so the guests stayed, gave the Birla sons the honour of a meal in their house, and talked with Gandhiji until the moment of his departure for the station.

The Unique Pair

There are few pairs comparable in history to the Chiangs. The Generalissimo is of humble birth. He went to Japan when nineteen for military training, entered the Military Staff College, is said to have served several years in the Japanese army. It was in Japan that he met the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the maker of free China, who gave him the revolutionary inspiration. His life may be said to have been dedicated to working for the Chinese Revolution and the freedom of China since then. He entered for a time into business, but by 1925 was Chairman of the Standing Committee of the Kuomintang, and "when Dr. Sun Yat-sen died, he assumed office as Commander of the nationalist army."

I cannot go into the history of the Generalissimo's efforts to unify China and to prepare the country for an indomitable endeavour to fight Japan's aggression. The bare facts of his life I have taken from Gunther's Inside Asia, but I hesitate to adopt his version of the General's career of unification by conquest and the "ten weary years of civil war", for the simple reason that I have had no opportunity of verifying and checking the facts.

The Generalissimo married the Madame, a distinguished daughter of the famous Soong family, in 1927. Madame Chiang, the daughter of a Methodist, has taken all her education in America, and thus functions as the interpreter for her husband who knows no foreign language except Japanese. But she is very much more than his interpreter. She has been his trusted adviser and faithful companion in all that the Generalissimo has passed through. Great is his devotion to her. Reference must be made, even in this scrappy account of their career, to the heroic part played by both in what is known as the Sian episode, in which the General was kidnapped and imprisoned by Chang Hsueh-liang at Sian where the General had gone to investigate into something going amiss. Chang Hsueh-liang, known as the Young Marshal, had been asked by the Generalissimo to fight the Communists. Instead he flirted and fraternised with them, and when he was called to account by the Generalissimo, the latter found himself surrounded and imprisoned. The Generalissimo "refused to eat, refused to talk, refused to listen." The dialogue between the captor and the captive has been recorded by the Generalissimo in his own diary. Said the captor: "If Your Excellency accepts my suggestions, I shall obey your orders."

The captive replied: "Which are you, my subordinate or my enemy? If my subordinate, you should obey my orders. If you are my enemy, you should kill me without delay. You should choose either of the two steps, but say nothing more, for I will not listen to you."

Then the captor said: "I think you are the only great man of this age, but why won't you yield a little, comply with our requests, and lead us on in this revolution so that we may achieve something instead of your merely sacrificing your life?"

To which the Generalissimo replied: "If I stand firm and would rather sacrifice my life than compromise my principles, I shall be able to maintain my integrity till death, and my spirit will live for ever."

Whilst this drama was being enacted in Sian, the Madame was pleading with the Kuomintang Generals to be patient and not to attempt to crush the mutiny by force. Donald, the Chiangs' Australian adviser, and the Madame were concerned not so much in freeing the Generalissimo as in keeping the forces in check. If these had not been kept in check, the mutiny might have been crushed but the Generalissimo might also have been lost for ever to the Revolution. She "fought on two feet like a man", keeping throughout her wonderful presence of mind, and acting with cool courage and tact which sometimes become the essence of non-violence. She flew to Sian, delivered herself into the hands of her husband's captor, putting him on his honour, and had her husband honourably released. The husband would sign no terms. He had written to her: "I will never allow myself to do anything to make my wife ashamed of me or become unworthy of being a follower of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Since I was born for the Revolution I will gladly die for the same cause. I will return my body unspotted to my parents." When at last she went and rescued him, he exclaimed in the words of Jeremiah: "Jehovah will now do a new thing, and that is, He will make a woman protect a man." (Let me say in passing that the Generalissimo was a Buddhist. When he was courting Madame his suit was rejected because he was not a Christian. But he said that was the last thing he would do since he should fall in her estimation by changing one's religion for the sake of gaining her hand; he would study Christianity seriously and then would adopt it if he felt inner conversion. The plea told, and it was three years after marriage that he became a Christian.)

The Generalissimo has tremendous self-introspection. Like Gandhiji he often blames himself for the shortcomings of his followers, and he indeed assumed responsibility for the mutineers who imprisoned him at Sian. And after honourable release by the mutineers who later begged his pardon, the Generalissimo repeatedly offered his resignation.

The character of the Generalissimo's heroism during his single-handed mortal combat with Japan is very well known. English historians usually disdain to think of an oriental hero's military achievements with respect and admiration. But China's four years' heroic struggle has begun to extort their admiration, maybe because China is now their ally. "Japan's invasion of China," writes Mr. A. G. Gardiner, "was the first great move in the drama. She had torn up the Nine Power Treaty which guaranteed the integrity of China, and neither Britain nor the United States—which like Japan herself were signatories to that Treaty—lifted a finger to save China... Japan thought she had a walk-over..... Instead a miracle happened—the greatest miracle of this war, perhaps in its effect the most pregnant miracle in history—China did not collapse in three months. Her Government did not surrender, her people did not cry for mercy. They perished men, women, and children by the hundred thousand and by the million... In the fifth year of the war which was to be over in three months, Japan finds herself bogged in China... She has not destroyed a nation, she has made a nation. ....China has been hammered in the furnace of pain and sacrifice into one of the great nations of the earth.....The secret of that resurrection is due to the inspired leadership of Chiang Kai-shek."

But to return to the Madame. She is in charge of the air force and is the life and soul of the New Life Movement, which is almost on the lines of our constructive programme—organisation of the villages and villagers, teaching them sanitation, hygiene, orderliness and cleanliness, freedom from vice and intoxicating drugs and liquors, and so on.

In life and in work the Madame and her husband are inseparable, a common revolutionary urge and a common ambition to save their country being the real indissoluble bond between them—as was the case between Lenin and his wife, and Dr. Sun Yat-sen and his wife (who, by the by, is Madame Chiang Kai-shek's elder sister).

Generalissimo's Philosophy of Action

Those are the bare facts of their life. Though they stayed nearly five hours at Birla House, the interview was all too brief. Both the Generalissimo and Gandhiji were talking against time. Besides, the Generalissimo's sole preoccupation is the winning of the war, and therefore beyond his inflexible will and the grim determination that you find almost written in his iron frame and chiselled features as also in the slow and deliberate manner of his talk, sometimes lit up by an almost imperceptible smile, you can get no inkling of his philosophy of action from his talk. What is of tremendous importance to us, who are in the same case as China, is this philosophy. Thanks to the China Information Bureau, Gandhiji had with him a pamphlet issued by them entitled A Philosophy of Action by the Generalissimo. The pamphlet was put into his hands by Pyarelal who thought he should read it before meeting the Generalissimo. The translation from the Chinese is by the Madame, as I found out from her, who said that infinite pains were taken over the preparation of this great document. The faithful interpreter has appended a brief foreword and notes to this "speech given by a man equal in stature to the tremendous scene speaking quietly in an age of lone desolation", and has shown by means of these learned notes that when the head of revolutionary China "expounds the philosophical basis for the revolution, we find in his mouth the words of the ancients."

It may sound strange — though it need not, inasmuch as ancient Chinese wisdom and ancient Indian wisdom are very nearly identical — but it is a fact that the philosophy of action expounded in this lecture is practically the same as the philosophy of the Gita. "Work or action is life," says the Generalissimo, and adds that "when we speak of action, we should mean action performed in the service of life, i. e. the life of mankind." "No one," says the Gita, "stays for a moment without action; everyone is made to act by the very essence of his nature." (3. 5) Says the Generalissimo: "From birth to death, while he is subject to space and time, a man cannot withdraw himself from the sphere of action; he grows up in action and his character is formed and elevated by action." Again, "perform," says the Gita, "work determined for thyself;" "thou shalt not attain sin if thou performest action determined by thy own nature." (18.47) "We need only concern ourselves," says the Generalissimo, "as to whether what is done is in harmony with the laws of man's innate character . . . The action of which I have been speaking is the operation of man's innate faculties according to the true natural laws of his being." This action — selfless, detached action for the good of the world — is the law as much of our being as of Nature. The Gita sternly says: "He who does not turn the wheel thus revolving leads a sinful life of ease, he lives in vain." (3.16) Says the Generalissimo: "Such motion as that of the revolving globe we ought not to call mere motion; that ceaseless axial and orbital rotation is a phenomenon called in ancient times the activity of nature; and it may serve as the best possible illustration of the qualities of action."

Here comes a distinction which the Generalissimo has drawn between right action (what we might call yajna or selfless action, in the language of the Gita) and wrong action, inaction or quiescence, or mere futile motion. It is a luminous passage which I am tempted to quote at some length: "Action differs from motion. Action is continuous, whereas motion is intermittent; action is spontaneous, whereas motion is usually due to the application of external force. Action is in response to the supreme order of things and in harmony with the nature of man. Motion is impulsive response to some fortuitous external stimulus . . . As an illustration, action may be compared to a ceaseless flow of water, in the words of Confucius, 'racing on, unpausing day and night'. Motion on the other hand may be compared to the impact of a stone upon water into which it is thrown. The water is violently agitated and leaps high into the air; its movement is tumultuous while it lasts, but subsides when after a moment or so the extraneous force that caused it is expended. Such motion is therefore transitory, simply because the motive force comes from without." Another picturesque simile revealing the peculiar genius of the Chinese language: "A man who lives by passion and impulse, who moves rather than acts, is like a bell, which when struck vibrates and emits sound but unless struck is silent." The man who does not know the essence of right action, says the Gita, is swayed by the triple passions of lust, anger and greed, but the man of equipoise and right understanding "acts and enjoys life through Self, is satisfied through Self, and is content through Self." (3.17) He does not act, he is in repose. But repose is not quiescence or inaction. "Repose can have a positive function," says the Generalissimo. "What I call the philosophy of action permits of no distinction between motion and repose, a distinction which is superficial." In the Gita says the Lord: "I am always in sleepless, ceaseless action" (3. 23), and yet it is repose. As the Madame says in her notes: "A suitable image would be that of the spinning top or gyroscope, which achieves equilibrium by virtue of the very speed of its rotation, and attains in fact a repose which in the case of the top is colloquially so quaintly but forcibly described as its sleeping." Or in the language of the Chinese philosopher quoted by the Generalissimo, Tseng Kuo-fan: "There is no question of shutting oneself up in oneself and turning one's mind to dead ash. That is not true repose at all: in fact, any such state of mind may be converted into bewildered agitation by some fortuitous cause of disturbance."

And then the Gita teaching of acting without an eye to the result finds a beautiful echo in these words of the Generalissimo: "We are, everyone, men born of woman and passing our days between heaven and earth; not for us to vex ourselves with fear of failure, the only failure is in failing to act."

The last but the most important point. The spring of right action is right knowledge,—compare the whole of the second discourse of the Gita dealing with right knowledge,—and then, says the Generalissimo: "Just as action proceeds from knowledge, action in its turn engenders knowledge. . . . In all our undertakings practice will yield us true knowledge, and action alone will give us the ability to extend and enrich our knowledge." (Cf. Gita, 4.33; 18.57; 10.10.) — Buddhiyoga in these references being the word corresponding to knowledge.

To one who has grasped this gospel the rest of the message will be crystal clear. "Work is indeed life; unless a man be totally incapable, he will inevitably require the means of expression for his abilities, and particularly such expression as will accrue to the benefit of somebody beyond himself. Even a little child is conscious of the intense satisfaction to be derived from doing one's best in the service of others. Though no praise be awarded the child, it is aware of an extraordinary complaisance within

CRIMINAL ASSAULTS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The whole world is on trial today. No one can escape from the war. Whilst the Ramayana and the Mahabharata are products of poets' imagination, their authors were not mere rhymsters. They were seers. What they depicted is happening before our very eyes today. Ravana is warring with each other. They are showing matchless strength. They throw their deadly weapons from the air. No deed of bravery in the battlefield is beyond their capacity or imagination.

Man would not fight in this manner, certainly not the gods. Only brutes can. Soldiers drunk with the pride of physical strength loot shops and are not even ashamed to take liberties with women. The administration is powerless in war time to prevent such happenings. The army fulfils their primary need, and they wink the eye at their misdeeds. Where a whole nation is militarised the way of military life becomes part and parcel of its civilisation. Therefore a soldier's taking such liberties is not a matter for condemnation. But it would take generations for India to become so.

Hence arise questions like the following which a sister sends me:

"(1) If a soldier commits an assault on a woman, can she be said to have lost her virtue?

(2) Is such a woman to be condemned and ostracised by society?

(3) What should women and the public do under such circumstances?"

Whilst the woman has in point of fact lost her virtue, the loss cannot in any way render her liable to be condemned or treated as an outcast. She is entitled to our sympathy for she has been cruelly injured, and we should tend her wounds as we would those of any injured person.

A woman is worthy of condemnation only when she is a willing party to her dishonour. In no case are adultery and criminal assault synonymous terms. If we were to view the matter in this light, we would not hide such instances as has thus far been our wont. Public opinion against such conduct on the part of men towards women would then be created and freely exercised.

If the press carried on a sustained agitation, soldiers white or brown would probably cease to behave in this manner. Their officers would be compelled to prevent such misbehaviour.

My advice to women is that they should leave the cities and migrate to the villages where a wide field of service awaits them. There is comparatively little risk of their being assaulted in villages. They must, however, live simple lives and make themselves one with the poor. If they will display their wealth by dressing in silks and satins and wearing jewellery, they will, in running away from one danger, expose themselves to a double. Naturally the advice cannot refer to those whom duty compels to live in cities.

The main thing, however, is for women to know how to be fearless. It is my firm conviction that a fearless woman who knows that her purity is her best shield can never be dishonoured. However beastly the man, he will bow in shame before the flame of her dazzling purity. There are examples even in modern times of women who have thus defended themselves. I can, as I write, recall two such instances. I therefore recommend women who read this article to try to cultivate this courage. They will become wholly fearless, if they can and cease to tremble as they do today at the mere thought of assaults. It is not, however, necessary for a woman to go through a bitter experience for the sake of passing a test of courage. These experiences mercifully do not come in the way of lakhs or even thousands. Every soldier is not a beast. It is a minority that loses all sense of decency. Only twenty per cent of snakes are poisonous, and out of these a few only bite. They do not attack unless trodden on. But this knowledge does not help those who are full of fear and tremble at the sight of a snake. Parents and husbands should, therefore, instruct women in the art of becoming fearless. It can best be learnt from a living faith in God. Though He is invisible, He is one's unfailing protector. He who has this faith is the most fearless of all.

But such faith or courage cannot be acquired in a day. Meantime we must try to explore other means. When a woman is assaulted she may not stop to think in terms of himsa or ahimsa. Her primary duty is self-protection. She is at liberty to employ every method or means that come to her mind in order to defend her honour. God has given her nails and teeth. She must use them with all her strength and, if need be, die in the effort. The man or woman who has shed all fear of death will be able not only to protect himself or herself but others also through laying down his life. In truth we fear death most, and hence we ultimately submit to superior physical force. Some will bend the knee to the invader, some will resort to bribery, some will crawl on their bellies or submit to other forms of humiliation, and some women will even give their bodies rather than die. I have not written this in a carping spirit. I am only illustrating human nature. Whether we crawl on our bellies or whether a woman yields to the lust of man is symbolic of that same love of life which makes us stoop to anything. Therefore only he who loses his life shall save it; तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः । Every reader should commit this matchless shloka to memory. But mere lip loyalty to it will be of no avail. It must penetrate deep down to the innermost recesses of his heart. To enjoy life one should give up the lure of life. That should be part of our nature.

So much for what a woman should do. But what about a man who is witness to such crimes? The answer is implied in the foregoing. He must not be a passive onlooker. He must protect the woman. He must not run for police help; he must not rest satisfied by pulling the alarm chain in the train. If he is able to practise non-violence, he will die in doing so and thus save the woman in jeopardy. If he does not believe in non-violence or cannot practise it, he must try to save her by using all the force he may have. In either way there must be readiness on his part to lay down his life.

If old, decrepit and toothless, as I am, I were to plead non-violence and be a helpless witness of assault on the honour of a sister, my so-called Mahatmaship would be ridiculed, dishonoured and lost. If I or those like me were to intervene and lay down our lives whether violently or non-violently, we would surely save the prey and at any rate we would not remain living witnesses to her dishonour.

So much about the witnesses. But if the courageous spirit pervades the entire atmosphere of our country and it is known that no Indian will stand women being assaulted, I venture to say that no soldier will dare to touch them. That such a spirit does not exist is a matter of shame for us. But it will be something, if persons ready to wipe out this blot are forthcoming.

Those who have influence with the Government will try to get the authorities to take the necessary action. But self-help is best help. In the present circumstances we may rely only on our own strength and God's help.

A LEGITIMATE GRIEVANCE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A Bengali correspondent writes:

"I am sorry to inform you that Dr. Suresh Bannerji has been interned within Naria P. S. in the district of Faridpur. Naria is his village home; but nobody lives in the village house and there is no qualified medical man available in the vicinity. The nearest steamer station is 20 miles from the village, where the conveyance is a country boat. Internment without trial is bad enough, but the present order savours even of vindictiveness. At first a gagging order was served on him in December last, whereby he was asked not to deliver any speech or conduct any procession. That was in the last week of December. He did not defy the order. After that there was a labour strike in the Budge Budge jute mill area. Labourers wanted dearness allowance, and I believe that demand was justified. If Dr. Bannerji's stay in the labour area was undesirable in the opinion of the Government, they could have externed him from the labour area.

There is another case also which you should know. Shri Pitabas Das, of village Kakra, post Gopinathpur in the Contai sub-division of Midnapur, has been interned in his village. He had been offering satyagraha for nine months and was moving from village to village and uttered the slogan as usual. He was not arrested. He stopped satyagraha on 30th December after the Bardoli resolution. Then on the 23rd of January, he was served with an internment order to reside within his village and not to communicate or converse with several Congressmen. Before joining the satyagraha movement he and his wife together were doing khadi work. When he joined satyagraha his wife was in full charge of the khadi work and conducted it very efficiently. There is not a single village in Bengal where so many people use khadi. Out of a total population of 3,000 there are about 1,000 khadi wearers in that village. I cannot understand why a man who was not arrested for reciting the anti-war slogan for months together is interned under the Defence of India Rules as soon as he stops satyagraha. I know Pitabas Babu thoroughly well. He is perfectly non-violent. I cannot understand this action of the Bengal Government which is supposed to depend for its existence upon the vote of Congressmen who are in the legislature."

The action against Dr. Suresh Bannerji is decidedly cruel. Vindictive may be a strong word to use in this connection. I prefer to use the word cruel, for Suresh Babu is not an unknown man. He is himself a member of the Bengal legislature. He is known to be an ill man. He was dying of tuberculosis of the bone. But by his indomitable will to live, not for the sake of living but for the sake of the country, he survived the fell disease. He put himself in a plaster of Paris jacket for a long time, rigorously carried out medical instructions, and reached a workable condition. All this is known to the Bengal Government. They know that he needs constant medical advice. He needs careful nursing and the use of medical amenities. It is therefore cruel to intern Dr. Bannerji. I do not know how far the Bengal Government are justified in externing the doctor. I do not know their side of the case. But there can be no case for his internment, and that in a place, though his own village, where he cannot keep his health and where medical aid and other comforts are not easily procurable. I do hope that the Bengal Government will redress this palpable grievance.

The other case my correspondent refers to is of a different category. To all intents and purposes there seems to be no cause for the internment of Pitabas Babu. The Bengal Government is responsible to the people. The order could not have been passed over their heads by the Governor. They cannot enforce the Defence of India Act in an arbitrary manner. They must justify to the public every action they take. The Assembly, if it is to justify its existence, has to keep itself informed of the reasons for the acts of the responsible executive. The taunt of the correspondent against the Congress members of the Bengal legislature has substance behind it. They have a special reason to demand justification of steps like those taken against Suresh Babu and Pitabas Babu.

The attention of the agents is drawn to the agency term No. 1 about maintaining with us a deposit equivalent to at least the price of one month's copies required by them. This rule will be strictly observed, and the supply to defaulters will be stopped at once.

A HISTORIC MEETING

itself. . . . Life from childhood to old age is the energetic, ceaseless use of our faculties at first chiefly for the satisfaction of the needs of one's own existence, to secure one's own footing in life, but next, as one's mental perspective broadens, the family, the village, the community, the nation, and mankind become objects of the desire to express oneself and give of oneself. . . . A man worthy of his place in the ranks of the Revolution will regard as nothing extraordinary difficulties and dangers that would daunt others. His revolutionary spirit, which is the very spirit of action, gives him a sublime indifference to whatever may be the magnitude of the demands his duty makes upon him; whatever his principles, faith and responsibility involve is "all in the day's work" for him, though it be ordeal by fire and water or the abnegation of everything dearest to him. He takes no account of difficulty, and fear is a thing still stranger to him. It is in the sense that to a man with such an attitude action is easy that I use the word." And in the great words of Tseng Kuo-fan he sounds a homely warning: "Again and again have you been delinquent in your duties and endeavours, and been swayed by material possessions; but no one has ever heard of your being unpunctual at meal-times!!"

These, if I may say so, read almost as though they were paragraphs from Harijan or Young India. And naturally, because the Generalissimo's business, like Gandhiji's, "for 99.9 per cent of his time, is to practise, not preach" (Madame).

The Talk

But, the reader will impatiently exclaim, what about the talks? Two passengers asked Gandhiji at the Howrah station, "Have you arrived at some settlement?" As though Gandhiji had gone to strike some bargain or arrive at some settlement with him! There was no such thing in the mind of either. All they wanted to do was to know and understand each other, and that they have been able to do somewhat. I say "somewhat". For part of the time was taken up by Gandhiji in explaining the genesis and course of satyagraha and non-cooperation, and also in demonstrating to the Generalissimo and the Madame the action of his "weapon of war"—a weapon which, as he explained, "makes no noise, which does not kill, but which, if anything, gives life." The Madame watched the working of the dhanush takli and said: "You will have to teach me this." "Come to Sevagram, and I shall teach it to you. Let the Generalissimo leave you here as his ambassador, and I adopt you as my daughter." He could speak thus intimately to them as he had already at the end of the day developed those relations with them. For half an hour or so the official interpreter who accompanied the Generalissimo interpreted him. Then, said Gandhiji: "But surely ours is not a formal official talk. Why should not the Madame interpret you?" "Now, now, Mahatmaji, that is devastating," she said. "Now I know how everyone succumbs to you.

My husband is most taxing. Whenever there is something very difficult to interpret, some delicate nuances of his thought to be conveyed, I must interpret him. But for one year I have been having an easy time asking the official interpreter to do it for me." "That means that you are a faithless wife," said Gandhiji laughing. "Surely," retorted the Madame. "He did not marry an interpreter, he married a woman." And so on, and so forth. No wonder at the end of the first talk the Madame said: "I have met too many men to succumb to anyone. But the Mahatma has captivated me." The rest of the talk had better be guessed. The Generalissimo was sure that non-cooperation was good for India, but he was not sure that it would serve equally well for other countries—unless of course they were like India in their circumstances and environments. He was naturally full of indignation at what Japan had done and was doing in China, and he had grave fears of India having to go through China's terrible fate if the Japanese overran India. It was not possible for Gandhiji to discuss the whole of our non-violent technique, but he left the Generalissimo in no doubt that Japan or Germany would be confronted with fierce non-cooperation or civil resistance. "Your civil resistance," said the Generalissimo, "is not mere passivity. I am sure. But these foes may not listen to active civil resistance, and may make even the preaching of non-violence impossible."

"All I can say," said Gandhiji, "is that God gives me the guidance to react to situations as they arise. Though, therefore, I cannot say how exactly I will react in case of an invasion, I know that God will give me the proper guidance. But this talk cannot, I know, satisfy you. I would invite you to come to Sevagram where we can discuss the subject quietly for days. I know of course that it is an impossible request, for you cannot possibly stay."

"Who knows," said the Madame, "we may be back here sooner than later. And after all Calcutta is only 12 hours from Chungking."

"Then you will pay me a monthly visit," said Gandhiji as he bade a hearty good-bye to the distinguished visitors.

"Where's my wheel?" said the Madame. "Where's my wheel?" as she was leaving the Birla Park. It had by mistake been taken to the station along with our other luggage. "You shall have it," said Gandhiji. "I shall send it on to you from the station."

And now the dhanush takli is part of her luggage on her way back to China. She may or may not work it, but it is sure to appeal to the simple and artistic workmanship of China, and will be either copied or improved upon for the poor of that land.

'Harijan' in Marathi

A Marathi edition of Harijan will be published from Bajajwadi, Wardha, from March 1st. The subscription will be Rs. 5 per annum. Shri Gopalrao Kale, one of the early members of Satyagrahashram, is the Editor. He will be assisted by Shri Dada Dharmadhikari of Sarvodaya. I have advised that the weekly ought not to be published unless it becomes self-supporting. Shri Gopalrao and his associates have accepted the advice. I hope that the venture will be supported by the Marathi reading public.

Khadi Students

I have been asked to write something in regard to khadi students of today. I have already written a little, but it cannot be too clearly stated nor enough stressed that knowledge of spinning, carding and the other processes alone does not constitute true khadi learning. That may be termed its mechanics. To understand the inner meaning of khadi one has to know why it has to be turned out by hand and not by power machinery. Why should innumerable hands be employed when a single person can manipulate an engine which can produce the same amount of cloth in far less time? If khadi has to be produced by hand, why not by the takli only? And if the takli, why not the bamboo takli? And if we could get the necessary work by suspending yarn by means of a stone, why even a takli? Such questions are perfectly natural. To find proper answers to all such is a necessary part of khadi research. I do not want to discuss these questions here. All I want to say is that true knowledge of khadi goes far beyond the mechanical processes, and requires patient research. We have not the means of imparting such knowledge today. Therefore khadi instructors have to improve their knowledge even whilst they are teaching. And students have to acquire knowledge through their own diligence. In olden times when no scientific knowledge was available students used to be their own teachers and became first rate scholars and experts. We are more or less in the same position today.

Price Control Anarchy

A correspondent, who is fully conversant with the situation regarding price control obtaining in various parts of the country, writes:

"I have read your article on 'Price Control' in Harijan of the 8th inst.

The position with regard to wheat supplies in Calcutta continues to be very acute. I am mentioning some facts below:

While the controlled price in Punjab and U. P. is fixed at Rs. 4-6-0 per maund, the wholesale selling price in Bengal is fixed by the Provincial Controller at Rs. 5-12-0. This difference of Rs. 1-6-0 does not leave sufficient margin for the importer who has to incur about Rs. 1-8-0 to Rs. 1-9-0 per maund as charges in respect of freight, bags, handling, shortage, interest, etc. The result has been that importers are not at all interested in importing wheat in Bengal. Of course at present the difficulty has been aggravated by the action of the Government of Punjab in placing a restriction on the export of wheat from that province and also due to shortage of railway wagons. It is understood that out of about 7 to 8 thousand chakkis in the city less than 500 are working at present.

The Statesman has been carrying on a ceaseless propaganda against those leaving Calcutta but, leaving aside the first rush created by genuine panic just after the declaration of war by Japan, one of the main reasons why the poorer classes are now leaving Calcutta is that they are unable to get foodstuffs at reasonable rates owing to shortage.

I have also received reports from certain upcountry teachers employed in our schools here in Harijan bustees, which had to be closed down owing to the emergency, that in certain U. P. districts no wheat is available, and that the worst quality of rice is being sold at Rs. 8 per maund owing to scarcity.

You have referred in Harijan to the Price Control Conference which was held in Delhi in the first week of February. That Conference is a purely official gathering convened from time to time by the Commerce Member, and does not include any representatives of non-official public or the mercantile community."

The sooner this anarchy is ended the better. I know that the Price Control Conference is a purely official body, but if the Conference is to serve the interests of the poor by keeping in touch with the realities of the situation and acquainting itself from time to time with the effects of the policy pursued by Government, it is its duty to consult representatives of the non-official mercantile community.

A Sister's Tribute

The beautiful tributes that will be paid to the memory of Shri Jamnalalji will be as universal as the sorrow that is felt all over the country. To know him was to love him. A kindlier and more sympathetic personality it is difficult to imagine.

Amongst his many labours for the cause of social reform—for he was primarily an ardent reformer—his bold stand for the woman's cause deserves special mention. He belonged to a community, singularly conservative in its ideas regarding women's rights. But, as in so many other things in his own life, he fearlessly brought about drastic changes in this sphere in his family circle. His task was not an easy one. He told me he found it difficult to make Shrimati Jankibai give up certain old customs, but his faith in the woman's cause was undaunted and he won through. He gave his daughters the same opportunities for education as he did to his sons; in the matter of marriage he gave them liberty of choice, and he gave them dowries to make them economically independent. The Mahila Ashram, Wardha, was, perhaps, the institution dearest to his heart among the many that he has founded. He often told me that he wanted to see women doing well in every sphere of life, that he wanted them to become fearless, to lead simple lives, to devote themselves to the service of the country, and to be able to hold their own against men. Women have lost a very doughty champion in Jamnalalji. But we have not really lost him. His example is there for all time as also his blessings. It remains for us to make ourselves worthy examples of the high ideals which he had for womankind.

Gleanings from A. I. V. I. A. Minutes

Shri Jairamdas Daulatram has been co-opted as a member of the Board. The Board has equipped the children's playground in front of the Udyog Bhavan, Wardha, with swings, see-saws, etc., at a cost of Rs. 89-6-0. This is in keeping with the Association's ideal for its centres to render service to all their neighbours. There were 214 ordinary members, 28 agents and 29 certified shops on the rolls of the Association on December 31st 1941. At the request of Shrimati Mridula Sarabhai to afford facilities for training women workers, the Board decided to train women who have passed the spinning examination of the A. I. S. A. and are likely to make use of their training in future. Scholarships to deserving women will in future be awarded on the same basis as to men.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Hindustani

Q. Will you tell me what I should do? You should know that I believe in the Wardha resolution.

A. That is to say, you believe that, if the Congress demand is satisfied, you will take your full share in the war effort. But whatever happens the Wardha resolution on the constructive programme invites you to contribute your full quota to the fourteenfold constructive programme. Therefore, and even apart from it, I suggest your learning Hindustani so as to be able to establish contact with the masses. And Hindustani, as I have shown, means today Hindi and Urdu till a chemical compound is formed of the two. You may not quarrel with this labour of love. Your earnestness will make everything easy. You know some Hindi. You should make considerable advance in it. The Persian script is very easy to learn. There are very few fundamental signs to represent thirtyseven letters. No doubt the joining of the letters causes some difficulty, but learning of the alphabet including the joining is a matter of a week at the most, if you give one hour every day. Then it is a question of daily practice for half an hour, and you will have a workable knowledge of Urdu in six months. Surely it is a fascinating study to compare the two scripts and the two styles for the same speech. All this would be true, if you have love of the country and its people. If our minds were not fatigued by the effort to master the difficult English language, we should find it a light labour, or rather recreation, to study provincial languages.

But the learning of Hindustani in its double form is but the beginning of the constructive programme. You have also to spin regularly, if you are to identify yourself with the poorest in the land, and then add to this the many things in the programme whose complete fulfilment is Complete Independence in the truest sense of the word.

Test of Honesty?

Q. What you have said about Congressmen in the Muslim majority provinces is true enough. But your honesty will be tested by the readiness with which Congressmen follow your advice.

A. I must emphatically repudiate the test. I have begun to write about the subject in order to educate the Congress mind. If I had carried conviction to the members of the Working Committee, I would not have needed to preach my solution. It would have been reduced to practice long ago. But I failed. The step I have advised carries weighty implications without whose acceptance the solution has no meaning. One implication is confidence in the truth of one's step. I admit it is unusual. The general tendency is to make use of the opportunities which seem to be open to you for seizing power. It is difficult for people to understand when I suggest that the opportunity is a trap. To my mind it has already proved to be so. But it is not so clear to the average Congressman. I hope through these columns to make clear what is at present obscure. Those who doubt my honesty do not help me or themselves. But whether they do or not, I must continue to preach so long as I hold to the truth of my solution.

How to Serve with the Body?

Q. You say we should devote our body, intellect and wealth to Jamnalalji's many activities. I can understand giving and to some extent I can understand how we can serve with our intellect. But how with the body?

A. A's heart may lean towards cow service or khadi. But he has no money, he has to earn his own living, then how can he spare time for either service? When he can spare a few moments after his day's work he can persuade his friends to become members of the Goseva Sangh. He can sell and distribute literature without charge; he can do propaganda for and sell cow's milk and ghee or sandals made from non-violent cow hide; he can sell khadi too. If he wants to devote his whole life to the cause, he can do so by entering on a living wage the service of the Sanghs concerned.

A HISTORIC MEETING

Why in Calcutta?

So much has appeared in the press about the possibility of Gandhiji meeting the Generalissimo of China, that a few facts must be placed before the reader. The very first intimation of the Generalissimo's desire to see Gandhiji at Sevagram was received from Pandit Jawaharlal. The next intimation came from the Deputy Commissioner at Wardha who had received a message from the Governor to go and enquire of Gandhiji if he would meet the Generalissimo. Gandhiji was expecting to hear about the date of the distinguished visitor's coming. But after this nothing was heard of the visit until Pandit Jawaharlal informed us that for some reasons beyond the Generalissimo's control the visit could not come off, that he would be the last man to think of troubling Gandhiji to go to Delhi, and that it would be with the deepest regret that he would have to go away without seeing him. Thereupon Gandhiji sent a letter to General Chiang Kai-shek expressing his willingness to go to any place in India, and also sent a telegram to the same effect. The Deputy Commissioner at Wardha was all the while asking me when the guest was coming! And I kept on telling him that I was no less ignorant than he. At last when we had almost given the thing up, came a message from Jawaharlalji to the effect that General Chiang Kai-shek could not possibly go away without seeing Gandhiji, and asking me if Gandhiji could possibly go to Shantiniketan where the Generalissimo was expected to arrive on the 18th. This, I said, was impossible, for Gandhiji had to be back for the important meeting of Jamnalalji's friends that Gandhiji had called on the 20th to consider the ways and means of continuing his great work. Then Pandit Jawaharlalji suggested Calcutta. Gandhiji immediately agreed, and he said he would gladly perform the 48 hours' journey, if only to have five or six precious hours with the Hero of China.

That is how the meeting came about. We were staying in Birla Park where the Generalissimo and his distinguished wife were good enough to call on Gandhiji within an hour of his arrival. The plan was to have a sort of 'courtesy' meeting and then for both to meet again in the afternoon. "I would not think of asking you to come to the Government House," said the Generalissimo. "We would come again, after you have had your meal and rest." "But," said Gandhiji, "I have had my meal on the train in order to give you the whole of my time here, and I would suggest, if it were not inconvenient to you, to stay here, have an Indian meal with us, and we can then talk until the minute of my departure. We can thus save the time of going to and coming back from Barrackpore." And so the guests stayed, gave the Birla sons the honour of a meal in their house, and talked with Gandhiji until the moment of his departure for the station.

The Unique Pair

There are few pairs comparable in history to the Chiangs. The Generalissimo is of humble birth. He went to Japan when nineteen for military training, entered the Military Staff College, is said to have served several years in the Japanese army. It was in Japan that he met the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the maker of free China, who gave him the revolutionary inspiration. His life may be said to have been dedicated to working for the Chinese Revolution and the freedom of China since then. He entered for a time into business, but by 1925 was Chairman of the Standing Committee of the Kuomintang, and "when Dr. Sun Yat-sen died, he assumed office as Commander of the nationalist army."

I cannot go into the history of the Generalissimo's efforts to unify China and to prepare the country for an indomitable endeavour to fight Japan's aggression. The bare facts of his life I have taken from Gunther's Inside Asia, but I hesitate to adopt his version of the General's career of unification by conquest and the "ten weary years of civil war", for the simple reason that I have had no opportunity of verifying and checking the facts.

The Generalissimo married the Madame, a distinguished daughter of the famous Soong family, in 1927. Madame Chiang, the daughter of a Methodist, has taken all her education in America, and thus functions as the interpreter for her husband who knows no foreign language except Japanese. But she is very much more than his interpreter. She has been his trusted adviser and faithful companion in all that the Generalissimo has passed through. Great is his devotion to her. Reference must be made, even in this scrappy account of their career, to the heroic part played by both in what is known as the Sian episode, in which the General was kidnapped and imprisoned by Chang Hsueh-liang at Sian where the General had gone to investigate into something going amiss. Chang Hsueh-liang, known as the Young Marshal, had been asked by the Generalissimo to fight the Communists. Instead he flirted and fraternised with them, and when he was called to account by the Generalissimo, the latter found himself surrounded and imprisoned. The Generalissimo "refused to eat, refused to talk, refused to listen." The dialogue between the captor and the captive has been recorded by the Generalissimo in his own diary. Said the captor: "If Your Excellency accepts my suggestions, I shall obey your orders."

The captive replied: "Which are you, my subordinate or my enemy? If my subordinate, you should obey my orders. If you are my enemy, you should kill me without delay. You should choose either of the two steps, but say nothing more, for I will not listen to you."

Then the captor said: "I think you are the only great man of this age, but why won't you yield a little, comply with our requests, and lead us on in this revolution so that we may achieve something instead of your merely sacrificing your life?"

To which the Generalissimo replied: "If I stand firm and would rather sacrifice my life than compromise my principles, I shall be able to maintain my integrity till death, and my spirit will live for ever."

Whilst this drama was being enacted in Sian, the Madame was pleading with the Kuomintang Generals to be patient and not to attempt to crush the mutiny by force. Donald, the Chiangs' Australian adviser, and the Madame were concerned not so much in freeing the Generalissimo as in keeping the forces in check. If these had not been kept in check, the mutiny might have been crushed but the Generalissimo might also have been lost for ever to the Revolution. She "fought on two feet like a man", keeping throughout her wonderful presence of mind, and acting with cool courage and tact which sometimes become the essence of non-violence. She flew to Sian, delivered herself into the hands of her husband's captor, putting him on his honour, and had her husband honourably released. The husband would sign no terms. He had written to her: "I will never allow myself to do anything to make my wife ashamed of me or become unworthy of being a follower of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Since I was born for the Revolution I will gladly die for the same cause. I will return my body unspotted to my parents." When at last she went and rescued him, he exclaimed in the words of Jeremiah: "Jehovah will now do a new thing, and that is, He will make a woman protect a man." (Let me say in passing that the Generalissimo was a Buddhist. When he was courting Madame his suit was rejected because he was not a Christian. But he said that was the last thing he would do since he should fall in her estimation by changing one's religion for the sake of gaining her hand; he would study Christianity seriously and then would adopt it if he felt inner conversion. The plea told, and it was three years after marriage that he became a Christian.)

The Generalissimo has tremendous self-introspection. Like Gandhiji he often blames himself for the shortcomings of his followers, and he indeed assumed responsibility for the mutineers who imprisoned him at Sian. And after honourable release by the mutineers who later begged his pardon, the Generalissimo repeatedly offered his resignation.

The character of the Generalissimo's heroism during his single-handed mortal combat with Japan is very well known. English historians usually disdain to think of an oriental hero's military achievements with respect and admiration. But China's four years' heroic struggle has begun to extort their admiration, maybe because China is now their ally. "Japan's invasion of China," writes Mr. A. G. Gardiner, "was the first great move in the drama. She had torn up the Nine Power Treaty which guaranteed the integrity of China, and neither Britain nor the United States—which like Japan herself were signatories to that Treaty—lifted a finger to save China... Japan thought she had a walk-over..... Instead a miracle happened—the greatest miracle of this war, perhaps in its effect the most pregnant miracle in history—China did not collapse in three months. Her Government did not surrender, her people did not cry for mercy. They perished men, women, and children by the hundred thousand and by the million... In the fifth year of the war which was to be over in three months, Japan finds herself bogged in China... She has not destroyed a nation, she has made a nation. ....China has been hammered in the furnace of pain and sacrifice into one of the great nations of the earth.....The secret of that resurrection is due to the inspired leadership of Chiang Kai-shek."

But to return to the Madame. She is in charge of the air force and is the life and soul of the New Life Movement, which is almost on the lines of our constructive programme—organisation of the villages and villagers, teaching them sanitation, hygiene, orderliness and cleanliness, freedom from vice and intoxicating drugs and liquors, and so on.

In life and in work the Madame and her husband are inseparable, a common revolutionary urge and a common ambition to save their country being the real indissoluble bond between them—as was the case between Lenin and his wife, and Dr. Sun Yat-sen and his wife (who, by the by, is Madame Chiang Kai-shek's elder sister).

Generalissimo's Philosophy of Action

Those are the bare facts of their life. Though they stayed nearly five hours at Birla House, the interview was all too brief. Both the Generalissimo and Gandhiji were talking against time. Besides, the Generalissimo's sole preoccupation is the winning of the war, and therefore beyond his inflexible will and the grim determination that you find almost written in his iron frame and chiselled features as also in the slow and deliberate manner of his talk, sometimes lit up by an almost imperceptible smile, you can get no inkling of his philosophy of action from his talk. What is of tremendous importance to us, who are in the same case as China, is this philosophy. Thanks to the China Information Bureau, Gandhiji had with him a pamphlet issued by them entitled A Philosophy of Action by the Generalissimo. The pamphlet was put into his hands by Pyarelal who thought he should read it before meeting the Generalissimo. The translation from the Chinese is by the Madame, as I found out from her, who said that infinite pains were taken over the preparation of this great document. The faithful interpreter has appended a brief foreword and notes to this "speech given by a man equal in stature to the tremendous scene speaking quietly in an age of lone desolation", and has shown by means of these learned notes that when the head of revolutionary China "expounds the philosophical basis for the revolution, we find in his mouth the words of the ancients."

It may sound strange — though it need not, inasmuch as ancient Chinese wisdom and ancient Indian wisdom are very nearly identical — but it is a fact that the philosophy of action expounded in this lecture is practically the same as the philosophy of the Gita. "Work or action is life," says the Generalissimo, and adds that "when we speak of action, we should mean action performed in the service of life, i. e. the life of mankind." "No one," says the Gita, "stays for a moment without action; everyone is made to act by the very essence of his nature." (3. 5) Says the Generalissimo: "From birth to death, while he is subject to space and time, a man cannot withdraw himself from the sphere of action; he grows up in action and his character is formed and elevated by action." Again, "perform," says the Gita, "work determined for thyself;" "thou shalt not attain sin if thou performest action determined by thy own nature." (18.47) "We need only concern ourselves," says the Generalissimo, "as to whether what is done is in harmony with the laws of man's innate character . . . The action of which I have been speaking is the operation of man's innate faculties according to the true natural laws of his being." This action — selfless, detached action for the good of the world — is the law as much of our being as of Nature. The Gita sternly says: "He who does not turn the wheel thus revolving leads a sinful life of ease, he lives in vain." (3.16) Says the Generalissimo: "Such motion as that of the revolving globe we ought not to call mere motion; that ceaseless axial and orbital rotation is a phenomenon called in ancient times the activity of nature; and it may serve as the best possible illustration of the qualities of action."

Here comes a distinction which the Generalissimo has drawn between right action (what we might call yajna or selfless action, in the language of the Gita) and wrong action, inaction or quiescence, or mere futile motion. It is a luminous passage which I am tempted to quote at some length: "Action differs from motion. Action is continuous, whereas motion is intermittent; action is spontaneous, whereas motion is usually due to the application of external force. Action is in response to the supreme order of things and in harmony with the nature of man. Motion is impulsive response to some fortuitous external stimulus . . . As an illustration, action may be compared to a ceaseless flow of water, in the words of Confucius, 'racing on, unpausing day and night'. Motion on the other hand may be compared to the impact of a stone upon water into which it is thrown. The water is violently agitated and leaps high into the air; its movement is tumultuous while it lasts, but subsides when after a moment or so the extraneous force that caused it is expended. Such motion is therefore transitory, simply because the motive force comes from without." Another picturesque simile revealing the peculiar genius of the Chinese language: "A man who lives by passion and impulse, who moves rather than acts, is like a bell, which when struck vibrates and emits sound but unless struck is silent." The man who does not know the essence of right action, says the Gita, is swayed by the triple passions of lust, anger and greed, but the man of equipoise and right understanding "acts and enjoys life through Self, is satisfied through Self, and is content through Self." (3.17) He does not act, he is in repose. But repose is not quiescence or inaction. "Repose can have a positive function," says the Generalissimo. "What I call the philosophy of action permits of no distinction between motion and repose, a distinction which is superficial." In the Gita says the Lord: "I am always in sleepless, ceaseless action" (3. 23), and yet it is repose. As the Madame says in her notes: "A suitable image would be that of the spinning top or gyroscope, which achieves equilibrium by virtue of the very speed of its rotation, and attains in fact a repose which in the case of the top is colloquially so quaintly but forcibly described as its sleeping." Or in the language of the Chinese philosopher quoted by the Generalissimo, Tseng Kuo-fan: "There is no question of shutting oneself up in oneself and turning one's mind to dead ash. That is not true repose at all: in fact, any such state of mind may be converted into bewildered agitation by some fortuitous cause of disturbance."

And then the Gita teaching of acting without an eye to the result finds a beautiful echo in these words of the Generalissimo: "We are, everyone, men born of woman and passing our days between heaven and earth; not for us to vex ourselves with fear of failure, the only failure is in failing to act."

The last but the most important point. The spring of right action is right knowledge,—compare the whole of the second discourse of the Gita dealing with right knowledge,—and then, says the Generalissimo: "Just as action proceeds from knowledge, action in its turn engenders knowledge. . . . In all our undertakings practice will yield us true knowledge, and action alone will give us the ability to extend and enrich our knowledge." (Cf. Gita, 4.33; 18.57; 10.10.) — Buddhiyoga in these references being the word corresponding to knowledge.

To one who has grasped this gospel the rest of the message will be crystal clear. "Work is indeed life; unless a man be totally incapable, he will inevitably require the means of expression for his abilities, and particularly such expression as will accrue to the benefit of somebody beyond himself. Even a little child is conscious of the intense satisfaction to be derived from doing one's best in the service of others. Though no praise be awarded the child, it is aware of an extraordinary comeliness within

CRIMINAL ASSAULTS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The whole world is on trial today. No one can escape from the war. Whilst the Ramayana and the Mahabharata are products of poets' imagination, their authors were not mere rhymsters. They were seers. What they depicted is happening before our very eyes today. Ravana is warring with each other. They are showing matchless strength. They throw their deadly weapons from the air. No deed of bravery in the battlefield is beyond their capacity or imagination.

Man would not fight in this manner, certainly not the gods. Only brutes can. Soldiers drunk with the pride of physical strength loot shops and are not even ashamed to take liberties with women. The administration is powerless in war time to prevent such happenings. The army fulfils their primary need, and they wink the eye at their misdeeds. Where a whole nation is militarised the way of military life becomes part and parcel of its civilisation. Therefore a soldier's taking such liberties is not a matter for condemnation. But it would take generations for India to become so.

Hence arise questions like the following which a sister sends me :

"(1) If a soldier commits an assault on a woman, can she be said to have lost her virtue?

(2) Is such a woman to be condemned and ostracised by society?

(3) What should women and the public do under such circumstances?"

Whilst the woman has in point of fact lost her virtue, the loss cannot in any way render her liable to be condemned or treated as an outcast. She is entitled to our sympathy for she has been cruelly injured, and we should tend her wounds as we would those of any injured person.

A woman is worthy of condemnation only when she is a willing party to her dishonour. In no case are adultery and criminal assault synonymous terms. If we were to view the matter in this light, we would not hide such instances as has thus far been our wont. Public opinion against such conduct on the part of men towards women would then be created and freely exercised.

If the press carried on a sustained agitation, soldiers white or brown would probably cease to behave in this manner. Their officers would be compelled to prevent such misbehaviour.

My advice to women is that they should leave the cities and migrate to the villages where a wide field of service awaits them. There is comparatively little risk of their being assaulted in villages. They must, however, live simple lives and make themselves one with the poor. If they will display their wealth by dressing in silks and satins and wearing jewellery, they will, in running away from one danger, expose themselves to a double. Naturally the advice cannot refer to those whom duty compels to live in cities.

The main thing, however, is for women to know how to be fearless. It is my firm conviction that a fearless woman who knows that her purity is her best shield can never be dishonoured. However beastly the man, he will bow in shame before the flame of her dazzling purity. There are examples even in modern times of women who have thus defended themselves. I can, as I write, recall two such instances. I therefore recommend women who read this article to try to cultivate this courage. They will become wholly fearless, if they can and cease to tremble as they do today at the mere thought of assaults. It is not, however, necessary for a woman to go through a bitter experience for the sake of passing a test of courage. These experiences mercifully do not come in the way of lakhs or even thousands. Every soldier is not a brute. It is a minority that loses all sense of decency. Only twenty per cent of snakes are poisonous, and out of these a few only bite. They do not attack unless trodden on. But this knowledge does not help those who are full of fear and tremble at the sight of a snake. Parents and husbands should, therefore, instruct women in the art of becoming fearless. It can best be learnt from a living faith in God. Though He is invisible, He is one's unfailing protector. He who has this faith is the most fearless of all.

But such faith or courage cannot be acquired in a day. Meantime we must try to explore other means. When a woman is assaulted she may not stop to think in terms of himsa or ahimsa. Her primary duty is self-protection. She is at liberty to employ every method or means that come to her mind in order to defend her honour. God has given her nails and teeth. She must use them with all her strength and, if need be, die in the effort. The man or woman who has shed all fear of death will be able not only to protect himself or herself but others also through laying down his life. In truth we fear death most, and hence we ultimately submit to superior physical force. Some will bend the knee to the invader, some will resort to bribery, some will crawl on their bellies or submit to other forms of humiliation, and some women will even give their bodies rather than die. I have not written this in a carping spirit. I am only illustrating human nature. Whether we crawl on our bellies or whether a woman yields to the lust of man is symbolic of that same love of life which makes us stoop to anything. Therefore only he who loses his life shall save it; तेन त्यक्तेन भुञ्जीथाः । Every reader should commit this matchless shloka to memory. But mere lip loyalty to it will be of no avail. It must penetrate deep down to the innermost recesses of his heart. To enjoy life one should give up the lure of life. That should be part of our nature.

So much for what a woman should do. But what about a man who is witness to such crimes? The answer is implied in the foregoing. He must not be a passive onlooker. He must protect the woman. He must not run for police help; he must not rest satisfied by pulling the alarm chain in the train. If he is able to practise non-violence, he will die in doing so and thus save the woman in jeopardy. If he does not believe in non-violence or cannot practise it, he must try to save her by using all the force he may have. In either way there must be readiness on his part to lay down his life.

If old, decrepit and toothless, as I am, I were to plead non-violence and be a helpless witness of assault on the honour of a sister, my so-called Mahatmaship would be ridiculed, dishonoured and lost. If I or those like me were to intervene and lay down our lives whether violently or non-violently, we would surely save the prey and at any rate we would not remain living witnesses to her dishonour.

So much about the witnesses. But if the courageous spirit pervades the entire atmosphere of our country and it is known that no Indian will stand women being assaulted, I venture to say that no soldier will dare to touch them. That such a spirit does not exist is a matter of shame for us. But it will be something, if persons ready to wipe out this blot are forthcoming.

Those who have influence with the Government will try to get the authorities to take the necessary action. But self-help is best help. In the present circumstances we may rely only on our own strength and God's help.

A LEGITIMATE GRIEVANCE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A Bengali correspondent writes:

"I am sorry to inform you that Dr. Suresh Bannerji has been interned within Naria P. S. in the district of Faridpur. Naria is his village home; but nobody lives in the village house and there is no qualified medical man available in the vicinity. The nearest steamer station is 20 miles from the village, where the conveyance is a country boat. Internment without trial is bad enough, but the present order savours even of vindictiveness. At first a gagging order was served on him in December last, whereby he was asked not to deliver any speech or conduct any procession. That was in the last week of December. He did not defy the order. After that there was a labour strike in the Budge Budge jute mill area. Labourers wanted dearness allowance, and I believe that demand was justified. If Dr. Bannerji's stay in the labour area was undesirable in the opinion of the Government, they could have externed him from the labour area.

There is another case also which you should know. Shri Pitabas Das, of village Kakra, post Gopinathpur in the Contai sub-division of Midnapur, has been interned in his village. He had been offering satyagraha for nine months and was moving from village to village and uttered the slogan as usual. He was not arrested. He stopped satyagraha on 30th December after the Bardoli resolution. Then on the 23rd of January, he was served with an internment order to reside within his village and not to communicate or converse with several Congressmen. Before joining the satyagraha movement he and his wife together were doing khadi work. When he joined satyagraha his wife was in full charge of the khadi work and conducted it very efficiently. There is not a single village in Bengal where so many people use khadi. Out of a total population of 3,000 there are about 1,000 khadi wearers in that village. I cannot understand why a man who was not arrested for reciting the anti-war slogan for months together is interned under the Defence of India Rules as soon as he stops satyagraha. I know Pitabas Babu thoroughly well. He is perfectly non-violent. I cannot understand this action of the Bengal Government which is supposed to depend for its existence upon the vote of Congressmen who are in the legislature."

The action against Dr. Suresh Bannerji is decidedly cruel. Vindictive may be a strong word to use in this connection. I prefer to use the word cruel, for Suresh Babu is not an unknown man. He is himself a member of the Bengal legislature. He is known to be an ill man. He was dying of tuberculosis of the bone. But by his indomitable will to live, not for the sake of living but for the sake of the country, he survived the fell disease. He put himself in a plaster of Paris jacket for a long time, rigorously carried out medical instructions, and reached a workable condition. All this is known to the Bengal Government. They know that he needs constant medical advice. He needs careful nursing and the use of medical amenities. It is therefore cruel to intern Dr. Bannerji. I do not know how far the Bengal Government are justified in externing the doctor. I do not know their side of the case. But there can be no case for his internment, and that in a place, though his own village, where he cannot keep his health and where medical aid and other comforts are not easily procurable. I do hope that the Bengal Government will redress this palpable grievance.

The other case my correspondent refers to is of a different category. To all intents and purposes there seems to be no cause for the internment of Pitabas Babu. The Bengal Government is responsible to the people. The order could not have been passed over their heads by the Governor. They cannot enforce the Defence of India Act in an arbitrary manner. They must justify to the public every action they take. The Assembly, if it is to justify its existence, has to keep itself informed of the reasons for the acts of the responsible executive. The taunt of the correspondent against the Congress members of the Bengal legislature has substance behind it. They have a special reason to demand justification of steps like those taken against Suresh Babu and Pitabas Babu.

The attention of the agents is drawn to the agency term No. 1 about maintaining with us a deposit equivalent to at least the price of one month's copies required by them. This rule will be strictly observed, and the supply to defaulters will be stopped at once.

A HISTORIC MEETING

itself. . . . Life from childhood to old age is the energetic, ceaseless use of our faculties at first chiefly for the satisfaction of the needs of one's own existence, to secure one's own footing in life, but next, as one's mental perspective broadens, the family, the village, the community, the nation, and mankind become objects of the desire to express oneself and give of oneself. . . . A man worthy of his place in the ranks of the Revolution will regard as nothing extraordinary difficulties and dangers that would daunt others. His revolutionary spirit, which is the very spirit of action, gives him a sublime indifference to whatever may be the magnitude of the demands his duty makes upon him; whatever his principles, faith and responsibility involve is "all in the day's work" for him, though it be ordeal by fire and water or the abnegation of everything dearest to him. He takes no account of difficulty, and fear is a thing still stranger to him. It is in the sense that to a man with such an attitude action is easy that I use the word." And in the great words of Tseng Kuo-fan he sounds a homely warning: "Again and again have you been delinquent in your duties and endeavours, and been swayed by material possessions; but no one has ever heard of your being unpunctual at meal-times!!"

These, if I may say so, read almost as though they were paragraphs from Harijan or Young India. And naturally, because the Generalissimo's business, like Gandhiji's, "for 99.9 per cent of his time, is to practise, not preach" (Madame).

The Talk

But, the reader will impatiently exclaim, what about the talks? Two passengers asked Gandhiji at the Howrah station, "Have you arrived at some settlement?" As though Gandhiji had gone to strike some bargain or arrive at some settlement with him! There was no such thing in the mind of either. All they wanted to do was to know and understand each other, and that they have been able to do somewhat. I say "somewhat". For part of the time was taken up by Gandhiji in explaining the genesis and course of satyagraha and non-cooperation, and also in demonstrating to the Generalissimo and the Madame the action of his "weapon of war"—a weapon which, as he explained, "makes no noise, which does not kill, but which, if anything, gives life." The Madame watched the working of the dhanush takli and said: "You will have to teach me this." "Come to Sevagram, and I shall teach it to you. Let the Generalissimo leave you here as his ambassador, and I adopt you as my daughter." He could speak thus intimately to them as he had already at the end of the day developed those relations with them. For half an hour or so the official interpreter who accompanied the Generalissimo interpreted him. Then, said Gandhiji: "But surely ours is not a formal official talk. Why should not the Madame interpret you?" "Now, now, Mahatmaji, that is devastating," she said. "Now I know how everyone succumbs to you.

My husband is most taxing. Whenever there is something very difficult to interpret, some delicate nuances of his thought to be conveyed, I must interpret him. But for one year I have been having an easy time asking the official interpreter to do it for me." "That means that you are a faithless wife," said Gandhiji laughing. "Surely," retorted the Madame. "He did not marry an interpreter, he married a woman." And so on, and so forth. No wonder at the end of the first talk the Madame said: "I have met too many men to succumb to anyone. But the Mahatma has captivated me." The rest of the talk had better be guessed. The Generalissimo was sure that non-cooperation was good for India, but he was not sure that it would serve equally well for other countries—unless of course they were like India in their circumstances and environments. He was naturally full of indignation at what Japan had done and was doing in China, and he had grave fears of India having to go through China's terrible fate if the Japanese overran India. It was not possible for Gandhiji to discuss the whole of our non-violent technique, but he left the Generalissimo in no doubt that Japan or Germany would be confronted with fierce non-cooperation or civil resistance. "Your civil resistance," said the Generalissimo, "is not mere passivity, I am sure. But these foes may not listen to active civil resistance, and may make even the preaching of non-violence impossible."

"All I can say," said Gandhiji, "is that God gives me the guidance to react to situations as they arise. Though, therefore, I cannot say how exactly I will react in case of an invasion, I know that God will give me the proper guidance. But this talk cannot, I know, satisfy you. I would invite you to come to Sevagram where we can discuss the subject quietly for days. I know of course that it is an impossible request, for you cannot possibly stay."

"Who knows," said the Madame, "we may be back here sooner than later. And after all Calcutta is only 12 hours from Chunking."

"Then you will pay me a monthly visit," said Gandhiji as he bade a hearty good-bye to the distinguished visitors.

"Where's my wheel?" said the Madame. "Where's my wheel?" as she was leaving the Birla Park. It had by mistake been taken to the station along with our other luggage. "You shall have it," said Gandhiji. "I shall send it on to you from the station."

And now the dhanush takli is part of her luggage on her way back to China. She may or may not work it, but it is sure to appeal to the simple and artistic workmanship of China, and will be either copied or improved upon for the poor of that land.

'Harijan' in Marathi

A Marathi edition of Harijan will be published from Bajajwadi, Wardha, from March 1st. The subscription will be Rs. 5 per annum. Shri Gopalrao Kale, one of the early members of Satyagrahashram, is the Editor. He will be assisted by Shri Dada Dharmadhikari of Sarvodaya. I have advised that the weekly ought not to be published unless it becomes self-supporting. Shri Gopalrao and his associates have accepted the advice. I hope that the venture will be supported by the Marathi reading public.

Khadi Students

I have been asked to write something in regard to khadi students of today. I have already written a little, but it cannot be too clearly stated nor enough stressed that knowledge of spinning, carding and the other processes alone does not constitute true khadi learning. That may be termed its mechanics. To understand the inner meaning of khadi one has to know why it has to be turned out by hand and not by power machinery. Why should innumerable hands be employed when a single person can manipulate an engine which can produce the same amount of cloth in far less time? If khadi has to be produced by hand, why not by the takli only? And if the takli, why not the bamboo takli? And if we could get the necessary work by suspending yarn by means of a stone, why even a takli? Such questions are perfectly natural. To find proper answers to all such is a necessary part of khadi research. I do not want to discuss these questions here. All I want to say is that true knowledge of khadi goes far beyond the mechanical processes, and requires patient research. We have not the means of imparting such knowledge today. Therefore khadi instructors have to improve their knowledge even whilst they are teaching. And students have to acquire knowledge through their own diligence. In olden times when no scientific knowledge was available students used to be their own teachers and became first rate scholars and experts. We are more or less in the same position today.

Price Control Anarchy

A correspondent, who is fully conversant with the situation regarding price control obtaining in various parts of the country, writes:

"I have read your article on 'Price Control' in Harijan of the 8th inst.

The position with regard to wheat supplies in Calcutta continues to be very acute. I am mentioning some facts below:

While the controlled price in Punjab and U. P. is fixed at Rs. 4-6-0 per maund, the wholesale selling price in Bengal is fixed by the Provincial Controller at Rs. 5-12-0. This difference of Rs. 1-6-0 does not leave sufficient margin for the importer who has to incur about Rs. 1-8-0 to Rs. 1-9-0 per maund as charges in respect of freight, bags, handling, shortage, interest, etc. The result has been that importers are not at all interested in importing wheat in Bengal. Of course at present the difficulty has been aggravated by the action of the Government of Punjab in placing a restriction on the export of wheat from that province and also due to shortage of railway wagons. It is understood that out of about 7 to 8 thousand chakkis in the city less than 500 are working at present.

The Statesman has been carrying on a ceaseless propaganda against those leaving Calcutta but, leaving aside the first rush created by genuine panic just after the declaration of war by Japan, one of the main reasons why the poorer classes are now leaving Calcutta is that they are unable to get foodstuffs at reasonable rates owing to shortage.

I have also received reports from certain upcountry teachers employed in our schools here in Harijan bustees, which had to be closed down owing to the emergency, that in certain U. P. districts no wheat is available, and that the worst quality of rice is being sold at Rs. 8 per maund owing to scarcity.

You have referred in Harijan to the Price Control Conference which was held in Delhi in the first week of February. That Conference is a purely official gathering convened from time to time by the Commerce Member, and does not include any representatives of non-official public or the mercantile community."

The sooner this anarchy is ended the better. I know that the Price Control Conference is a purely official body, but if the Conference is to serve the interests of the poor by keeping in touch with the realities of the situation and acquainting itself from time to time with the effects of the policy pursued by Government, it is its duty to consult representatives of the non-official mercantile community.

A Sister's Tribute

The beautiful tributes that will be paid to the memory of Shri Jamnalalji will be as universal as the sorrow that is felt all over the country. To know him was to love him. A kindlier and more sympathetic personality it is difficult to imagine.

Amongst his many labours for the cause of social reform—for he was primarily an ardent reformer—his bold stand for the woman's cause deserves special mention. He belonged to a community, singularly conservative in its ideas regarding women's rights. But, as in so many other things in his own life, he fearlessly brought about drastic changes in this sphere in his family circle. His task was not an easy one. He told me he found it difficult to make Shrimati Jankibai give up certain old customs, but his faith in the woman's cause was undaunted and he won through. He gave his daughters the same opportunities for education as he did to his sons; in the matter of marriage he gave them liberty of choice, and he gave them dowries to make them economically independent. The Mahila Ashram, Wardha, was, perhaps, the institution dearest to his heart among the many that he has founded. He often told me that he wanted to see women doing well in every sphere of life, that he wanted them to become fearless, to lead simple lives, to devote themselves to the service of the country, and to be able to hold their own against men. Women have lost a very doughty champion in Jamnalalji. But we have not really lost him. His example is there for all time as also his blessings. It remains for us to make ourselves worthy examples of the high ideals which he had for womankind.

Gleanings from A. I. V. I. A. Minutes

Shri Jairamdas Daulatram has been co-opted as a member of the Board. The Board has equipped the children's playground in front of the Udyog Bhavan, Wardha, with swings, see-saws, etc., at a cost of Rs. 89-6-0. This is in keeping with the Association's ideal for its centres to render service to all their neighbours. There were 214 ordinary members, 28 agents and 29 certified shops on the rolls of the Association on December 31st 1941. At the request of Shrimati Mridula Sarabhai to afford facilities for training women workers, the Board decided to train women who have passed the spinning examination of the A. I. S. A. and are likely to make use of their training in future. Scholarships to deserving women will in future be awarded on the same basis as to men.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Hindustani

Q. Will you tell me what I should do? You should know that I believe in the Wardha resolution.

A. That is to say, you believe that, if the Congress demand is satisfied, you will take your full share in the war effort. But whatever happens the Wardha resolution on the constructive programme invites you to contribute your full quota to the fourteenfold constructive programme. Therefore, and even apart from it, I suggest your learning Hindustani so as to be able to establish contact with the masses. And Hindustani, as I have shown, means today Hindi and Urdu till a chemical compound is formed of the two. You may not quarrel with this labour of love. Your earnestness will make everything easy. You know some Hindi. You should make considerable advance in it. The Persian script is very easy to learn. There are very few fundamental signs to represent thirtyseven letters. No doubt the joining of the letters causes some difficulty, but learning of the alphabet including the joining is a matter of a week at the most, if you give one hour every day. Then it is a question of daily practice for half an hour, and you will have a workable knowledge of Urdu in six months. Surely it is a fascinating study to compare the two scripts and the two styles for the same speech. All this would be true, if you have love of the country and its people. If our minds were not fatigued by the effort to master the difficult English language, we should find it a light labour, or rather recreation, to study provincial languages.

But the learning of Hindustani in its double form is but the beginning of the constructive programme. You have also to spin regularly, if you are to identify yourself with the poorest in the land, and then add to this the many things in the programme whose complete fulfilment is Complete Independence in the truest sense of the word.

Test of Honesty?

Q. What you have said about Congressmen in the Muslim majority provinces is true enough. But your honesty will be tested by the readiness with which Congressmen follow your advice.

A. I must emphatically repudiate the test. I have begun to write about the subject in order to educate the Congress mind. If I had carried conviction to the members of the Working Committee, I would not have needed to preach my solution. It would have been reduced to practice long ago. But I failed. The step I have advised carries weighty implications without whose acceptance the solution has no meaning. One implication is confidence in the truth of one's step. I admit it is unusual. The general tendency is to make use of the opportunities which seem to be open to you for seizing power. It is difficult for people to understand when I suggest that the opportunity is a trap. To my mind it has already proved to be so. But it is not so clear to the average Congressman. I hope through these columns to make clear what is at present obscure. Those who doubt my honesty do not help me or themselves. But whether they do or not, I must continue to preach so long as I hold to the truth of my solution.

How to Serve with the Body?

Q. You say we should devote our body, intellect and wealth to Jamnalalji's many activities. I can understand giving and to some extent I can understand how we can serve with our intellect. But how with the body?

A. A's heart may lean towards cow service or khadi. But he has no money, he has to earn his own living, then how can he spare time for either service? When he can spare a few moments after his day's work he can persuade his friends to become members of the Goseva Sangh. He can sell and distribute literature without charge; he can do propaganda for and sell cow's milk and ghee or sandals made from non-violent cow hide; he can sell khadi too. If he wants to devote his whole life to the cause, he can do so by entering on a living wage the service of the Sanghs concerned.

Indira Nehru's Engagement

I have received several angry and abusive letters and some professing to reason about Indira's engagement with Firoz Gandhi. Not a single correspondent has anything against Firoz Gandhi as a man. His only crime in their estimation is that he happens to be a Parsi. I have been, and I am still, as strong an opponent of either party changing religion for the sake of marriage. Religion is not a garment to be cast off at will. In the present case there is no question of change of religion. Firoz Gandhi has been for years an inmate of the Nehru family. He nursed Kamala Nehru in her sickness. He was like a son to her. During Indira's illness in Europe he was of great help to her. A natural intimacy grew up between them. The friendship has been perfectly honourable. It has ripened into mutual attraction. But neither party would think of marrying without the consent and blessing of Jawaharlal Nehru. This was given only after he was satisfied that the attraction had a solid basis. The public know my connection with the Nehrus. I had also talks with both the parties. It would have been cruelty to refuse consent to this engagement. As time advances such unions are bound to multiply with benefit to society. At present we have not even reached the stage of mutual toleration, but as toleration grows into mutual respect for religions such unions will be welcomed. No religion which is narrow and which cannot satisfy the test of reason will survive the coming reconstruction of society in which the values will have changed and character, not possession of wealth, title or birth will be the sole test of merit. The Hinduism of my conception is no narrow creed. It is a grand evolutionary process as ancient as time, and embraces the teachings of Zoroaster, Moses, Christ, Mohammed, Nanak and other prophets that I could name. It is thus defined :

विद्वद्भिः सेवितः सद्भिर्नित्यमद्वेषरागिभिः ।

[Know that to be (true) religion which the wise and the good and those who are ever free from passion and hate follow and which appeals to the heart.]

If it is not that, it will perish. My correspondents will pardon me for not acknowledging their letters. I invite them to shed their wrath and bless the forthcoming marriage. Their letters betray ignorance, intolerance and prejudice — a species of untouchability, dangerous because not easily to be so classified.

Disgraceful

The Punjab press reports a deliberate and unprovoked attack on Pandit Sunderlal and Lala Jagannath of the Servants of People Society by four young Hindus at 11 o'clock at night while they were on their way to Lajpatrai Bhavan. The attack is said to have been made because of Pandit Sunderlal having delivered addresses in Lahore on Hindu-Muslim unity in which all offensive language was studiously avoided. One can understand, though never pardon, an attack on some provocation. But an attack such as was delivered on Pandit Sunderlal has no extenuating circumstances. These young men are reported to be members of the Hindu Mahasabha. I hope that the responsible officials will repudiate the action of the youths. Public opinion should make such hooliganism impossible. As for Pandit Sunderlal his cause will prosper for the savagery, and more so because of his dignified disregard and forgiveness of it.

Urdu Made Easy

Charity begins at home. As I was speaking to Jamnalalji's friends on the necessity of their learning Urdu if they believed in Rashtra Bhasha as recommended by the Congress, I thought of the good English proverb, and I began the charity of spreading the knowledge of Urdu in Sevagram. The result was a quick and good response. A class commenced last Wednesday, i. e. 25th February. Practically all, young and old, women and men, joined the class. The teacher captured their imagination. They learnt the primary letters in two sittings of thirty minutes each. By the time this is in print they should have learnt the forms for joining the letters. They will have learnt the alphabet in practically three hours. I know a friend who mastered it in four hours at a single sitting. The difficulty of reading Urdu is undoubtedly there. That can only be overcome by practice. Given the will, the way is easy. And love of the country should surely be sufficient spur to the will.

A PEEP INTO BRITISH HISTORY

The fate of the British Empire along with India hangs in the balance. Those who still hold sway over us would fain have us help in order to save them from their sad plight. But even in their hour of trial they will not so much as get off our backs, if only to enable us to help them. On the contrary they even tighten the stranglehold and make our shortcomings an excuse for their unchivalrous conduct. On the other hand there are many among us who still feel that our salvation lies in British, rather than in our own, hands. It is indeed a pathetic state of affairs. It may be as well for all of us to try to learn from some salient facts from British history.

The Englishmen at the helm of affairs forget that the story of the British people for nearly a thousand years is a story of strife and foreign conquest, and it was only after a common national sympathy, which held the country roughly together, became an indissoluble bond that a real union was possible. At the time of the English Conquest there were the Angles in the East, the Saxons in the South, the Britons in the West, the Jutes already in parts of the South, and the Picts and the Scots in the North. Then came the Danes and the Normans. It is a multi-coloured medley of origins out of which a united England emerges. The medley has left its impress on the character and language of the people. Anglo-Saxon idiom remained the language of the people, while the aristocrats and the intellectuals spoke French. "There was a great fusion of tongue and minds. All the vocabulary of France remained, fixed within the framework of the old Germanic English and enriching it with an inexhaustible treasure of brilliant synonyms. Thus the peasant spoke of the beasts he tended in the farmyard as the sheep, the ox, the calf; the rich man called the roasts served at his table mouton, boeuf, and veau. And today England has mutton, beef and veal for the various meats as well as the old names for the living animals."

Those who came as conquerors but remained as 'natives' helped in welding themselves into a nation. The Roman State was getting weaker and weaker because "the dry rot from within more than any pressure from without was destroying the grand old fabric of Roman power in the West." (Esme Wingfield Strafford). "And yet the Roman organisation died hard, much harder, in fact, than anybody had imagined until Professor Bury discovered that at least as late as 428 the connection with Rome was being maintained, and the normal machinery of Government was still functioning in the province. It must have been very soon afterwards that the final separation occurred, and Britain was left to defend herself as best she might." (Ibid)

The Romans and their Legions left Britain for good, leaving their roads and the impress of their civilisation behind, as soon as they found themselves threatened at home by the barbarians from the North. It was those who remained in Britain, whether as natives, invaders, pirates or conquerors, that wrought the union of England. That is what

Mr. Amery had better remember again, if he has forgotten his history.

As for those of us who imagine that the British rulers can still protect us, there is another page of British history to which we may turn with profit. After the Romans left the Britons to shift for themselves the latter were threatened with invasions and raids from the North. There were two courses which were adopted, and both of them failed. The first was the time-honoured Roman expedient of setting barbarians to fight barbarians. "The one course left was to imitate the fatal policy by which the Empire had invited its own doom while striving to avert it, the policy of matching barbarian against barbarian." (Green) But the policy was "fatal". The other course, which Green has not noted but which other historians, including Gardiner, have noted, was the pathetic clutching at the foreigner who enjoyed no security himself. Says Tout:

"Early in the fifth century the Roman Empire on the Continent was overrun by fierce German tribes, anxious to find new homes for themselves. The settlement of Franks in Northern Gaul cut off Britain from the heart of the Empire, and Rome and Italy itself were threatened. With the Germans at the gates of Rome, it became impossible for the Emperors to find the men and money necessary for keeping up their authority in a distant land like Britain. After 410, the year which saw the sack of Rome by Alaric the Goth, the Romans ceased to send officials and troops to Britain. Henceforth the Britons were left to look for themselves, and their entreaties to the Emperors to help them in their distress were necessarily disregarded." (An Advanced History of Great Britain)

Gardiner gives a more detailed analysis. "After the departure of the Romans, the Picts from the North and Scots from Ireland continued their ravages, but though they caused terrible misery by slaughtering or dragging into slavery the inhabitants of many parts of the country, they did not succeed in making any permanent conquests. The Britons were not without a Government and an armed force, and their later history shows that they were capable of carrying on war for a long time against enemies more formidable than the Picts and the Scots." (Gardiner: Students' History of England) This capacity arising out of their own inner strength was realised later. But for the moment, "in their misery the thoughts of the Britons turned to those Roman legions who had defended their fathers so well. In 446 they appealed to Aetius, the commander of the Roman armies, to deliver them from their destroyers. "The groans of the Britons" was the title which they gave to their appeal to them. "The barbarians," they wrote, "drive us to the sea; the sea drives us back to the barbarians; between them we are exposed to two sorts of death; we are either slain or drowned." (Ibid) What did Aetius say in reply? "Aetius," says Gardiner in one brief sentence, "had no men to spare, and he sent no help to Britons."

Comment is needless.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Riches v. Poverty

Q. How is it possible to earn lakhs in a righteous way? Jamnalalji, the merchant prince, used to say it was not. Moreover, however careful a rich man is, he is bound to spend more on himself than his actual requirements merit. Therefore why not lay more stress on not becoming wealthy than on trusteeship of riches?

A. The question is apt and has been put to me before. What Jamnalalji could have meant was in the Gita sense that every action is tainted. It is my conviction that it is possible to acquire riches without consciously doing wrong. For example I may light on a gold mine in my one acre of land. But I accept the proposition that it is better not to desire wealth than to acquire it and become its trustee. I gave up my own long ago, which should be proof enough of what I would like others to do. But what am I to advise those who are already wealthy or who would not shed the desire for wealth? I can only say to them that they should use their wealth for service. It is true that generally the rich spend more on themselves than they need. But this can be avoided. Jamnalalji spent far less on himself than men of his own economic status and even than many middle class men. I have come across innumerable rich persons who are stingy on themselves. For some it is part of their nature to spend next to nothing on themselves, and they do not think that they acquire merit in so doing.

The same applies to the sons of the wealthy. Personally I do not believe in inherited riches. The well-to-do should educate and bring up their children so that they may learn how to be independent. The tragedy is that they do not do so. Their children do get some education, they even recite verses in praise of poverty, but they have no compunction about helping themselves to parental wealth. That being so, I exercise my common sense and advise what is practicable. Those of us, however, who consider it a duty to adopt poverty and believe in and desire economic equality may not be jealous of the rich but should exhibit real happiness in our poverty which others may emulate. The sad fact is that those who are thus happy are few and far between.

The Duty of a Manager

Q. Is it correct for the head of an institution, while demanding the utmost from his subordinates in the way of the simple life, to live in comparative luxury himself even though the money he spends on himself be his own earnings?

A. The manager who expects more from his co-workers than what he does is bound to fail. This of course applies only to philanthropic institutions whose managers have accepted the ideal of poverty.

Individual v. Collective Cow-keeping

Q. Please explain more fully why individual care of the cow is violent and collective effort non-violent.

A. The present pitiable condition of cattle is surely enough proof. The cow today is a burden simply because individual ownership and care have failed. In a previous article I have explained how the individual cannot take proper care of his cattle, how he cannot keep a bull or grazing ground for himself, and how difficult it is for him to make proper arrangements for the sale of milk and ghee. It would be quite impossible for individuals in any country to make their own arrangements for sending their letters with the ease that the postal department does for crores of people, rich and poor alike. The same applies to cows. If at all the problem can be solved, it will be through collective ownership or use. Ownership and service go ill together. I may belong to one person, but thousands can serve me. If one person alone were to claim the right to serve me, where would I be? This is exactly what is happening to the cow. Individuals own the cow, they do not serve it.

Praja Mandals and the Congress

Q. Please clarify the position of the Congress vis-a-vis Praja Mandal Committees in States. Who should be responsible for political policies there?

A. Praja Mandals are independent bodies having no official connection with the Congress. They may or may not take their inspiration from the Congress policies. Such being the case I should advise them not to irritate State authority by an unnecessary identification with the Congress.

Women

Q. While you have advised women in cities to go into the villages in order to escape from the danger of assaults, do you not think that some of us, at any rate, should be brave enough to face the risk? After all women cannot become brave or self-reliant, if they are always to be kept out of harm's way. Will not one death bravely faced help the woman's cause? There is danger today of our girls being put back into purdah, as it were, by their parents.

A. Of course those who are wanted in the cities must remain at all cost and face the worst. Nothing should be done in bravado. When they go to the villages there will be no purdah. It will be all work and no freedom from danger anywhere on this God-forsaken little ball which two teams are kicking for all they are worth. The days of the purdah are gone for good.

AN APPEAL TO QAID-E-AZAM

( By M. K. Gandhi )

I have been painfully but regularly going through the English weeklies that come to me and that are devoted to the cause of the Muslim League. I read them so as to keep myself informed of what the Muslim mind as influenced by the Muslim League thinks. Not a week passes but these weeklies contain what to me appear to be distortions of truth and vilification of the Congress and Congressmen and Hindus. What has prompted me to write these lines is a virulent attack on Hinduism in one of the weeklies. Here is an extract from the article:

"Hinduism is the greatest curse of India, and it is based on intolerance and inequality. To call one's self a 'Hindu' is to confess that one is reactionary and narrow-minded. No decent, civilised, honest and sincere human being who knows what Hinduism is and what it stands for, would like to be known as a Hindu or join this faith of primitive barbarians. For it is on barbarity that this so-called religion is based. No other word can describe the state of 97 per cent of the population who have been decreed by the gods and goddesses of this precious religion as impure and unclean beings fit only to serve the remaining 3 per cent of the population. . . . We would far rather suggest to the students to prepare in their laboratories of the mind deadly bombs which would completely smash and destroy Hinduism, the greatest menace to India's welfare and well-being."

I hope I shall not be told that the article in question is taken from another newspaper. It has been taken in order to hold up Hinduism to scorn. Though the founder of this paper is Qaid-e-Azam himself and it is issued under the direction of Nawabzada Liaquat Ali Khan, Hon. Secretary of the League, I fancy that they have not seen the article in question.

What will be the state of Hindus under Pakistan? Will they be suppressed as barbarians? There is no attempt in the papers at looking at the other side. The policy adopted in the papers must lead to the promotion of bitterness and strife between the two communities. If the end is to be attained through strife and force and not by persuasion and argument, I can have nothing to say. But I observe from Qaid-e-Azam's speeches that he has no quarrel with the Hindus. He wants to live at peace with them. I plead, therefore, for a juster estimate of men and things in papers representing the policy and programme of the Muslim League.

IN MEMORIAM

On the night of the day on which Jamnalalji was taken from this earth, Gandhiji said, as he lay down to rest, "I do not know what I shall do without him," and ever since the catastrophe his waking thoughts have been full of him. Quick to act, as he always is, he issued an invitation to a great many of Jamnalalji's friends to meet here on the 20th and discuss the best ways and means of honouring the deceased's memory. The response to the invitation was remarkable. Many came from all parts of the country, and those who could not come sent letters to say they would do whatever Gandhiji wanted them to.

The following is the gist of Gandhiji's talks on the 20th and 21st afternoons. It seemed as if he were pouring out the pent up agony of his soul.

First Day

"This is no ordinary meeting. There is no president. An insupportable burden has fallen to my lot, and I am before you not as a president but as a beggar. My relations with Jamnalalji began with my entry into public life in my own country. Since then I have never had to worry. It was an easy thing for me to rely on him to carry out my wishes, for no one had identified himself quite so much with every one of my activities as he. And our work went on smoothly. Now he has gone, and as I could not possibly ask any one person to shoulder the immense burden he carried, I thought I would ask his friends to help me by dividing it. I do not propose to ask for contribution for a memorial to Jamnalalji. Nor do I want to give the chief place to money for the various activities with which he identified himself. If I did so, I would be denying myself. I know that money will come if the work is worthy and worthily done. I want us all to do what is far more difficult, that is to fill ourselves with the spirit with which he worked. That means detailed application to the many activities with which he had identified himself.

"When I arrived at the mansion in the hope that I would find Jamnalalji alive I found that the spirit had departed a few minutes before. No one can really be heartless on such occasions, but I may have seemed so, for instead of sorrowing with Janakidevi I pleaded with her to renounce her all and carry on Jamnalalji's work and be a living sati in the place of burning herself on the funeral pyre as she wanted to. It has been my wont throughout life to throw burdens on people and get the most from them. Janakidevi hesitated a bit and said she had not the ability. I said, if she had the desire, Vinoba would tell her that God would give her the ability and strength. She rose to the occasion. She has renounced not only all her material possessions—about 2½ lakhs—but has dedicated all her time to the work of the Goseva Sangh. Jamnalalji's entire family will, I trust, follow their parent's example and shoulder the burden with their mother to the best of their ability. Jamnalalji had kept aside 6 lakhs for public work. His sons could have kept this sum for themselves. But Kamalnayan — Ramkrishna is still a lad — has made over the entire sum to me to do as I like with. This includes land opposite the Magan Museum, another piece of land, and Maganwadi itself. Besides this they have decided on behalf of Jamnalal & Son to continue the hospitality in the guest house including the private bungalow in Bajajwadi. This may mean an annual expense of Rs. 20,000. Janakibehn will live in the hut in Gopuri which Jamnalalji had built for himself. All this augurs well for the future.

"You have seen a list of Jamnalalji's activities. I should like us to concentrate on his last activity first, viz. cattle preservation through the cow. But cow service is a very difficult task, more difficult than winning Swaraj. Swaraj we will have. But preservation of cattle, even aged, is still a problem to be solved. We work on the assumption that unfit and aged cattle need not be killed. The way Jamnalalji took it up and worked at it for two months is a remarkable proof of his single-minded devotion and powers of organisation. It is amazing what he was able to achieve in so short a time. But his body was too frail to stand the strain, and I had a premonition that we would lose him. His work cannot be replaced by money. It is sterling workers that are most wanted. The question is how to discharge the trust that has devolved on us. Such a death as his is accorded to one in a million. He was fortunate in every way. And we can only prove ourselves worthy of him and his purity, if we can identify ourselves with his activities, each according to the best of his ability. It is not an easy thing I ask, and you must not give simply because I ask it of you. You must only do what you can truthfully and without hesitation. I give goseva first place because Jamnalalji had taken it up in a special way. The work was started years ago. Jamnalalji was the president. But neither he nor I was happy about its progress. It is a great work. If we save the cow, we save human lives too. We could kill and eat the cow as other countries do, but we do not look upon that as human. We have chosen what we regard as the nobler way. But in saving her we must see that she and her progeny are a source of wealth, not the burden that they are today. In the all-India programme framed by Jamnalalji, reform of pinjrapols was one of the main items, and if we succeed in this, it will be a great achievement. Then there is the creation of good bulls, all important for the salvation of the cow and her breed.

"About his other activities, you know that he took his full share in the constructive work in which I had specialised. He gave as much time as, if not more than, I to khadi. I may have given the mantra, but Jamnalalji devoted his intelligence, his powers of organisation and his money to give form to the scheme. He had the gift of seeking out and creating workers too. He felt with me that Swaraj was to be found in khadi, and he organised it while I was in jail, or else it might have died. The same with the Village Industries Association, the Talimi Sangh, the Harijan Sevak Sangh, etc. All of you are not full khadi wearers even today. You have not yet carried the message to every member of your own family. Let us be as fearless and correct as he was.

"Today the country is in danger. Japan is knocking at our doors. What is the mercantile class going to do? Will they lose India for us once again? Will they bow the knee to the new-comer? Seeking freedom from one, shall we submit to another? Jamnalalji's spirit would answer that query for you in no uncertain terms. Many of us harbour hatred for the British, for our understanding of ahimsa is elementary. If we were brave, we would sympathise with them. We want to be friends with them and everyone else, but we may not bend the knee to anyone. If we could win our freedom through non-violence from the British, we need not fear anyone. We would be invincible. But we are weak and therefore in danger, though the future all unknown is in God's hands. The British are a brave people. They have often saved themselves from the jaws of death. Let us face danger even as they do.

"Among Jamnalalji's special activities is the Mahila Mandal. He was exceptionally keen on woman's uplift. The Mahila Ashram was his own conception, and he founded it in order to take charge of the daughters of those who had given themselves to the country's cause.

"Then Hindu-Muslim unity was a cause very dear to Jamnalalji. He had not the slightest trace of communal or class prejudice in him. Let each one of us do what we can in this direction.

"There is again the question of the national language. As you know he was interested in the Rashtra Bhasha prachar. He was principally concerned in drawing me to the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. It was due to his sole effort that the great work of Hindi prachar in the South became possible. It was again due to his help that I was able to carry the resolution about giving an extended meaning to Hindi so as to include Urdu. I ask you all as a token of your regard for Jamnalalji, if you will, to try to learn the Urdu character today. You will find it quite easy to learn the primary letters."

Second Day

On the second day he said: "One thing we may well learn from Jamnalalji's life is to be ever active. We must be more alert, more ready to renounce and submit to discipline. I sometimes feel that, if all of us had military discipline for a year, we would be different beings. Jamnalalji had gone through no military school, and yet he had imposed on himself the training of a soldier. May we learn to impose such training on ourselves. The urge instilled by ahimsa takes the place of an order. For 22 years I have been saying so from the house-tops. If the Congress has not succeeded in full measure, it is because Congressmen have not been true followers of ahimsa. We met yesterday under the call of an ideal. It was a great day. Swami Anand said Jamnalalji had hoped to enlist at least

1,000 members for the Goseva Sangh during the year. You can all help in this direction."

1. A committee of seven was formed under the chairmanship of Shri Rameshwardas Birla for the purpose of creating 1,000 first class bulls. The expenditure was reckoned at five lakhs, and the members gave five to eight years in which to work out the scheme including the raising of the necessary funds.

2. Rs. 50,000 was guaranteed by friends in Calcutta, and they undertook to collect Rs. 50,000 more. This one lakh was to be devoted to khadi work.

3. Shrimati Suvratadevi promised an adequate donation for khadi, village industry and educational work in Rajputana. She promised Rs. 25,000 for khadi work at the centre and to pay a quarterly visit to Wardha.

On the first day Gandhiji had said that he wanted Janakidevi to step into her husband's gadi, and he proposed her name for the presidentship of the Goseva Sangh for the reasons already stated. She has submitted to the ordeal in the hope that God will give her the ability to bear the burden. "When I asked Janakidevi to take up this difficult task," said Gandhiji, "I thought that it was perhaps woman's work, and that where man had so far failed woman might succeed."

Janakidevi was unanimously elected President, Seth Ghanashyamdas Birla was elected Vice-President. Shri Vinoba will be there for guidance and advice on all fundamental questions. Seth Ghanashyamdas will guide the outward activity of the Sangh. Swami Anand has consented to act as Secretary, if he can be spared by Balasaheb Kher.

FOUR YEARS' WORK

Syllabus

In the matter of covering the prescribed syllabus of co-ordinated studies Kashmir reports success. In Bombay the progress of children under the new method does not compare unfavourably with those who read the departmental syllabus. In the C. P. progress in the mother-tongue is good, it is satisfactory in mathematics, very satisfactory in social studies. In general science children show an interest in outdoor work, but in agriculture as in science the necessary equipment for anything but elementary gardening and nature study is not yet available.

The U. P. is the only province where art has obtained due recognition in basic education both for teachers and pupils. Pioneering work in correlating art with craft and self-expression in art is being done in the U. P. and should constitute a valuable contribution to the scheme. Music and physical education have been given a definite place in all basic schools. The danger of the central fact of the scheme being buried in the passion for art must, however, be guarded against.

Difficulties

The syllabus drawn up by the Zakir Husain Committee was only tentative. Any syllabus which aims at far-reaching reconstruction of education requires an extensive background of education and an experimental attitude of mind on the part of teachers. How far the syllabus has been worked in the right spirit it is difficult to say. It has not been worked wholly everywhere. There are all the difficulties attaching to a pioneer experiment. The question of correlation of studies is not easy. Teachers have as yet, generally speaking, neither sufficient knowledge nor mastery over the basic craft, there is also lack of necessary literature and reading material to guide them. The Committee appointed by the Sangh to help training schools has revised and systematised the syllabi of basic crafts for teachers and pupils and is preparing the necessary technical literature in spinning for teachers. Lack of literature for teachers and pupils is one of the criticisms of the scheme, but, as the report says, this is not altogether an unmixed evil. "Teachers and children have so long been used to the dominance of the printed word that the absence of books will stimulate initiative in both. Besides the feeling that the children and teachers are co-operating in the creation of their literature will bring a new pride and interest to their study." Really speaking, given efficient teachers, the need for text-books for children, especially in the early stages, should not arise.

Effect on Teachers

While the beneficial effect of the new scheme on children is definitely encouraging and in marked contrast to the dullness and apathy existing in most village schools, the Talimi Sangh has rightly recognised the importance of the effect on any scheme of education on the teachers. Kashmir notes that it is "having a healthy reaction on their professional outlook. They are more active, thoughtful, social, and conscious of their responsibilities." The Vijay Vidya Mandir says, "They work with love all day long, their knowledge has improved, their insight in child psychology has developed, their outlook on life has changed, and they have understood the importance of manual labour." This is surely a tremendous asset in comparison with the mentality of the average village school teacher.

Then there is the influence which the schools have exercised on the village community. The report claims that where the schools have done good work, and this is especially the case in Bihar, the atmosphere of apathy, suspicion and even hostility in which the schools started has given place to one of sympathy and co-operation. In Brindaban, for example, where an exhibition of the handwork of the children was held, many villagers came walking from long distances. To a large extent this interest and co-operation are the result of the community service undertaken by the schools.

Economic Possibilities

The report gives a few facts regarding the economic possibilities of the scheme.

The U. P. rejected the idea of self-supporting schools but have stressed the importance of self-sufficiency, i. e. that the material required may be supplied by the school itself. They suggest that the articles made by the children should be given away to them. Children are taken away from school for purposes of field labour. If they brought back cloth, for example, to their homes, the farmers might be induced not to remove them from school.

According to the first syllabus of spinning prepared by the Zakir Husain Committee it was reckoned that in a year of 288 working days with 3 hours and 20 minutes devoted to craft work a child could produce Rs. 2-10-0 worth in grade I and Rs. 7 worth in grade II. The standard has been attained only in a few cases for the reason that efficient instruction, the proper amount of time, right equipment and raw material have not always been available.

Calculations of earnings in Bihar are interesting. 78 % of the pupils in Grade II and 71 % in Grade I earned above 50 % of the required standard. The actual maximum individual earning for the year was Rs. 5-4-3 in Grade II and Rs. 1-14-0 in Grade I. Against these the minimum was Re. 0-4-4 in Grade II, Re. 0-1-3 in Grade I. As a result of the year's working a sum of Rs. 2,112-3-0 was placed in the treasury as being the price of the yarn spun by the children and the cloth woven out of it as also their garden produce. There was in hand also stock worth Rs. 268-3-8. After deducting the cost of raw material and production, Rs. 1,124-9-9 represents the actual value realised. Later the individual earning of a child touched Rs. 7-3-4. But irregular attendance, less time allotted to the craft, and the fact that good cotton was not available have definitely brought down the average earning per head.

Conclusion

The importance of free and compulsory primary education, that the medium of instruction throughout should be the mother-tongue, that the child's capabilities should be developed through some form of manual and productive work, have been recognised as sound principles by all educationists and Government authorities. The history of the first three years of basic education, as set forth in the report of the Talimi Sangh, gives ample cause for believing that the scheme is sound. Difficulties have not been minimised. The appeal of the Sangh for better public understanding and for more workers is one which should go home to all who realise the importance in our national life of the right education of our children. Is it too much to expect those Governments who have not yet adopted it to give the scheme a fair trial in howsoever small an area? Above all the Sangh itself has got to show results after 7 years in its own schools. It is their success in the end which must constitute a challenge to the Provincial and Central Governments and the general public and compel its universalisation.

KHADI FORGES AHEAD

I

The report of the All India Spinners' Association for the year 1940, which but for the temporary suspension of Harijan would have been reviewed ere this in these columns, is a businesslike statement of facts and figures of the work done by the Association through its own branches as well as certified private agencies. As the report was written in June 1941, in some respects it covers the first half of that year also. 95,51,438 sq. yds. of khadi (cotton, wool and silk), weighing 30,82,693 lb. and worth Rs. 51,36,983, was produced during the year. Though there was a slight fall in the yardage in comparison to the previous year (from 111 lakhs to 95), the value rose from Rs. 50 lakhs to Rs. 51 lakhs, which suggests that more money was paid either to cotton producers for the cotton purchased, or to artisans in the form of increased wages, or to both. The artisans did actually get more money in 1940 than in 1939. (The spinners and weavers got in 1940 the aggregate amount of Rs. 29,81,798 as against Rs. 28,47,560 in 1939.) The sales rose from Rs. 65 lakhs to Rs. 77 lakhs (a rise of 19 %), which was a welcome sign of the increasing support khadi received from the people. 74 per cent of the total quantity were sold in the provinces of production. This is a healthy development, the value of which will be realised more and more as difficulties of transport increase and export becomes difficult, if not impossible. It is indeed a cardinal principle in the economics of khadi and village industries that their products should find a market primarily in the areas where they are produced, thus eliminating to a large extent the wastage in the distribution of goods. C. P. and Maharashtra, Gujarat and Sind have made the greatest progress in this respect, their provincial sales exceeding 90 per cent. The number of sale depots under the A. I. S. A. was 284. So far as the total net sales were concerned, Gujarat, Punjab, Bombay, Bihar and U. P. showed an increase of over a lakh of rupees each over the sales of 1939, while Tamil Nad showed a fall (for which there must be some special reasons) of over Rs. one lakh. The National Week and the Gandhi Jayanti were utilised as usual for pushing the sales, and over Rs. 10 lakhs worth of khadi was sold during the two Weeks—the pride of place belonging to Gujarat which, in spite of its comparatively small size, effected total sales during these two Weeks amounting to over Rs. 233 thousand. Taking 1928-29 as the basic year (for, after about four years of existence, in that year the A. I. S. A. can reasonably be considered to have put its full resources to use), the comparative figures of production and sales are as follows, and indicate the progress achieved by khadi in a short span of years, mostly by popular support and encouragement, with little, if any, aid from the Government:

	1928-29	(lakhs)	1940
Sales (Rs.)	39		77

In 1940 the investment of the Sangh amounted to Rs. 43 lakhs. With the steady expansion in production the working capital presented a constant problem and exercised the organisers of the Sangh considerably. For years the capital was supplemented by raising loans, which again presented several difficulties, and in 1940, after full consideration, the Sangh resolved to pay off the Bank loans, to stop the policy of taking any more loans, and to raise the capital by donations made by the wealthy for liquidating unemployment. A few lakhs have already been secured in this manner, and an appeal has been made for more. If we take into consideration the huge amounts that States in the West spend by way of bounties to the new industries which they wish to foster (of which the beetroot subsidy in England is a conspicuous example),* or by way of artificially maintaining a high level of prices for their farmers' products (as in England and Hitlerite Germany), and in paying the latter in order to restrict or even destroy their products (as in U. S. A. and Brazil), the amount of 20 lakhs asked for by the A. I. S. A. looks insignificant, and it devolves on lovers of indigenous small scale industries to supply the necessary capital, especially because the State has been—unlike the States in the West, which give all possible aid to their handicrafts—wholly apathetic.

The following abstract of figures, culled from the tables given in the report, will speak for itself:

Yarn produced	Lb. 27,03,351
Workers in A. I. S. A. Branches	2,933
Salaries to workers	Rs. 6,12,380
Workers drawing over Rs. 50	83
No. of villages served	13,451
" " spinners	2,54,968
" " weavers	16,801
" " other artisans	4,377
Total no. of artisans employed	2,76,146
Production centres	608
Wages given to spinners	Rs. 19,00,344
" " weavers	Rs. 10,81,454
" " other artisans	Rs. 4,83,611
Total wages	Rs. 34,65,409
Khadi purchased by spinners	Rs. 3,47,436
Habitual khadi wearers among spinners	23.7 %
" " " " weavers	68.2 %
Khadi sold	Rs. 77,62,750
No. of sale depots	284
Silk—production	Rs. 4,57,514

* "Before the world depression began, the arable farmers (in England) had been aided by a subsidy on sugar-beet—a most expensive subsidy, which actually cost more than would have sufficed to buy the sugar abroad. . . . Moreover, the farmers were enabled to sell their wheat at a price much in excess of its market value, the amount of the subsidy being recovered from the public in the price of bread." — G. D. H. Cole: Practical Economics, p. 230.

Wool—production	Rs. 2,84,611
Cotton consumed	Lb. 26,56,770
Spinners trained in carding	71,657
Spinners trained in spinning	73,356
No. of A. I. S. A. members	3,558
Total wages distributed in 1924-1940	Rs. 3,59,73,443

The report also describes briefly each of the special features of its work. 'Self-sufficiency in cloth' has been an important item in the programme before the Sangh for the last several years. The phrase was recently defined by the A. I. S. A. Council to include "those who fully and habitually wear khadi and regularly spin per month at least 7½ hanks (one hank=840 yds.) of yarn." The report mentions a good increase in spinning for this kind of self-sufficiency. Charkha clubs have been started in many places, and the Provincial Branches of the A. I. S. A. have facilitated the progress by arranging to get the spinners' yarn woven in the respective provinces.

Shankarlal Pattarai & Jamnalal Vidyalaya

Two important and appropriate memorials were opened by Rajaji at Tirupur on the 15th inst. One is a workshop (Pattarai is Tamil for workshop) for the manufacture of all tools and parts required for the khadi movement. This was most appropriately named after Shri Shankarlal Banker whose name is a household word in South India for his services in the cause of khaddar. Shri S. Ramnathan, the present A. I. S. A. Secretary for Tamil Nad, has spared no pains to make the Shankarlal Pattarai as efficient as possible. Shri V. I. Muniswami Pillai is now a whole-time worker in charge of the dye-works and the Shankarlal Workshop. Two Ex-Ministers of the Madras Government are thus absorbed in the khadi work in the South and continue to serve Rajaji in that way! The Harijan community may well be proud of their representative, Shri Muniswami Pillai, who has become charkha-mad.

Jamnalal Vidyalaya is the Khadi Training Institute attached to the Tamil Nad A. I. S. A. branch. Extensive grounds have been acquired for erecting the necessary buildings, and when completed it will be a fitting memorial for the memory of the great man who was President of the A. I. S. A. for so many years from its inception and whose passing away has left us all so disconsolate.

Indira Nehru's Engagement

I have received several angry and abusive letters and some professing to reason about Indira's engagement with Firoz Gandhi. Not a single correspondent has anything against Firoz Gandhi as a man. His only crime in their estimation is that he happens to be a Parsi. I have been, and I am still, as strong an opponent of either party changing religion for the sake of marriage. Religion is not a garment to be cast off at will. In the present case there is no question of change of religion. Firoz Gandhi has been for years an inmate of the Nehru family. He nursed Kamala Nehru in her sickness. He was like a son to her. During Indira's illness in Europe he was of great help to her. A natural intimacy grew up between them. The friendship has been perfectly honourable. It has ripened into mutual attraction. But neither party would think of marrying without the consent and blessing of Jawaharlal Nehru. This was given only after he was satisfied that the attraction had a solid basis. The public know my connection with the Nehrus. I had also talks with both the parties. It would have been cruelty to refuse consent to this engagement. As time advances such unions are bound to multiply with benefit to society. At present we have not even reached the stage of mutual toleration, but as toleration grows into mutual respect for religions such unions will be welcomed. No religion which is narrow and which cannot satisfy the test of reason will survive the coming reconstruction of society in which the values will have changed and character, not possession of wealth, title or birth will be the sole test of merit. The Hinduism of my conception is no narrow creed. It is a grand evolutionary process as ancient as time, and embraces the teachings of Zoroaster, Moses, Christ, Mohammed, Nanak and other prophets that I could name. It is thus defined:

विद्वद्भिः सेवितः सद्भिर्नित्यमद्वेषरागिभिः ।

[Know that to be (true) religion which the wise and the good and those who are ever free from passion and hate follow and which appeals to the heart.]

If it is not that, it will perish. My correspondents will pardon me for not acknowledging their letters. I invite them to shed their wrath and bless the forthcoming marriage. Their letters betray ignorance, intolerance and prejudice — a species of untouchability, dangerous because not easily to be so classified.

Disgraceful

The Punjab press reports a deliberate and unprovoked attack on Pandit Sunderlal and Lala Jagannath of the Servants of People Society by four young Hindus at 11 o'clock at night while they were on their way to Lajpatrai Bhavan. The attack is said to have been made because of Pandit Sunderlal having delivered addresses in Lahore on Hindu-Muslim unity in which all offensive language was studiously avoided. One can understand, though never pardon, an attack on some provocation. But an attack such as was delivered on Pandit Sunderlal has no extenuating circumstances. These young men are reported to be members of the Hindu Mahasabha. I hope that the responsible officials will repudiate the action of the youths. Public opinion should make such hooliganism impossible. As for Pandit Sunderlal his cause will prosper for the savagery, and more so because of his dignified disregard and forgiveness of it.

Urdu Made Easy

Charity begins at home. As I was speaking to Jamnalalji's friends on the necessity of their learning Urdu if they believed in Rashtra Bhasha as recommended by the Congress, I thought of the good English proverb, and I began the charity of spreading the knowledge of Urdu in Sevagram. The result was a quick and good response. A class commenced last Wednesday, i. e. 25th February. Practically all, young and old, women and men, joined the class. The teacher captured their imagination. They learnt the primary letters in two sittings of thirty minutes each. By the time this is in print they should have learnt the forms for joining the letters. They will have learnt the alphabet in practically three hours. I know a friend who mastered it in four hours at a single sitting. The difficulty of reading Urdu is undoubtedly there. That can only be overcome by practice. Given the will, the way is easy. And love of the country should surely be sufficient spur to the will.

A PEEP INTO BRITISH HISTORY

The fate of the British Empire along with India hangs in the balance. Those who still hold sway over us would fain have us help in order to save them from their sad plight. But even in their hour of trial they will not so much as get off our backs, if only to enable us to help them. On the contrary they even tighten the stranglehold and make our shortcomings an excuse for their unchivalrous conduct. On the other hand there are many among us who still feel that our salvation lies in British, rather than in our own, hands. It is indeed a pathetic state of affairs. It may be as well for all of us to try to learn from some salient facts from British history.

The Englishmen at the helm of affairs forget that the story of the British people for nearly a thousand years is a story of strife and foreign conquest, and it was only after a common national sympathy, which held the country roughly together, became an indissoluble bond that a real union was possible. At the time of the English Conquest there were the Angles in the East, the Saxons in the South, the Britons in the West, the Jutes already in parts of the South, and the Picts and the Scots in the North. Then came the Danes and the Normans. It is a multi-coloured medley of origins out of which a united England emerges. The medley has left its impress on the character and language of the people. Anglo-Saxon idiom remained the language of the people, while the aristocrats and the intellectuals spoke French. "There was a great fusion of tongue and minds. All the vocabulary of France remained, fixed within the framework of the old Germanic English and enriching it with an inexhaustible treasure of brilliant synonyms. Thus the peasant spoke of the beasts he tended in the farmyard as the sheep, the ox, the calf; the rich man called the roasts served at his table mouton, boeuf, and veau. And today England has mutton, beef and veal for the various meats as well as the old names for the living animals."

Those who came as conquerors but remained as 'natives' helped in welding themselves into a nation. The Roman State was getting weaker and weaker because "the dry rot from within more than any pressure from without was destroying the grand old fabric of Roman power in the West." (Esme Wingfield Strafford). "And yet the Roman organisation died hard, much harder, in fact, than anybody had imagined until Professor Bury discovered that at least as late as 428 the connection with Rome was being maintained; and the normal machinery of Government was still functioning in the province. It must have been very soon afterwards that the final separation occurred, and Britain was left to defend herself as best she might." (Ibid)

The Romans and their Legions left Britain for good, leaving their roads and the impress of their civilisation behind, as soon as they found themselves threatened at home by the barbarians from the North. It was those who remained in Britain, whether as natives, invaders, pirates or conquerors, that wrought the union of England. That is what

Mr. Amery had better remember again, if he has forgotten his history.

As for those of us who imagine that the British rulers can still protect us, there is another page of British history to which we may turn with profit. After the Romans left the Britons to shift for themselves the latter were threatened with invasions and raids from the North. There were two courses which were adopted, and both of them failed. The first was the time-honoured Roman expedient of setting barbarians to fight barbarians. "The one course left was to imitate the fatal policy by which the Empire had invited its own doom while striving to avert it, the policy of matching barbarian against barbarian." (Green) But the policy was "fatal". The other course, which Green has not noted but which other historians, including Gardiner, have noted, was the pathetic clutching at the foreigner who enjoyed no security himself. Says Tout:

"Early in the fifth century the Roman Empire on the Continent was overrun by fierce German tribes, anxious to find new homes for themselves. The settlement of Franks in Northern Gaul cut off Britain from the heart of the Empire, and Rome and Italy itself were threatened. With the Germans at the gates of Rome, it became impossible for the Emperors to find the men and money necessary for keeping up their authority in a distant land like Britain. After 410, the year which saw the sack of Rome by Alaric the Goth, the Romans ceased to send officials and troops to Britain. Henceforth the Britons were left to look for themselves, and their entreaties to the Emperors to help them in their distress were necessarily disregarded." (An Advanced History of Great Britain)

Gardiner gives a more detailed analysis. "After the departure of the Romans, the Picts from the North and Scots from Ireland continued their ravages, but though they caused terrible misery by slaughtering or dragging into slavery the inhabitants of many parts of the country, they did not succeed in making any permanent conquests. The Britons were not without a Government and an armed force, and their later history shows that they were capable of carrying on war for a long time against enemies more formidable than the Picts and the Scots." (Gardiner: Students' History of England) This capacity arising out of their own inner strength was realised later. But for the moment, "in their misery the thoughts of the Britons turned to those Roman legions who had defended their fathers so well. In 446 they appealed to Aetius, the commander of the Roman armies, to deliver them from their destroyers. "The groans of the Britons" was the title which they gave to their appeal to them. "The barbarians," they wrote, "drive us to the sea; the sea drives us back to the barbarians; between them we are exposed to two sorts of death; we are either slain or drowned." (Ibid) What did Aetius say in reply? "Aetius," says Gardiner in one brief sentence, "had no men to spare, and he sent no help to Britons."

Comment is needless.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Riches v. Poverty

Q. How is it possible to earn lakhs in a righteous way? Jamnalalji, the merchant prince, used to say it was not. Moreover, however careful a rich man is, he is bound to spend more on himself than his actual requirements merit. Therefore why not lay more stress on not becoming wealthy than on trusteeship of riches?

A. The question is apt and has been put to me before. What Jamnalalji could have meant was in the Gita sense that every action is tainted. It is my conviction that it is possible to acquire riches without consciously doing wrong. For example I may light on a gold mine in my one acre of land. But I accept the proposition that it is better not to desire wealth than to acquire it and become its trustee. I gave up my own long ago, which should be proof enough of what I would like others to do. But what am I to advise those who are already wealthy or who would not shed the desire for wealth? I can only say to them that they should use their wealth for service. It is true that generally the rich spend more on themselves than they need. But this can be avoided. Jamnalalji spent far less on himself than men of his own economic status and even than many middle class men. I have come across innumerable rich persons who are stingy on themselves. For some it is part of their nature to spend next to nothing on themselves, and they do not think that they acquire merit in so doing.

The same applies to the sons of the wealthy. Personally I do not believe in inherited riches. The well-to-do should educate and bring up their children so that they may learn how to be independent. The tragedy is that they do not do so. Their children do get some education, they even recite verses in praise of poverty, but they have no compunction about helping themselves to parental wealth. That being so, I exercise my common sense and advise what is practicable. Those of us, however, who consider it a duty to adopt poverty and believe in and desire economic equality may not be jealous of the rich but should exhibit real happiness in our poverty which others may emulate. The sad fact is that those who are thus happy are few and far between.

The Duty of a Manager

Q. Is it correct for the head of an institution, while demanding the utmost from his subordinates in the way of the simple life, to live in comparative luxury himself even though the money he spends on himself be his own earnings?

A. The manager who expects more from his co-workers than what he does is bound to fail. This of course applies only to philanthropic institutions whose managers have accepted the ideal of poverty.

Individual v. Collective Cow-keeping

Q. Please explain more fully why individual care of the cow is violent and collective effort non-violent.

A. The present pitiable condition of cattle is surely enough proof. The cow today is a burden simply because individual ownership and care have failed. In a previous article I have explained how the individual cannot take proper care of his cattle, how he cannot keep a bull or grazing ground for himself, and how difficult it is for him to make proper arrangements for the sale of milk and ghee. It would be quite impossible for individuals in any country to make their own arrangements for sending their letters with the ease that the postal department does for crores of people, rich and poor alike. The same applies to cows. If at all the problem can be solved, it will be through collective ownership or use. Ownership and service go ill together. I may belong to one person, but thousands can serve me. If one person alone were to claim the right to serve me, where would I be? This is exactly what is happening to the cow. Individuals own the cow, they do not serve it.

Praja Mandals and the Congress

Q. Please clarify the position of the Congress vis-a-vis Praja Mandal Committees in States. Who should be responsible for political policies there?

A. Praja Mandals are independent bodies having no official connection with the Congress. They may or may not take their inspiration from the Congress policies. Such being the case I should advise them not to irritate State authority by an unnecessary identification with the Congress.

Women

Q. While you have advised women in cities to go into the villages in order to escape from the danger of assaults, do you not think that some of us, at any rate, should be brave enough to face the risk? After all women cannot become brave or self-reliant, if they are always to be kept out of harm's way. Will not one death bravely faced help the woman's cause? There is danger today of our girls being put back into purdah, as it were, by their parents.

A. Of course those who are wanted in the cities must remain at all cost and face the worst. Nothing should be done in bravado. When they go to the villages there will be no purdah. It will be all work and no freedom from danger anywhere on this God-forsaken little ball which two teams are kicking for all they are worth. The days of the purdah are gone for good.

AN APPEAL TO QAID-E-AZAM

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I have been painfully but regularly going through the English weeklies that come to me and that are devoted to the cause of the Muslim League. I read them so as to keep myself informed of what the Muslim mind as influenced by the Muslim League thinks. Not a week passes but these weeklies contain what to me appear to be distortions of truth and vilification of the Congress and Congressmen and Hindus. What has prompted me to write these lines is a virulent attack on Hinduism in one of the weeklies. Here is an extract from the article:

"Hinduism is the greatest curse of India, and it is based on intolerance and inequality. To call one's self a 'Hindu' is to confess that one is reactionary and narrow-minded. No decent, civilised, honest and sincere human being who knows what Hinduism is and what it stands for, would like to be known as a Hindu or join this faith of primitive barbarians. For it is on barbarity that this so-called religion is based. No other word can describe the state of 97 per cent of the population who have been decreed by the gods and goddesses of this precious religion as impure and unclean beings fit only to serve the remaining 3 per cent of the population. . . . We would far rather suggest to the students to prepare in their laboratories of the mind deadly bombs which would completely smash and destroy Hinduism, the greatest menace to India's welfare and well-being."

I hope I shall not be told that the article in question is taken from another newspaper. It has been taken in order to hold up Hinduism to scorn. Though the founder of this paper is Qaid-e-Azam himself and it is issued under the direction of Nawabzada Liaquat Ali Khan, Hon. Secretary of the League, I fancy that they have not seen the article in question.

What will be the state of Hindus under Pakistan? Will they be suppressed as barbarians? There is no attempt in the papers at looking at the other side. The policy adopted in the papers must lead to the promotion of bitterness and strife between the two communities. If the end is to be attained through strife and force and not by persuasion and argument, I can have nothing to say. But I observe from Qaid-e-Azam's speeches that he has no quarrel with the Hindus. He wants to live at peace with them. I plead, therefore, for a juster estimate of men and things in papers representing the policy and programme of the Muslim League.

IN MEMORIAM

On the night of the day on which Jamnalalji was taken from this earth, Gandhiji said, as he lay down to rest, "I do not know what I shall do without him," and ever since the catastrophe his waking thoughts have been full of him. Quick to act, as he always is, he issued an invitation to a great many of Jamnalalji's friends to meet here on the 20th and discuss the best ways and means of honouring the deceased's memory. The response to the invitation was remarkable. Many came from all parts of the country, and those who could not come sent letters to say they would do whatever Gandhiji wanted them to.

The following is the gist of Gandhiji's talks on the 20th and 21st afternoons. It seemed as if he were pouring out the pent up agony of his soul.

First Day

"This is no ordinary meeting. There is no president. An insupportable burden has fallen to my lot, and I am before you not as a president but as a beggar. My relations with Jamnalalji began with my entry into public life in my own country. Since then I have never had to worry. It was an easy thing for me to rely on him to carry out my wishes, for no one had identified himself quite so much with every one of my activities as he. And our work went on smoothly. Now he has gone, and as I could not possibly ask any one person to shoulder the immense burden he carried, I thought I would ask his friends to help me by dividing it. I do not propose to ask for contribution for a memorial to Jamnalalji. Nor do I want to give the chief place to money for the various activities with which he identified himself. If I did so, I would be denying myself. I know that money will come if the work is worthy and worthily done. I want us all to do what is far more difficult, that is to fill ourselves with the spirit with which he worked. That means detailed application to the many activities with which he had identified himself.

"When I arrived at the mansion in the hope that I would find Jamnalalji alive I found that the spirit had departed a few minutes before. No one can really be heartless on such occasions, but I may have seemed so, for instead of sorrowing with Janakidevi I pleaded with her to renounce her all and carry on Jamnalalji's work and be a living sati in the place of burning herself on the funeral pyre as she wanted to. It has been my wont throughout life to throw burdens on people and get the most from them. Janakidevi hesitated a bit and said she had not the ability. I said, if she had the desire, Vinoba would tell her that God would give her the ability and strength. She rose to the occasion. She has renounced not only all her material possessions—about 2½ lakhs—but has dedicated all her time to the work of the Goseva Sangh. Jamnalalji's entire family will, I trust, follow their parent's example and shoulder the burden with their mother to the best of their ability. Jamnalalji had kept aside 6 lakhs for public work. His sons could have kept this sum for themselves. But Kamalnayan — Ramkrishna is still a lad — has made over the entire sum to me to do as I like with. This includes land opposite the Magan Museum, another piece of land, and Maganwadi itself. Besides this they have decided on behalf of Jamnalal & Son to continue the hospitality in the guest house including the private bungalow in Bajajwadi. This may mean an annual expense of Rs. 20,000. Janakibehn will live in the hut in Gopuri which Jamnalalji had built for himself. All this augurs well for the future.

"You have seen a list of Jamnalalji's activities. I should like us to concentrate on his last activity first, viz. cattle preservation through the cow. But cow service is a very difficult task, more difficult than winning Swaraj. Swaraj we will have. But preservation of cattle, even aged, is still a problem to be solved. We work on the assumption that unfit and aged cattle need not be killed. The way Jamnalalji took it up and worked at it for two months is a remarkable proof of his single-minded devotion and powers of organisation. It is amazing what he was able to achieve in so short a time. But his body was too frail to stand the strain, and I had a premonition that we would lose him. His work cannot be replaced by money. It is sterling workers that are most wanted. The question is how to discharge the trust that has devolved on us. Such a death as his is accorded to one in a million. He was fortunate in every way. And we can only prove ourselves worthy of him and his purity, if we can identify ourselves with his activities, each according to the best of his ability. It is not an easy thing I ask, and you must not give simply because I ask it of you. You must only do what you can truthfully and without hesitation. I give goseva first place because Jamnalalji had taken it up in a special way. The work was started years ago. Jamnalalji was the president. But neither he nor I was happy about its progress. It is a great work. If we save the cow, we save human lives too. We could kill and eat the cow as other countries do, but we do not look upon that as human. We have chosen what we regard as the nobler way. But in saving her we must see that she and her progeny are a source of wealth, not the burden that they are today. In the all-India programme framed by Jamnalalji, reform of pinjrapols was one of the main items, and if we succeed in this, it will be a great achievement. Then there is the creation of good bulls, all important for the salvation of the cow and her breed.

"About his other activities, you know that he took his full share in the constructive work in which I had specialised. He gave as much time as, if not more than, I to khadi. I may have given the mantra, but Jamnalalji devoted his intelligence, his powers of organisation and his money to give form to the scheme. He had the gift of seeking out and creating workers too. He felt with me that Swaraj was to be found in khadi, and he organised it while I was in jail, or else it might have died. The same with the Village Industries Association, the Talimi Sangh, the Harijan Sevak Sangh, etc. All of you are not full khadi wearers even today. You have not yet carried the message to every member of your own family. Let us be as fearless and correct as he was.

"Today the country is in danger. Japan is knocking at our doors. What is the mercantile class going to do? Will they lose India for us once again? Will they bow the knee to the new-comer? Seeking freedom from one, shall we submit to another? Jamnalalji's spirit would answer that query for you in no uncertain terms. Many of us harbour hatred for the British, for our understanding of ahimsa is elementary. If we were brave, we would sympathise with them. We want to be friends with them and everyone else, but we may not bend the knee to anyone. If we could win our freedom through non-violence from the British, we need not fear anyone. We would be invincible. But we are weak and therefore in danger, though the future all unknown is in God's hands. The British are a brave people. They have often saved themselves from the jaws of death. Let us face danger even as they do.

"Among Jamnalalji's special activities is the Mahila Mandal. He was exceptionally keen on woman's uplift. The Mahila Ashram was his own conception, and he founded it in order to take charge of the daughters of those who had given themselves to the country's cause.

"Then Hindu-Muslim unity was a cause very dear to Jamnalalji. He had not the slightest trace of communal or class prejudice in him. Let each one of us do what we can in this direction.

"There is again the question of the national language. As you know he was interested in the Rashtra Bhasha prachar. He was principally concerned in drawing me to the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. It was due to his sole effort that the great work of Hindi prachar in the South became possible. It was again due to his help that I was able to carry the resolution about giving an extended meaning to Hindi so as to include Urdu. I ask you all as a token of your regard for Jamnalalji, if you will, to try to learn the Urdu character today. You will find it quite easy to learn the primary letters."

Second Day

On the second day he said: "One thing we may well learn from Jamnalalji's life is to be ever active. We must be more alert, more ready to renounce and submit to discipline. I sometimes feel that, if all of us had military discipline for a year, we would be different beings. Jamnalalji had gone through no military school, and yet he had imposed on himself the training of a soldier. May we learn to impose such training on ourselves. The urge instilled by ahimsa takes the place of an order. For 22 years I have been saying so from the house-tops. If the Congress has not succeeded in full measure, it is because Congressmen have not been true followers of ahimsa. We met yesterday under the call of an ideal. It was a great day. Swami Anand said Jamnalalji had hoped to enlist at least

1. A committee of seven was formed under the chairmanship of Shri Rameshwardas Birla for the purpose of creating 1,000 first class bulls. The expenditure was reckoned at five lakhs, and the members gave five to eight years in which to work out the scheme including the raising of the necessary funds.

2. Rs. 50,000 was guaranteed by friends in Calcutta, and they undertook to collect Rs. 50,000 more. This one lakh was to be devoted to khadi work.

3. Shrimati Suvratadevi promised an adequate donation for khadi, village industry and educational work in Rajputana. She promised Rs. 25,000 for khadi work at the centre and to pay a quarterly visit to Wardha.

On the first day Gandhiji had said that he wanted Janakidevi to step into her husband's gadi, and he proposed her name for the presidentship of the Goseva Sangh for the reasons already stated. She has submitted to the ordeal in the hope that God will give her the ability to bear the burden. "When I asked Janakidevi to take up this difficult task," said Gandhiji, "I thought that it was perhaps woman's work, and that where man had so far failed woman might succeed."

Janakidevi was unanimously elected President, Seth Ghanashyamdas Birla was elected Vice-President. Shri Vinoba will be there for guidance and advice on all fundamental questions. Seth Ghanashyamdas will guide the outward activity of the Sangh. Swami Anand has consented to act as Secretary, if he can be spared by Balasaheb Kher.

FOUR YEARS' WORK

Syllabus

In the matter of covering the prescribed syllabus of co-ordinated studies Kashmir reports success. In Bombay the progress of children under the new method does not compare unfavourably with those who read the departmental syllabus. In the C. P. progress in the mother-tongue is good, it is satisfactory in mathematics, very satisfactory in social studies. In general science children show an interest in outdoor work, but in agriculture as in science the necessary equipment for anything but elementary gardening and nature study is not yet available.

The U. P. is the only province where art has obtained due recognition in basic education both for teachers and pupils. Pioneering work in correlating art with craft and self-expression in art is being done in the U. P. and should constitute a valuable contribution to the scheme. Music and physical education have been given a definite place in all basic schools. The danger of the central fact of the scheme being buried in the passion for art must, however, be guarded against.

Difficulties

The syllabus drawn up by the Zakir Husain Committee was only tentative. Any syllabus which aims at far-reaching reconstruction of education requires an extensive background of education and an experimental attitude of mind on the part of teachers. How far the syllabus has been worked in the right spirit it is difficult to say. It has not been worked wholly everywhere. There are all the difficulties attaching to a pioneer experiment. The question of correlation of studies is not easy. Teachers have as yet, generally speaking, neither sufficient knowledge nor mastery over the basic craft, there is also lack of necessary literature and reading material to guide them. The Committee appointed by the Sangh to help training schools has revised and systematised the syllabi of basic crafts for teachers and pupils and is preparing the necessary technical literature in spinning for teachers. Lack of literature for teachers and pupils is one of the criticisms of the scheme, but, as the report says, this is not altogether an unmixed evil. "Teachers and children have so long been used to the dominance of the printed word that the absence of books will stimulate initiative in both. Besides the feeling that the children and teachers are co-operating in the creation of their literature will bring a new pride and interest to their study." Really speaking, given efficient teachers, the need for text-books for children, especially in the early stages, should not arise.

Effect on Teachers

While the beneficial effect of the new scheme on children is definitely encouraging and in marked contrast to the dullness and apathy existing in most village schools, the Talimi Sangh has rightly recognised the importance of the effect on any scheme of education on the teachers. Kashmir notes that it is "having a healthy reaction on their professional outlook. They are more active, thoughtful, social, and conscious of their responsibilities." The Vijay Vidya Mandir says, "They work with love all day long, their knowledge has improved, their insight in child psychology has developed, their outlook on life has changed, and they have understood the importance of manual labour." This is surely a tremendous asset in comparison with the mentality of the average village school teacher.

Then there is the influence which the schools have exercised on the village community. The report claims that where the schools have done good work, and this is especially the case in Bihar, the atmosphere of apathy, suspicion and even hostility in which the schools started has given place to one of sympathy and co-operation. In Brindaban, for example, where an exhibition of the handwork of the children was held, many villagers came walking from long distances. To a large extent this interest and co-operation are the result of the community service undertaken by the schools.

Economic Possibilities

The report gives a few facts regarding the economic possibilities of the scheme.

The U. P. rejected the idea of self-supporting schools but have stressed the importance of self-sufficiency, i. e. that the material required may be supplied by the school itself. They suggest that the articles made by the children should be given away to them. Children are taken away from school for purposes of field labour. If they brought back cloth, for example, to their homes, the farmers might be induced not to remove them from school.

According to the first syllabus of spinning prepared by the Zakir Husain Committee it was reckoned that in a year of 288 working days with 3 hours and 20 minutes devoted to craft work a child could produce Rs. 2-10-0 worth in grade I and Rs. 7 worth in grade II. The standard has been attained only in a few cases for the reason that efficient instruction, the proper amount of time, right equipment and raw material have not always been available.

Calculations of earnings in Bihar are interesting. 78% of the pupils in Grade II and 71% in Grade I earned above 50% of the required standard. The actual maximum individual earning for the year was Rs. 5-4-3 in Grade II and Rs. 1-14-0 in Grade I. Against these the minimum was Re. 0-4-4 in Grade II, Re. 0-1-3 in Grade I. As a result of the year's working a sum of Rs. 2,112-3-0 was placed in the treasury as being the price of the yarn spun by the children and the cloth woven out of it as also their garden produce. There was in hand also stock worth Rs. 268-3-8. After deducting the cost of raw material and production, Rs. 1,124-9-9 represents the actual value realised. Later the individual earning of a child touched Rs. 7-3-4. But irregular attendance, less time allotted to the craft, and the fact that good cotton was not available have definitely brought down the average earning per head.

Conclusion

The importance of free and compulsory primary education, that the medium of instruction throughout should be the mother-tongue, that the child's capabilities should be developed through some form of manual and productive work, have been recognised as sound principles by all educationists and Government authorities. The history of the first three years of basic education, as set forth in the report of the Talimi Sangh, gives ample cause for believing that the scheme is sound. Difficulties have not been minimised. The appeal of the Sangh for better public understanding and for more workers is one which should go home to all who realise the importance in our national life of the right education of our children. Is it too much to expect those Governments who have not yet adopted it to give the scheme a fair trial in howsoever small an area? Above all the Sangh itself has got to show results after 7 years in its own schools. It is their success in the end which must constitute a challenge to the Provincial and Central Governments and the general public and compel its universalisation.

KHADI FORGES AHEAD

I

The report of the All India Spinners' Association for the year 1940, which but for the temporary suspension of Harijan would have been reviewed ere this in these columns, is a businesslike statement of facts and figures of the work done by the Association through its own branches as well as certified private agencies. As the report was written in June 1941, in some respects it covers the first half of that year also. 95,51,438 sq. yds. of khadi (cotton, wool and silk), weighing 30,82,693 lb. and worth Rs. 51,36,983, was produced during the year. Though there was a slight fall in the yardage in comparison to the previous year (from 111 lakhs to 95), the value rose from Rs. 50 lakhs to Rs. 51 lakhs, which suggests that more money was paid either to cotton producers for the cotton purchased, or to artisans in the form of increased wages, or to both. The artisans did actually get more money in 1940 than in 1939. (The spinners and weavers got in 1940 the aggregate amount of Rs. 29,81,798 as against Rs. 28,47,560 in 1939.) The sales rose from Rs. 65 lakhs to Rs. 77 lakhs (a rise of 19%), which was a welcome sign of the increasing support khadi received from the people. 74 per cent of the total quantity were sold in the provinces of production. This is a healthy development, the value of which will be realised more and more as difficulties of transport increase and export becomes difficult, if not impossible. It is indeed a cardinal principle in the economics of khadi and village industries that their products should find a market primarily in the areas where they are produced, thus eliminating to a large extent the wastage in the distribution of goods. C. P. and Maharashtra, Gujarat and Sind have made the greatest progress in this respect, their provincial sales exceeding 90 per cent. The number of sale depots under the A. I. S. A. was 284. So far as the total net sales were concerned, Gujarat, Punjab, Bombay, Bihar and U. P. showed an increase of over a lakh of rupees each over the sales of 1939, while Tamil Nad showed a fall (for which there must be some special reasons) of over Rs. one lakh. The National Week and the Gandhi Jayanti were utilised as usual for pushing the sales, and over Rs. 10 lakhs worth of khadi was sold during the two Weeks—the pride of place belonging to Gujarat which, in spite of its comparatively small size, effected total sales during these two Weeks amounting to over Rs. 233 thousand. Taking 1928-29 as the basic year (for, after about four years of existence, in that year the A. I. S. A. can reasonably be considered to have put its full resources to use), the comparative figures of production and sales are as follows, and indicate the progress achieved by khadi in a short span of years, mostly by popular support and encouragement, with little, if any, aid from the Government:

	1928-29	1940
	(lakhs)
Production (Rs.)	31	51
Sales (Rs.)	39	77

In 1940 the investment of the Sangh amounted to Rs. 43 lakhs. With the steady expansion in production the working capital presented a constant problem and exercised the organisers of the Sangh considerably. For years the capital was supplemented by raising loans, which again presented several difficulties, and in 1940, after full consideration, the Sangh resolved to pay off the Bank loans, to stop the policy of taking any more loans, and to raise the capital by donations made by the wealthy for liquidating unemployment. A few lakhs have already been secured in this manner, and an appeal has been made for more. If we take into consideration the huge amounts that States in the West spend by way of bounties to the new industries which they wish to foster (of which the beetroot subsidy in England is a conspicuous example),* or by way of artificially maintaining a high level of prices for their farmers' products (as in England and Hitlerite Germany), and in paying the latter in order to restrict or even destroy their products (as in U. S. A. and Brazil), the amount of 20 lakhs asked for by the A. I. S. A. looks insignificant, and it devolves on lovers of indigenous small scale industries to supply the necessary capital, especially because the State has been—unlike the States in the West, which give all possible aid to their handicrafts—wholly apathetic.

The following abstract of figures, culled from the tables given in the report, will speak for itself:

The report also describes briefly each of the special features of its work. 'Self-sufficiency in cloth' has been an important item in the programme before the Sangh for the last several years. The phrase was recently defined by the A. I. S. A. Council to include "those who fully and habitually wear khadi and regularly spin per month at least 7½ hanks (one hank=840 yds.) of yarn." The report mentions a good increase in spinning for this kind of self-sufficiency. Charkha clubs have been started in many places, and the Provincial Branches of the A. I. S. A. have facilitated the progress by arranging to get the spinners' yarn woven in the respective provinces.

Shankarlal Pattarai & Jamnalal Vidyalaya

Two important and appropriate memorials were opened by Rajaji at Tirupur on the 15th inst. One is a workshop (Pattarai is Tamil for workshop) for the manufacture of all tools and parts required for the khadi movement. This was most appropriately named after Shri Shankarlal Banker whose name is a household word in South India for his services in the cause of khaddar. Shri S. Ramathan, the present A. I. S. A. Secretary for Tamil Nad, has spared no pains to make the Shankarlal Pattarai as efficient as possible. Shri V. I. Muniswami Pillai is now a whole-time worker in charge of the dye-works and the Shankarlal Workshop. Two Ex-Ministers of the Madras Government are thus absorbed in the khadi work in the South and continue to serve Rajaji in that way! The Harijan community may well be proud of their representative, Shri Muniswami Pillai, who has become charkha-mad.

Jamnalal Vidyalaya is the Khadi Training Institute attached to the Tamil Nad A. I. S. A. branch. Extensive grounds have been acquired for erecting the necessary buildings, and when completed it will be a fitting memorial for the memory of the great man who was President of the A. I. S. A. for so many years from its inception and whose passing away has left us all so disconsolate.

ON ITS TRIAL

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"I am a pacifist still in one sense; that is to say, I realise that Christians should be able to meet material force with spiritual power. It is horrifying to reflect that after nineteen hundred years, we are still unable to do it except in individual cases and on a small scale. But to me it seems merely 'wishful thinking' to act as though we had a power which in fact we have not and for which we have neither trained nor disciplined ourselves in the past. Such power does not come to those who have not disciplined themselves, at the last moment, in the hour of need. It has not come to us. I would rather, therefore, do what I can in defence of principles which I believe to be both right in themselves and of enormous importance to the future of the human race, than stand aside and do nothing. It is doing nothing that is the worst expedient of all.

When, therefore, my pacifist friends ask me whether I can imagine Jesus Christ dropping a bomb or firing a gun I am entitled to reply: 'No, I cannot; but neither can I imagine him standing aside and doing nothing at all.'

I am compelled to echo the words of a very dear relative of mine who, loathing war as much as any pacifist that ever breathed, said to me at the beginning of the last war (in which he lost his life): 'If you can stop war with spiritual power, do it. If you can't, let me do what I can; and if you are right in thinking that war is so damnable that anyone who takes part in it is damned, then I would rather be damned than let these things go on without doing all I can to stop them, even at the cost of my own life.'

Is this not very close to the meaning of our Lord when he said: 'He that loseth his life shall save it'?"

The foregoing is the concluding portion of a touchingly sorrowful article contributed to The Survey Graphic of December 1941 by the celebrated Dr. Maude Royden of the Guildhouse, London. She is one of the foremost pacifists of the West. Like many she has felt compelled to revise her position and is now most reluctantly but fully ranged on the side of the defenders of the British Isles.

The article demands a considered reply. I have been in constant touch with the Western pacifists. In my opinion Dr. Royden has surrendered her position in the portion I have quoted. If individuals have lived up to the Christian teaching (i.e. on non-violence) and that on a small scale, one would think practice should make such a life possible for many people and on a large scale. It is undoubtedly wrong and foolish "to act as though one had the power which in fact one has not." "But," says the worthy writer, "such power does not come to those who have not disciplined themselves, at the last moment, in the hour of need."

I suggest that with the knowledge of the defect no time should be lost in seeking to remove it. That by itself is doing not only something but the right thing. To deny one's faith by contrary practice is surely the worst thing one can do.

And I am not sure that "doing nothing is the worst expedient of all." In septic treatment, for instance, doing nothing is not only expedient, it is obligatory.

There is no cause whatsoever for despondency, much less for denial of one's faith at the crucial moment. Why should not British pacifists stand aside and remodel their life in its entirety? They might be unable to bring about peace outright, but they would lay a solid foundation for it and give the surest test of their faith. When, in the face of an upheaval such as we are witnessing, there are only a few individuals of immovable faith, they have to live up to their faith even though they may produce no visible effect on the course of events. They should believe that their action will produce tangible results in due course. Their staunchness is bound to attract sceptics. I would also suggest that individuals like Dr. Maude Royden are not mere camp followers. They are leaders. Therefore, they have to live their lives in strict accord with the Sermon on the Mount, and they will find immediately that there is much to give up and much to remodel. The greatest thing that they have to deny themselves is the fruit of imperialism. The present complicated life of the Londoner and his high living is possible only because of the hoards brought from Asia, Africa and other parts of the world. In spite of the fierce criticism which has been levelled against my letter 'To Every Briton', I adhere to every word of it, and I am convinced that posterity will adopt the remedy suggested therein against violence however organised and fierce. And now that the enemy is at the gates of India I am advising my countrymen the same course of action I advised the British people. My advice may or may not be accepted by my countrymen. I would remain unmoved. Their non-acceptance will be no test of failure of non-violence. I would subscribe to the charge of my imperfection. But a satyagrahi does not wait for perfection before he invites others to experiment with him, provided always that his faith is immovable like a mountain. The advice that Dr. Royden's relative gave her and which she quotes approvingly is altogether wrong. If the war is damnable, how can he stop the things that go on by taking part in it, even though it may be on the defensive side and at the cost of his own life? For the defence has to resort to all the damnable things that the enemy does, and that with greater vigour if it has to succeed. Such a giving of life is not only not saving it but a mere waste.

I have attended the Doctor's services in her Church where a living belief in the efficacy of prayer is much in vogue. When the impenetrable gloom surrounded her, why did she not find strength and consolation and real action in heart-prayer? It is never too late to mend. She and her fellow-pacifists, many of whom I have the privilege of knowing, should take heart and, like Peter, repent of the momentary loss of faith and return to the old faith in non-violence with renewed vigour. Their return will mean no material loss to the war effort but will mean a great deal to the anti-war effort which is bound to succeed sooner rather than later, if man is to live as man and not become a two-footed brute.

THE SIXTH YEAR OF WORK

I

To all who believe that in the resuscitation of village economy lies the salvation of India the latest report of the All India Village Industries Association will be of interest.

Like all national activity the work suffered in certain parts owing to some members of local committees and agents being arrested and owing to Government in some cases not wishing to help new schemes or expand old ones. But in spite of handicaps the report shows good all-round progress.

Sanitation and Diet: Wherever there are good workers sanitary conditions may be said to have definitely improved, but the lack of education of both village adults and children in this matter is a serious handicap to permanent improvement. Until the intelligent support of the villager is forthcoming sanitary habits will fail to take root in village soil. The same applies to diet reform, and in this matter apart from conservative habits the poor villager can only eat what his few pice will bring him.

Rice-pounding and Flour-grinding: There is an increased demand for hand-pounded rice which furnishes an opportunity for organising its supply. The Governments of Bombay, Madras, U. P. and Assam have commended its use in their hospitals. Guntur District tops the list of the Association centres as far as sales are concerned. They sold over Rs. 30,000 worth of hand-pounded rice and distributed over Rs. 2,200 in the form of wages to 8,116 persons at Re. 0-4-4½ per head. In the Vizianagram centre the sales and wages have more than doubled since 1938. Flour ground by hand chakkis has received an incentive from the certified shops which sell it. Patterns of the improved paddy-husking and flour-grinding chakkis and dhenkis have been supplied to various parts of the country.

Oil-pressing: Both Governments and individuals have begun to take an interest in this industry. 40 ghanis have been reconstructed according to the improved pattern by a Maganwadi-trained man in Baroda. The Bombay Government sent students to Maganwadi for training. The C. P. Government has encouraged the setting up of ghanis. Orissa has trained 12 students in the industry. The Madhusudan Village Industries Institute, Cuttack, runs four ghani propaganda centres in villages where it stocks seeds and supplies them to oilmen who are paid 5 annas per charge. Since they press 4 charges daily they each earn Rs. 1¼ per diem. The U. P. Government have been training carpenters in ghani construction and oil-pressing and have supplied Maganwadi ghanis to village oilmen. In Bengal the A. I. V. I. A. have marketed the village oilmen's products. Rs. 10,225 worth of oil and cake were sold during the year in Sylhet, Chittagong, Betur, and Diamond Harbour. A few ghanis are working systematically in Bihar, Khandesh, Gujarat, Punjab, C. P., Mysore and Assam, and constant enquiries come in regarding the improved ghani. "It seems to us," say the writers of the report, "that, if only oil seeds are prevented from leaving the village, are stocked locally and made available for the oilman, there will be no difficulty in reviving the industry. As oilmen do not themselves have capital to store seeds, consumers should do so, take the seeds to be pressed, and thus obtain pure, unadulterated oil for their use and cake for their cattle. This is the good custom that prevailed in the past, and some people in our neighbourhood have been induced by us to bring seeds for pressing. We pressed 104 charges at the rate of 6 annas a charge. We hold that ghanis need not fear competition from mills on the score of the greater efficiency or cheapness of production of the mill. . . . It is quite possible for a village oilman using the Maganwadi ghani and, assured of a supply of oil seeds at harvest rates, to sell his oil at mill rates. When he does so he can be sure of ousting mill oil from his village."

Gud-making: This has been going on under A. I. V. I. A. supervision on a commercial basis chiefly in Bengal and Orissa. In Murshidabad District a newly started palmyra gud manufacture centre with its four sub-centres produced 81½ maunds and sold it for Rs. 614-4-0. 17 labourers were employed at an expenditure of Rs. 397-9-0. All the trees available in the locality for tapping were leased so that none was left for tapping for toddy manufacture. The tappers were, however, employed in supplying unfermented juice, and much gud was thus manufactured in a short time. In Hooghly District one man was able to earn Rs. 40 in 3 months through date-palm gud manufacture. In Orissa the average earning was Re. 0-6-9 a day. It has been estimated that Rs. 12 per annum can be earned from each tree.

The Association has been experimenting with new furnaces for boiling. One which consumes 75 seers of fuel for boiling 100 seers of juice in 2 hours is very simple and costs only a rupee to make. Their newly devised sugar hand centrifugal machine has been much in demand and has gone as far afield as Ceylon. It costs Rs. 56. Still further improvements in it are being made.

Bee-keeping: This industry requires little capital, running expenditure and time and makes a valuable addition to food. The apprentice bee-keeper learns the industry in a practical way in his own home under A. I. V. I. A. guidance in a year. Every centre of village uplift should also be a centre for bee-keeping. In Orissa one student produced 180 lb. of honey worth Rs. 112 during the year. At Maganwadi they have been able to reduce swarming from 40 % to 5 % partly through better bee-pasturage. 18 colonies yielded about 100 lb. of honey. Iron grooved wheels for the honey extractor have been substituted by the ordinary wooden wheels of the charkha and answer the purpose equally well. The cost of the iron wheels, now very difficult to get, was Rs. 10 whereas the wooden ones sell for Rs. 6/8.

WHEN MACHINE POWER

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

The Board of Management of the A. I. V. I. A. at its last meeting decided to allow shops certified by the Association to sell hand-lifted paper from pulp produced by power, provided such pulp was obtained from a recognised producer under the control of the Association. This being the first occasion on which a partly machine-processed article comes within the field of the Association, some friends are at a loss to understand the grounds on which the Board took this step.

It is, therefore, proposed to explain the general principles under which we may resort to machine power, taking this particular instance as an example and comparing it with the case of mill-spun yarn in hand-woven cloth, which has been cited as an instance where the A. I. S. A. had set its face against the use of machines.

Machine power can only be used as a physician uses doses of poison, with extreme care and in rare cases. Under such a restricted regime machines have a great part to play in economic production. We have been brought to our present sorry plight because of the indiscriminate use of machinery in the interest of capital in disregard of the welfare of the millions, but that does not mean that machines are taboo under all conditions. The purpose of an industry is to supply a demand and while doing so distribute wealth to those engaged in production. Therefore, to decide on the conditions under which any particular industry may work, we have to study various factors such as demand, supply, raw materials, production and distribution.

To begin with we have to grasp the distinction between spinning as a handicraft and paper-making. When Gandhiji likens the position of spinning to that of the sun in the solar system, he is thinking chiefly of the close contact of the demand with the supply, and hence the universality of the handicraft. Every spinner is to spin for himself or herself primarily. This is not so with most other crafts. A potter makes pots for his livelihood; so does the teli, the oil-presser. Hence certain rules that govern a cottage handicraft based on self-sufficiency of the producer cannot be applied in toto to other industries which cater to a demand apart from the producer. When I spin for myself I have only to satisfy myself. But a paper-maker has to deal with a fluid demand. The user of the paper calls for a certain standard in quality. If you do not meet it, he will go elsewhere. Hence the paper-maker is circumstanced by conditions outside his control, and he has to adjust himself to the demand.

Where the demand is fluid the supply has to follow carefully the specifications laid down by the demand. Hence the producer has to adopt processes, etc. which will satisfy the quality expected and bring into existence the quantity needed. Today there is a great shortage of paper. Paper and paper pulp used to be imported. India is more or less thrown on her own resources now. Making paper from waste paper is only rehashing and is not real paper-making, for which we ought to resort to original materials like grass, straw, rags, jute, sunn hemp, bamboo, etc. The first two are easily reduced to pulp, but the others are hard to deal with, and when reduced to pulp by hand yield paper of very inferior quality. We cannot confine ourselves to grass and straw, which have important alternative uses as fodder, while the other raw materials can be obtained from village waste and are therefore more advisable.

Spinning is a pleasant occupation and needs little or no equipment. Apart from speed, machine-spinning has hardly any technical advantage not open to hand-spinning. In fact the highest and finest counts of yarn can only be spun by hand. To mechanise spinning would be to deprive millions, especially women and children, of a pleasurable spare time industry, though it may, to a limited extent, be appreciated by the hand-loom weavers. Pulp-making, on the other hand, has not been a separate industry but only one of the many processes involved in paper-making. Allowing the use of power here will not destroy any existing industry, while it will definitely stimulate a dying industry.

Pulp production, on the other hand, is the heaviest, most dangerous and tedious part of paper-making, and presents a knotty problem. Besides, the investment on a man-worked dhenki for making pulp is not so much less than that of a unit required for production of pulp by power as to make the latter prohibitive, as is the case between a takli or a charkha and a spinning mill unit. We have been experimenting with various methods which can be made available. Over five years' work on this question reveals that good pulp needs power to produce it in sufficient quantities. We have to make sure that we do not subject the paper-maker to exploitation. If we can guarantee that and give him good pulp on a service basis, we can afford thousands of persons a good occupation. If we fail to do that, exploiters will capture the market. Therefore the Board felt called upon to arrange for control by restricting it to recognised producers.

Hence in extremely rare cases where the life and expansion of an industry calls for aid from machines in one or the other process which cannot be performed by hand, where the fullest advantage of the raw material available can be taken over by the use of machinery, where processes involved are so heavy that it would be cruel to use manpower, where the capital and equipment needed for the due carrying out of the process is beyond the means available to the artisans, where it is possible to render the needed help by resorting to the use of machinery under safeguards to make sure that no exploitation is possible and the aid is given on service basis, there can be no objection to machine power being used.

DESIRABILITY OF EXODUS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A correspondent asks for my detailed views on the exodus that I have advised from the cities of all who are not wanted there and all who are unfit or unwilling to stay there. No one is obliged to stay in against his will. In the event of bombardment, it is clear that non-combatants can only be a burden in every way. Successful defence against a powerful enemy requires exclusive concentration on holding the enemy at bay. The defenders' attention must not be divided. This is from the military point of view.

But we have war resisters too, either humanitarian or political. They may not stay unless their object is merely to cause embarrassment for the sake of it. I hope there are none such. They should, therefore, be out of the cities. Then there are those who do not know what to do in the event of bombardment. They should all evacuate. As the reader will see, my opinion has little to do with my war resistance. For in this case and up to a point military necessity and duty of war resisters demand the same action.

If I could convert any city or all cities wholly, including the combatants of yesterday, I should welcome the invading host and try to convert even them or challenge them to do their worst, without offering retaliation. But no such good luck awaits me. If the cities were converted, all India including the rulers would be converted and there would be peace in India and peace in the world. But that must remain a daydream yet awhile. Only I won't be moved from my position by being told that the Jap or the Nazi is not the same man as the Englishman. I draw no such fundamental distinction between man and man. But I must not detain the reader on the speculative side of the matter-of-fact question that faces us.

Assuming then that all who should or a part of them have evacuated the cities and have gone to the villages or are about to go, what should they do? They must go with the village mind to live the village life as much as possible. They may not reproduce city conditions and build temporary palaces. They should go to the villages in a spirit of service, study their economic and other conditions, and ameliorate them not by giving alms but by giving the villagers work of a permanent nature. In other words, they should work the constructive programme among the villagers. Thus they will identify themselves with the villagers and become a kind of co-operative society with an ordered programme of economic, social, hygienic and political reconstruction.

The greatest problem the new-comers will have to tackle will be to deal with loot and dacoities. It will tax their resources to the utmost. The non-violent way is there. If that is not clear to them, with the co-operation of the villagers they should organise themselves for armed defence against robbers and dacoits. We have too long looked to the Government to do this elementary work for us, not excluding even the reclamation of castes called criminal tribes. The Government cannot do much, if anything at all, at this critical time. The work has perforce to be done by the evacuees violently, non-violently, or both ways.

Sad Contrast

Readers of Harijan will quite recently have seen the encouraging remarks of a high Government official in Bihar re: basic education. And the following news from Kashmir under the guidance of Prof. Saiyyidain, who is in charge of education there, is heartening: "The Kashmir Government have sanctioned a new programme of educational expansion for the next year. The programme includes the opening of sixty new primary schools, conversion of thirty existing primary schools into basic schools, construction of a number of basic school buildings, and appointment of more teachers for basic schools."

In sad contrast, however, to the above is the following, if true. One can only hope it is a canard. "The closing down of the Basic Normal Schools at Wardha and Seoni is, it is understood, being seriously contemplated by the Government of the C. P."

PLEA FOR MORE FRUITS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Dr. Menkel, who is also a dietetist, comments as follows in The Oriental Watchman on my note on 'Real War Effort' in Harijan of January 25th:

"First is the statement that food taken in excess of actual requirement for repair and energy is as much food actually wasted. Excess food is not only wasted food, but this excess also places a tax on the organs of digestion, detoxication and elimination, producing premature exhaustion with such developments as diabetes, nephritis and auto-intoxication. Another economy recommendation is that half the quantity of grain as wheat or rice will meet the food purposes when not taken in sloppy form. Cooked or baked grains when taken as near dry as possible must then be masticated and moistened with saliva to be swallowed. This results in better digestion and therefore less food providing the needed energy. Mr. Gandhi suggests that an ounce or two of raw salad vegetables is worth eight ounces of cooked vegetables. This applies particularly to their vitamin and mineral values. There is also something vital in raw fruit and vegetable which is destroyed by cooking. For this reason it is desirable that some uncooked raw fruit and vegetables be taken daily. India needs to make more extensive use of such raw uncooked foods. The elimination of sweet dishes as advocated would greatly relieve the stress upon the pancreas and liver imposed by the average Indian diet, and thus reduce the incidence of diabetes. It is in regard to Mr. Gandhi's statement about fruit that we do not find ourselves quite in agreement. He writes: 'Fresh fruit is good to eat, but only a little is necessary to give tone to the system.' While we can hobble along on low power with little fruit in the diet, it is the contrary that is required. Because so little fruit is available and consumed by the population, that there is so much vitamin and mineral deficiency in India. Writing about fruits and berries in his book Food, Sir Robert McCarrison states: 'They are among the best of all foodstuffs and should form a considerable part of our daily diet. They contain much mineral salts of the alkaline kind which keep the blood pure and prevent it becoming acid and sour. Fruits are most useful in keeping the bowels healthy and active.' (p. 88) Man's physical structure indicates that he is intended to be a frugivorous creature. His natural food, the food on which he can be at his best, is fruit, nuts, milk and the more succulent vegetables. Cereals would be better introduced as additional rather than as basic to the diet because of their strongly acid-ash-forming tendency. On the other hand, as stated by Sir Robert McCarrison, the fruits and vegetables are rich in the alkali minerals. The importance of this difference will be recognised when it is recalled that most of our ailments and all our pains, except those due to accident, are of acid origin. Obviously there would be less pain, and more enjoyment of life, if we kept more definitely on the alkaline side. This necessitates more fruit and vegetables, with proportionately less of the acid-tending cereals. The normal proportion is four parts of the alkaline—fruit and vegetables—to one of acid, which includes all the other foods. This would be the diet of health economy, and should be made economically within the reach of all, in a well-organised world. Under existing emergency Mr. Gandhi has advocated a very rational and possible food economy. His suggestions merit careful study and application."

While I appreciate Dr. Menkel's endorsement of my remarks, I like better his correction of my apparent lukewarmness about fruit. No one perhaps, as far as I know, has eaten as much fruit as I have, having lived for six years on entirely fruits and nuts and always having had a liberal supply of fruit as part of my ordinary diet. But I had in my mind, when writing, the special conditions of India. Its people should have, by reason of its extent and variety of climate, a most liberal supply of fruits, vegetables and milk. Yet it is the poorest country in this respect. I therefore suggested what seemed to me to be feasible. But I heartily endorse the proposition that for retaining health fresh fruit and fresh vegetables should form the main part of our diet. It is for the medical profession to study the peculiar condition of India and suggest the list of vegetables and fruit which are or can be easily and cheaply grown in the villages for local consumption. Wild berries, for instance, grow abundantly. They may not be taken to the market for sale but can be used for the picking. This is a vast field for research. It can bring neither money nor perhaps fame. But it may earn the gratitude of dumb millions.

Spinning by Sweepers

Spinning was introduced among the sweepers of Navsari, the second biggest town in the Baroda State, about 16 months ago, and now 50 box charkhas and one carding machine are at work among them. I examined the records kept of the quantity of work done and of the earnings made therefrom. The sweepers took to it rather cautiously and hesitatingly. But slowly they began to like it and have stuck to it. 50 charkhas among less than 60 families is not a mean achievement. Of course they work only during their leisure hours after doing their day's work of municipal sweeping and scavenging. They now earn by spinning Re. 1 to Rs. 2 per charkha and add to their low incomes of Rs. 8 to Rs. 13 per month.

By the by, it will not be out of place, if I mention that the Baroda administration has seriously neglected to provide housing for these sweepers, though the matter has been on the anvil for more than the last ten years. The land was acquired for them by the Municipality three years ago, but rich and influential residents are using all their influence and trying by all possible means not to have them settled in good houses in this particular locality. At present the sweepers' huts, made of rusted kerosine tin sheets, walls, roof and all, are in close touch with a block of public latrines, and are very unsightly and uncomfortable to live in. The citizens of Navsari want to have their street-refuse and night-soil removed by these people, but want them to live miles away on starvation wages. Such callousness seems possible only in our caste-ridden country.

BASIC CURRENCY

(By Bharatanand)

[Bharatanandji's active brain, having approved of my note on hand-spun yarn as a measure of value, has produced the following note. Let knowing workers study it and see if they can improve upon the scheme propounded by the author.]

Sevagram, 4-2-42

M. K. G.]

Gandhiji's idea that a warp length of hand-spun yarn should be made a basic unit of Indian currency is one more stroke of his genius, which is bound to have a great influence on the economic future of this country as his ideas soak into the life of the people. For in the idea of yarn as a standard of value lies the seed of a basic currency for India, admirably suited to her needs.

The fact that the idea by itself is of hoary antiquity and was practised at the dawn of human civilisation in no way reduces its merits. The ancient Slavonian tribes, inhabiting Europe from the Elbe to the Volga before and during the time of the Roman Empire, used cloth as the standard currency. Even now the words 'pay' and 'cloth' are almost the same in Slavonic languages.

In Polish 'plata' means pay and 'plate' means a sheet. In Russian 'platit' means to pay and 'palatno' means cloth. 'To pay' in all Slavonic languages is etymologically derived from 'give cloth' or 'exchange for cloth'.

It may be interesting and useful to work out a practical scheme on the lines of a basic currency linked up with khadi with a view to its immediate adoption by the A. I. S. A., the A. I. V. I. A., the Hindustani Talimi Sangh and the Congress, if possible, in all their internal dealings so as to pave the way for its becoming the official currency of free India.

The standard hank adopted by the A. I. S. A. is of 640 turns of 4 feet per turn.

We can base our khadi currency on such a hank with sub-divisions by 4.

Thus we shall have, as suggested by Shri Kishorlal Mashruwala:

1 anti = 640 turns = 4 lati
1 lati = 160 turns = 4 pati
1 pati = 40 turns = 4 tana
1 tana = 10 turns = 40 feet

A 'lati' may also be called 'vishi'.

The khadi centres may issue khadi currency for local circulation. The khadi currency is intrinsically a warehouse receipt, and its text will run more or less like this:

No.	Place	Date
-----	-------	------

For value received we shall give to the bearer one anti (lati, pati, tana) of certified standard hand-spun yarn on demand.

One anti consists of 640 turns of 4 feet each of hand-spun yarn of _____ to _____ counts and not less than _____ per cent strength.

1 anti = 4 lati = 640 turns

1 lati = 4 pati = 160 turns

1 pati = 4 tana = 40 turns

1 tana = 10 turns = 40 feet

The khadi currency may be exchangeable at all A. I. S. A. and A. I. V. I. A. centres for yarn, cloth, cotton, spinning and weaving implements, and various village products and foodstuffs at standard exchange rates as fixed from time to time by the A. I. S. A. and the A. I. V. I. A. The khadi currency may be freely exchanged for State currency at A. I. S. A. and A. I. V. I. A. branches at rates depending on the current spinners' wage per hank of yarn.

The khadi currency may be printed on small rectangles of khadi cloth or strong hand-made paper made dirt-and-water-proof by soaking in an appropriate solution. The exchange rates at the A. I. S. A. and A. I. V. I. A. shops will be naturally advantageous to holders of khadi currency. The khadi currency representing a standard product of universal necessity will not undergo the depreciation of a paper currency. The khadi currency when hoarded will tend to appreciate in terms of State currency even in normal times because of the policy of raising progressively the spinners' wage. All this will reduce the tendency to exchange khadi currency for State currency and ultimately abolish it altogether, thus creating for the A. I. S. A. a source of working capital naturally expanding with the production of yarn and cloth.

There is nothing to prevent the A. I. S. A. from introducing the khadi currency immediately. The expansion of the reconstruction programme in general and khadi work in particular will be considerably hastened and facilitated and, if some 5 or 10 year plan for khadi is adopted, the khadi currency is the best solution for financing it.

II

Another noteworthy feature has been the starting of training centres for khadi experts in several provinces and the institution of graded examinations for the trainees. The importance of this work cannot be exaggerated. We can never have too many khadi experts, for there has been a growing demand for them in recent years, and the expansion of production work has often been checked primarily for want of experts to take up the work or to train or guide other people. In countries of the West where handicrafts are fostered, training institutes have always been given their due importance, and in many cases itinerant instructors of crafts have been moving about from place to place, instructing people in the technique of production. Some such thing would be useful in our country also, provided we have a sufficient number of men with the requisite knowledge and zeal.

The amounts given to the A. I. S. A. by way of grants-in-aid by the Congress Governments while they were in office have dwindled where they have not been stopped altogether. The purchases of khadi by these Governments have also met with the same fate. The production work of the Sangh received a great spurt as the result of that encouragement, and must have suffered dislocation as a result of withdrawal or contraction of an aid which the Sangh was led to believe would continue much longer and planned its work on that basis. What a sad contrast this apathy presents to the policy (to cite but one instance) of the U. S. S. R., where "the various Government departments, central or municipal, together with the manufacturing trusts and the consumers' co-operative societies, have, during the past decade, willingly supplied their own needs by contracting to take from the manufacturing associations of owner-producers (incops), at agreed fixed prices, a large proportion of their output, thus ensuring for long periods a profitable market for their wares." (Sidney and Beatrice Webb)

Among the States, Mysore has been running a production centre at Badanwal for the last twelve years, and there are three other centres run by Local Boards, the total production in 1940 amounting to Rs. 92 thousand. A few other States have given a little aid here and there, but it is little more than a drop in the ocean.

The Sangh has been serving all communities alike, as the following figures will show. The 2,76,146 artisans engaged by the Sangh belong to the various communities as follows:

Harijans	19,645
Other Hindus	1,70,273
Muslims	57,378
Those regarding whom information has not been obtained	28,850

The year under report has also witnessed a number of improvements in the wheels and other implements, the outstanding being the invention of the dhanush takli by Shri Bharatanand. The intensive programme of training an increasing number of spinners and others in the improved processes is sure to result, in fact has already resulted to some extent, in an improvement in quality and acceleration in the rate of output.

This training work is closely connected with the progressive increase in the spinners' wages, with the ultimate aim of reaching the rate of 8 as. per day, which has been perhaps the most important experiment launched by the Sangh in recent years at the instance of Gandhiji. After an experience of about four years the Sangh had to fix the limit, for the time being, at 3 as. per day, with the freedom to any Provincial Branch to exceed the limit. The reason for the decision lay in the fact, as explained by Gandhiji, that "the middle class khadi buyer simply has not the money to buy khadi at the increased price necessitated by the rise in wages beyond the point of three annas." Even this was a good rise in conditions of sub-human poverty obtaining in the country, and was particularly remarkable because of the fact that it was wholly unasked. And it is in this respect that the economics of khadi differ radically from the orthodox economics which allow to labour much less than what would be their due under a just and equitable system of distribution.

Intimately bound up with the question of wages is that of uncertified dealers, to which reference has been made time and again in these columns. These persons have turned a deaf ear to all appeals made to them. The more deplorable fact, however, is that many Congressmen, who should have known better, have not hesitated to support them in their unpatriotic conduct. "We cannot hope," says the report with a sigh, "to prevail upon the traders to give up this business. But those who want to wear khadi should think twice before they buy the uncertified stuff. When they are already out to spend in the name of khadi much more than they would otherwise have to spend for mill cloth, why should they not resist the temptation of buying the spurious khadi which saves them only an anna or an anna and a half per rupee but leads them to act against the fundamental principle of khadi? There is no greater obstacle in the way of universalising the principle of a living wage than the selfishness of the sellers and buyers of uncertified khadi." Will they even now listen?

If cheapness is allowed to be the sole guiding factor, it cuts at the root of all movement for encouraging Swadeshi goods in preference to foreign ones. The maxim of 'buy cheapest' was propounded by the economists of a country which needed markets abroad for its machine-made products. The country of its origin never seriously applied it to its own affairs except in so far as it suited its interest or convenience, and has long since given it the go-by even as a theory. Indeed it is an exploded myth in the age of high tariff walls, quotas, preferences, restrictions of output, State-controlled prices, and destruction of crops in order to maintain a high price level.* In no free country of the world is cheapness allowed to override other considerations. What is even Autarky (which not only Germany but England and the U. S. A. adopted in their own manner) but another name for Swadeshi—an effort at achieving a maximum of self-sufficiency irrespective of high prices and other inconveniences? Well did Gandhiji describe 'buy cheapest' as "one of the most inhuman among the maxims laid down by modern economists". And where individuals, as apart from States, short-sightedly and oblivious of their duty to the poorer among their countrymen, follow it in their daily practice, the results to the nation as a whole prove disastrous, as we have seen to our cost in the history of our country. It therefore behoves Congressmen the least—in view of their pledges—to put forth the plea of cheapness, and one may hope that such of them as have encouraged uncertified khadi so far will see their error and will help whole-heartedly in the effort to do the poor spinning sisters—the lowest paid among the artisans—a tardy justice in the form of an increased wage for their work.

* This may be true, a critic may remark, of countries under a capitalist economy, but what of Russia where there is no capitalism interested in artificially maintaining high prices? Now please read this: "On the whole, in the Soviet economy selling prices are based on costs of production, and are coming to be so to an increasing extent. But the costs on which prices are based are controlled costs, dependent on the levels of remuneration fixed for workers of different kinds, on the charges made for the use of capital and credit, and on the taxes levied on the various enterprises. Of these controlled costs, the cost of labour is obviously by far the most important."—G. D. H. Cole: Practical Economics, p. 80. Thus in Russia the wage rates are fixed by the State, the selling prices are in effect State-controlled, as also is all foreign trade, and the so-called law of demand and supply is not allowed to operate freely. In fact planned economy is itself a negation of free trade. What is the A. I. S. A. doing (only it has no State authority) except to fix the prices on the basis of "costs of production", considering "the cost of labour" (i. e. wages paid to artisans) as "obviously by far the most important", and, in addition, eliminating or minimising other items like interest, administration and advertisement, so as to ensure to the producers the largest share of the prices paid by the consumers, and thus bringing about a more equitable distribution?

Constructive Work in Sind

From a letter of Prof. N. R. Malkani to Gandhiji, the following account of constructive work in Sind will be found interesting:

Khadi—There are 7 bhandars and 3 production centres out of which one is for woollen goods. Sales of khadi have increased from Rs. 75,000 in 1938 to Rs. 3 lakhs in 1941. It is becoming increasingly difficult to get khadi from outside to replenish diminishing stocks. Efforts are being made to increase local production. Two new centres are being opened in Thar. More could be opened, but the question of capital is a serious one.

Village Industries—Shri Pratap Sheth has given a pukka building for the paper industry, and Swami Bhagwandas Udasi of Hyderabad has donated Rs. 2,000 for running the same. The latter has also given Rs. 500 for medical relief in the city.

Hindustani—Six persons have been detailed for organising the work. Voluntary classes have been introduced in several schools, but there is a dearth of well-qualified teachers as also a lack of enthusiasm on the part of school authority which prevent large numbers of boys from sitting for the periodical examinations. Muslim boys often attend Hindu private schools and are willing to read the same books in the Urdu script. It is only fair that these should be available to them, but such publications do not seem to exist, which is a definite lack. A Hindi-Sindhi dictionary in Devanagari script is under course of preparation.

As elsewhere Shri Malkani has found it difficult to secure village workers of the proper calibre. He feels that, while khadi and Hindi workers can be prepared, Harijan and village servants have to have a special urge within them. He has 13 whole-time workers, one of whom has selected a village and put fresh life in the entire taluka. Rs. 8,000 were spent by the Sind Village Workers' Association in 1941. Six friends have promised to maintain a worker each in six villages this year. The administration have promised Rs. 10,000 for improving village drinking water supply and sanitation, provided Rs. 2,500 can be raised by the organisation. Government is promoting famine relief on suitable lines.

JAMNALALJI AND WOMEN

The other evening the girls and staff of the Mahila Ashram, Wardha, walked over to join in our evening worship and to present to Gandhiji the sacrificial yarn they had spun in memory of their patron and benefactor. In speaking to them Gandhiji tried to bring home to them the lessons they should learn from Jamnalalji's life:

"Members of the Mahila Ashram, in particular, owed a deep debt of gratitude to him. How were they going to repay it? There must be no idle tears. The best memorial to him was service. The soul does not die. It is the body alone that perishes. But not everyone lives for ever in the hearts of men as Jamnalalji will. The Mahila Ashram students and staff must pull their full weight in making Wardha an ideal town. Clean it, remove illiteracy, spread the gospel of khadi, remove untouchability, and serve the women. Then all of you can become members of the Goseva Sangh and help in enlisting members too. The pledge is not a rigid one, and, if you love the cow, you will willingly sign it. Last but not least there is Urdu. Each one of you should begin to study the Urdu script. Only those who know both Hindi and Urdu will be able in due course to create that beautiful mixture, the Hindustani of my dream, which shall be the national language.

"Jamnalalji created the Mahila Mandal in order to create women workers. The least each one of you can do is to imbibe his spirit of service and take it as your armour when you go into the wider sea of life. Most of you will marry. It is the natural thing to do, and I used to chaff Jamnalalji and call him a registrar of marriages because he was always arranging marriages. He was no less anxious than I that many of our girls should elect to remain unmarried for the sake of serving their less fortunate sisters, but such women are rare. In any case I shall expect service from you, and when married you will be two persons and will have to give fourfold. In many ways a married life—if well and truly lived, not for the sake of satisfying carnal desires—is harder than celibacy.

"Jamnalalji was a rare man. He was born to serve and serve universally. Nothing that he did was done half-heartedly. His diligence was amazing. He had even begun to tend the cow that gave him milk. Such was his thoroughness. He died in harness as he would have wished. Everyone cannot follow him in everything, but, at any rate, if you really loved and admired one who did so much for you, you should learn one lesson from his life. Work hard and give yourselves utterly to the fulfilment of those high ideals of womanhood which he set before you."

THE CHALLENGE OF TODAY AND FRIENDS

[ This is my address to the Quakers in India delivered in Hoshangabad at their Conference held on the 29th of December last. M. D. ]

If I consented to attend your annual meeting, it was more to express my gratefulness to you for having invited me to a gathering which in its very nature must be confined to "Friends", and to make your acquaintance, than to air my views before you. You have in your letter of invitation described me as one "not altogether unfamiliar with Quaker history and practice". You will pardon me if I make a larger claim. I have the privilege of counting among my friends some eminent Quakers, and I share with you in a full measure the Quaker's hostility to war, which, as a Quaker has said, "follows from the Divine Presence in man, from human brotherhood, from disbelief in force, from the whole spiritual doctrine of human life. War blows away and fouls the soul in reckless tempest." If it also follows from the Christian conception of God as revealed in Christ, with me it follows from the Hindu conception of the One-ness of all life. I honour the Quakers for standing out from other Christians and declaring that "war is always contrary to the spirit of Christ"; I admire them for their gentle tolerance, their humanitarianism, and their beautifully quiet form of prayer. In this last respect we at Sevagram have paid you the tribute of imitation in that our vocal prayer is begun with two minutes' silence. I am thus here in your midst exercising the privilege of a 'friend' with a small 'f', if not a capital 'f'. That does not mean that my gratefulness to you is any the less for having invited me, an outsider, to take part in the deliberations of what is almost like your historic "Yearly Meetings".

In thus making a new departure you have declared your witness to what I may call a progressive assimilation of truth. Neither Jesus nor his apostles ever sat down to write moral codes, and neither did Lord Krishna sit down to write a code. The spirit of their teachings has been handed down to us, and unlike the written word which is rigid and unchangeable, that spirit is adaptable to every need and does not become an unwieldy drag on one's conscience. That is why you are assembled here to face the issues which you, not only as Quakers but as Quakers in India, are bound to face. The war, of which the flames are fast enveloping the world, is to outward seeming a war between Britain and America, China and Russia on the one hand and the Axis Powers on the other, or, as it is often described, between democracies and totalitarian powers. Really it is a war between Imperialisms ranged on either side, and whatever be the issue, it is not going to decide the ultimate issue of war as such. The war which will end all wars will be the war between violence and non-violence, and in that war all the forces of non-violence will have to be brought together, whether they are represented by the Quakers or the Pacifists, Peace-loving Communists or Freedom-loving Pacifists in India. Your meeting is a forerunner of a vaster assembly of the kind I am contemplating, and if we can join hands together, we may pave the way for a future war to end all wars and their causes summed up in the word 'imperialism'.

That, however, is a far cry. It is best for us to address ourselves to the present. The Quakers have before them a glorious tradition and a rich heritage. Dr. Cadoux's valuable volume The Early Christian Attitude to War has about a hundred pages of solid quotation from the pre-Nicene Fathers in strong disapproval of war. They have all regarded war "wholesale murder". Tertullian tackled the question for all time. "Will it be lawful," he asked, for a Christian "to occupy himself with the sword when the Lord declares that he who uses the sword shall perish by the sword? And shall the son of peace, for whom it will be unfitting even to go to law, be engaged in a battle? And shall he who is not the avenger even of his own wrongs, administer chains and imprisonment and tortures and executions?" And Cadoux adds that Tertullian then goes on to suggest that those converted while soldiers must in practice leave the army or suffer martyrdom. It is after Constantine that the Church loses its spiritual character and denies its spiritual heritage and becomes the handmaid to Imperialistic ambition. But though abandoned by the Catholic Church, the teaching of Christ was harked back to through the centuries by numerous groups of reformers until the early founders of Quakerism inscribed on their banner "Primitive Christianity Revived". George Fox, whose name should be a perpetual inspiration to all, was invited when in Derby Jail to become a captain in the Commonwealth Army. He declined, "saying that he lived in the virtue of that life and power that took away the occasion of all wars", and so he lay among the felons, filthily, for six months more. Graham, who in his Faith of a Quaker has traced the history of succeeding years, gives some glorious instances of Quakers having borne brave testimony to Christ's teaching. When the Catholic rebels and English troops scattered terror in Ireland in 1798 the Friends there "destroyed any guns which they might have for sporting purposes, and left themselves absolutely unprotected." In America in 1704 the Quaker Colonists never carried arms, nor bolted their doors, and the "Indians left the Quaker farms alone, devoting themselves to killing Presbyterians who had killed their people and taken their lands." During the Civil War the Friends were faced with a real and almost insuperable difficulty whether to fight on the side of Abolitionists and abandon a dearly loved principle, or not to fight and thus acquiesce in the continuance of slavery. A considerable number went to war, but "Friends in the Southern States bore the full brunt of a really savage persecution for refusing the Confederate conscription. They were at times driven into the line of fire, but refused to shoot. During the last World War Graham records that 32 per cent of the available young men in England, Australia and New Zealand joined the forces, but the remaining 68 per cent served their country as non-combatants. I am told that during the present war some Quakers have belied their legacy and advised the Czechs to bend the knee to Hitler. Thus when the testing time comes some may be found wanting, but some have always passed through the fire, and I am sure there is enough in past history to inspire us. The Friends' humanitarianism has been beyond dispute. Thus when the Czar insisted on the Doukhobors producing a large sum at once as passage money before he allowed them to migrate to Canada, John Bellows, Brooks and others raised from the Friends £40,000 by telegram within twentyfour hours, and enabled the Doukhobors to migrate.

There have been occasions when the Quakers emphasised only the letter of the Master's teaching and took up an attitude of seclusion from the world, and John Bright was called to account when he plunged into the national affairs as a political reformer. But, says Graham, that attitude has vanished now. Even as the Master came not to destroy but to fulfil, the disciples can fulfil the Master's teaching by boldly applying it to new occasions and new necessities.

I am glad that the Conference of Quakers in Rasulia which met two years ago declared that the way of Jesus was the supreme need of the hour, and that "our duty of witness may involve for us even the complete rejection of the claims of our nation to our service in war." The time has now come for some of you to reiterate the faith and the duty, and you who have temporarily or permanently made India the land of your adoption owe a duty to India.

That brings me to the call of the present hour. The call of Christ and of service has brought you to India. I do not know if any of you have had to sign the pledge similar to the one which some American missionaries had to sign before coming to India. If you have come under such a pledge, I am afraid your position here is anomalous. For as Quakers you have to speak out against war as wholesale murder and "the greatest social sin of modern times", as Quakers you have to speak out against Imperialism, and against the persecution of those who are trying to overthrow Imperialism; and such a pledge would prevent you from doing these obvious duties. You are believers in silent prayer, but I am sure your creed tells you no less than the creed of the Methodist Church "that to be silent in the face of need, injustice and exploitation would be to deny Him." Some missionary friends have had to face the alternative between keeping the pledge to Government and thereby denying Christ, and leaving the country but remaining true to Christ. They chose the latter. These disciples of Jesus have left shining examples for Christian missionaries in India. The duty of the Quakers is crystal clear. They are pledged to opposition to all wars and therefore necessarily to the present war. They have to declare their faith and suffer for Christ's sake.

Instead of swords being beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning-hooks, the Cross has been turned into a sword. You have to speak out against this process of desecration and preach the method of turning enemies "not into corpses but friends". A private declaration of faith as you did two years ago is not enough.

You have to study the situation in the country and throw your whole weight on the side of Right. This war is said to be fought for the sake of democracy and freedom of all peoples, but those who are fighting the totalitarian powers are doing their very best to deny freedom and democracy to the people in their charge. Quite apart from the question whether India would voluntarily help in the war effort or not,—you as Quakers could not think of military co-operation by India—it is the duty of those who profess to fight for high ideals not to belie their professions. It was the duty of America to refuse all help to Britain until she had made India free. Americans among you can still strive to bring home to their motherland this obvious duty.

There is a movement of pacifism in India being carried on by conscientious objectors who are members of the Congress. They started the movement of civil disobedience in order to secure the right to declare all opposition to participation in the present war. I would ask you to understand the position of the conscientious objector in India. If we were a free nation, the task before the pacifists amongst us in case we were invaded would be similar to that before the pacifists in Britain, America and elsewhere. In free countries, where pacifist citizens have a full share in the government of the country, it may be right for them to abide by the national decision, except in so far as it touches their conscience. But the case would be entirely different if the pacifists lived under a despotism. They owe a double duty—one to their creed and the other to their country. That is the essence of the struggle in India. It is often complacently said that Government have no objection to Gandhiji and his few pacifists expressing themselves against the war; but it is forgotten that, if anything, Gandhiji's opposition to the war is stronger than that of those who ground their opposition on political reasons. Gandhiji's non-violence would not be worth a moment's purchase, if it were divorced from the desire to break the chain of his country's slavery. Under a despotism—and the Government of India is one of undiluted autocracy today—it becomes the duty of the pacifist to fight to reverse the Government's imposed decision both on the grounds of non-violence and politics. But the conscientious objector in India—both on political and ethical grounds—pitched his demand deliberately in a lower key. He just asked for the liberty to declare his opposition to participation in all war, and therefore this war, by men, money and munitions. It was his right to carry on a crusade to cripple all Government's resources. But under Gandhiji's guidance and leadership he pursued the policy of non-embarrassment, restricting himself to just a public expression of his opinion, and avoiding recruiting depots and munition factories. Even this restricted demand for freedom of expression was not conceded, and thousands were put into prison for the exercise or intended exercise of that right. They are now released no doubt, but a number of those who were suspected of opposition to this imposed war are still in prison for no overt act of civil disobedience. Government have no doubt said in the course of their communique that the Satyagrahis "can be released", suggesting perhaps thereby that in future such Satyagraha would be ignored. But the honourable and graceful course for them would have been to declare that the conscientious objectors had the right they claimed within the limit they had imposed on themselves. It is for you to support this simple demand of your brother pacifists in India.

I wonder if you have moved among the masses sufficiently to find out what the so-called 'voluntary' war effort means to them. You know the scandal of The Hindustan Times case. It brought to light a fact which would otherwise have been suppressed. In Madras almost the entire official machinery including the Police and the Magistracy and the taxing authorities are engaged in selling tickets for war lotteries to the poorest and most helpless of people and making collections otherwise from persons who are either under or are likely to come under their authority. In some parts in Bombay agricultural labourers earning scarcely two annas a day have had to pay four times and eight times as much to the war fund, without actually knowing what the amount was extorted for. In a well-known province I can say in the words of a high-placed official that the "war collection business is horrid. It stinks." You have to expose cases of the kind wherever you come across them, and even help to prevent their occurrence.

I will not dwell at length on the place and work of the Missionaries in India, with reference to the spread of the gospel of Christ. Gandhiji's views are now very well known, and such of you as may care to study them in a compact form may turn to a volume of his writings called Christian Missions—Their Place in India. If the Missionaries will realise that they are here not as patrons doling out wisdom and coins but as humble seekers and servants, all will be well with them. Let them confine all their preaching and their teaching to the living example of their life and their acts of service. There is the work of communal unity. I think if every Quaker could show in himself an example in active practice of the wonderful Quaker maxim—"In essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in other things charity"—much could be achieved. And what John Woolman used to say is equally apposite in this connection: "The law of Christ consisted in tenderness towards our fellow-creatures and a concern so to walk that our conduct may not be the means of strengthening them in error." John Woolman has also left for the Quakers an inspiring lesson in another direction. It was the lesson of greater and greater identification with the poor. He ruled out every kind of trade that involved unrighteousness and injustice and ministered to luxury, waste, and sweating. I commend to you the work of the All India Spinners' Association and the Village Industries Association, and appeal to you to use khadi and village-made articles as far as may be possible for you. I also commend to you Gandhiji's latest booklet on Constructive Work.

I come to the last and the most important point. The war is now at our door. Rangoon has been bombed, and our turn may soon come. We may even be invaded and find ourselves face to face with a conqueror asking peremptory surrender. How shall we face the issue? Quakers in the past have not objected to organising Ambulance Units which are subject to military discipline and control. I will not discuss the question whether this does or does not involve co-operation with the war-machine, and I would not quarrel with you if you should feel called upon to raise Ambulance Units or organise War Victims' Relief work. But I would ask you to consider whether it may not be more in consonance with your creed to cast in your lot with the voluntary organisations that may be set up for these purposes by the people of India.

It is when we are faced with the last question that you with your great faith and "desire to treasure the integrity of the Christ within" can play a heroic part. It is easy enough to refuse military service and go to prison, it is easy enough to insist on the right to preach non-participation in war and take the consequence. But the world is in need of more heroic deeds. The conqueror asking for surrender will not offer us the alternative of prison, and we as pacifists will not at the crucial hour betray our faith and take up what arms we may have to resist him. The alternative will in all likelihood be immediate death by being shot. Among us Indians there may not be many prepared to take the grim decision to prefer death to surrender. But some war has to be the last, and nothing but heroic acts of self-immolation can work towards that happy consummation. It is said of an officer of the British Fleet Air Arm that he left a letter, to be delivered to his parents in the event of his being killed, in which these words occur: "Flesh and blood had to be sacrificed if the things in which we believe were to survive and flourish. It has been my lot to be one of those whose gift has been accepted." This officer had since made the "gift" of his life. It was truly heroic, but even more heroic would be the gift by an innocent pacifist of his flesh and blood to the victor demanding abject surrender of his soul. There may be a handful of such heroes today, but out of the ashes of the few will arise many who will liberate the land and war-weary humanity. I am sure that when that fateful moment comes Gandhiji will expect you to stand side by side with the Satyagrahis in India who will embrace death cheerfully, and to live up to the creed of the old Quaker who said to his torturer: "My prison shall be my grave before I will budge a jot; for I owe my conscience to no mortal man. I value not your threats nor resolutions. In me shall you behold a resolution above fear, and conscience above cruelty. He that would reap and not labour must faint with the wind, and perish in disappointments; but an hair of my head shall not fall, without the Providence of my Father who is over all."

Untouchability and Indore

The Maharaja Saheb of Indore sent a message to the organisers of the Harijan Day in Indore on the 1st inst. It is published in the Holkar Government Gazette of 2nd March, and will repay perusal. It is on a par with the Travancore Proclamation which declared the abolition of untouchability. The opening lines demonstrate the spirit in which the problem is approached by the Maharaja. They are :

"It gives me great pleasure in associating myself with you in celebrating the Harijan Day. I have been deeply interested in the welfare of a community which for many generations has suffered in every way from the fanatical orthodoxy of Caste Hindus. Without realising their obstinacy they have done a great disservice not only to their country but to humanity in general. I, for one, could not conceive of the continuance of this evil in Holkar State, and with a view to eliminating it issued a proclamation in 1938 thereby placing the so-called untouchables on the same footing as any one of us. I am glad to see that something substantial has been done in ameliorating their social and economic conditions in my State. There is plenty more to be done in this field, and I can commend this urgent work to everyone interested in public welfare. I want to point out with all the emphasis at my command that it is impossible to evolve a sound body politic on democratic lines in this country unless we achieve social solidarity among ourselves. In achieving this we must, in the first place, liquidate the very word 'untouchability' from our vocabulary."

Gram Panchayats in Aundh

The Raja Saheb writes :

"Since we last met at Wardha three years ago, the system of village administration by the panchayats has been introduced in Aundh State, and I have great pleasure in saying that the results so far achieved are most hopeful and encouraging. Every village now has a school. Most of these schools are built with local help and partial grants from the taluk samitis. The villagers have made their own roads, they have made water arrangements, and every inhabitant in almost all the villages has come to feel a sort of consciousness of his right as well as of responsibility and of love for his village. A copy of the report of the judicial administration of my State has already been sent to you. Now I am sending you under separate cover a copy of the administration report of the panchayats. You will get just an outline therefrom as to how we are progressing in the villages on their constructive side."

Stud Bulls

At the meeting of friends of the late Jamnalalji which recently met in Wardha, one of the schemes announced was the production of 1,000 good bulls. It was conceived by Seth Rameshwardas Birla. He has not allowed the grass to grow under his feet. He has already issued an appeal for assistance. The scheme is likely to cost five lacs which should be forthcoming without an effort. The following form the committee of management :

1. Shri Rameshwardasji Birla — President
2. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel
3. Shrimati Suvratadevi Ruia
4. Shri Laxminarainji Gadodia
5. Shri Bhagirathji Kanodia
6. Shri Hiralalji Shastri
7. Shri Keshavdevji Nevatia — Secretary

Gopalan Nambiar

Gopalan Nambiar is a patriotic youth who in the heat of the moment is said to have instigated a crowd, at a meeting in Malabar, to assault a Sub-Inspector of Police resulting in his unfortunate death. The High Court at Madras has sentenced him to be hanged. I take it that the evidence justified the sentence, but it is a clear case for commutation of the sentence by the Government. This is no case of private murder deliberately committed. We are living in the midst of murders on a wholesale scale which no court of law can ever reach. It is a mockery to send a young man to the gallows for an act, however indefensible otherwise, in which malice is wholly absent. I am glad, therefore, that leaders of public opinion and the Press are moving in order to secure a reprieve. It is hoped that the Government will listen to the public voice.

CRY FOR WHEAT

Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar in his elaborate defence of the Government position failed to explain why Government were not prepared to accept the one practical solution of the situation created by the anarchy in price control, viz. the purchase of stocks by Government and selling them at a fixed price to the wholesale or retail buyer. There is no doubt that the country's production, as pointed out by one member, is about 10 million tons of wheat, and the consumption about 9 millions, and yet wheat is scarce in the Punjab and Delhi, where any wheat flour available is mixed with barley and other flour. The Commerce Member questioned the accuracy of the figure for our annual consumption, but he revealed that 178,000 tons of wheat and 82,000 tons of wheat flour were exported during the current year as against 10 million tons of total yield during 1940-41. That should not make wheat or wheat flour scarce, for if the consumption is 9 million tons, this export should leave a fair surplus. The deplorable fact is that the Commerce Member, who says that the problem in October was neither shortage of wheat nor control of wheat prices, does not realise that control of prices has the inevitable result of producing scarcity of the article concerned, unless it is accompanied by the safeguarding measure of making the commodity available at control prices by Government themselves.

If as the Commerce Member suggests vast quantities of stocks have been hoarded or buried underground, even that is the result of the short-sighted price control policy, and the much more short-sighted political policy of the rulers having no relations or responsibility to the ruled. It should not be difficult for the Government to ascertain the actual facts, and make stocks available. If, however, that is impossible, they should make way for popular national Government and let the whole responsibility fall on their shoulders. As the London Economist said some time ago, "the State cannot, in war time, evade responsibility for what happens to the community." We agree that neither can "the community dissociate itself from the individuals who compose it. In a very real sense, we are all members one of another."

This last truth must be realised by every one of us. The State exists today and functions as best it can, but it may cease to function any day. Then the responsibility will be thrown on the individuals composing the community. Unless we realise that "we are all members one of another", there will be chaos. In this connection the example of a friend in Ceylon is very commendable. He writes: "As you probably know there is a rice shortage here and only about two measures are allowed each week; I am glad to say that I had stored about 800 bushels and have bought 500 kurakan as well, so I have enough for about six months anyhow. I am issuing it to my people at Rs. 4/9 and will lose about Rs. 700 a month, but the price at which I bought most of it is too high to ask them to pay it, so I am very glad to be able to help them." Those who have stocks of grain should follow his good example.

EVIDENTLY A LONG WAR

Almost as though in continuation of my article "British and American Nazism", Shri Chandrashanker Shukla sends me exhaustive extracts from American daily and weekly papers to show that the American brand is, if anything, worse than the British brand, and cites numerous instances of the most ruthless prevalence of the colour bar there. There is no room in these columns for those copious extracts. But in order that the duration of the present war may be gauged a bare mention may be made of the bar sinister as it prevails today:

(1) Negro students are not admitted to common educational institutions, nor are separate equal facilities provided for them.

(2) In spite of the U. S. Supreme Court decision establishing the principle of equal treatment for all on trains in Southern States, the equal treatment consists of equal kind of accommodation in a compartment marked 'for Negroes only'.

(3) Housing accommodation in white localities is impossible for Negroes even in the Northern States.

(4) Negroes are debarred from jobs in the defence industries, and Negroes already employed are systematically being hounded out.

(5) Arrogant hatred of Negro recruits in the Army—the "niggers must be made to know their place, with violence and terror if necessary."

There was an affray at an army camp in which a Negro soldier and a white military policeman were killed, and "after the shooting whole companies—Negro officers included—were forced to stand all night with their hands above their heads."

No wonder that a "Negro-man-in-the-street" wrote to the editor of a paper: "When I read these things I am forced to wonder just how far removed is the brand of democracy that we practise from Fascism, Nazism, and barbarism."

This is happening in a country where 80 years ago Abraham Lincoln spoke of the Americans as a "new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." He fought what is regarded in history as a righteous war, in order that "this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom," and after the successful conclusion of that war also forfeited his life for the ideal. But perhaps because that war was tarnished by bloodshed, the new birth of freedom is yet to come. Mr. Churchill speaking some days ago said that the war may last even twenty years. He had, I am sure, not the social conditions in America or in the British Colonies or India in mind, when he said so. But there is no doubt that there cannot be a peace to which Indians or the Negroes can give assent unless it has for its foundation democracy broad-based on the freedom and equal citizenship rights of all — white, black; yellow, etc. Sevagram, 16-3-42 M. ## YARN CURRENCY

( By Shriman Narayan Agarwal )

The other day about a dozen workers of various local institutions assembled in Gopuri to discuss Gandhiji's scheme of yarn currency. Acharya Vinoba Bhave and Shri Shrikrishnadas Jaju were also present. A very interesting and useful discussion ensued, the gist of which is given below.

Yarn cannot be termed currency in the strict sense of the word, because it cannot circulate freely without soon getting spoiled. Yarn can be used as a restricted form of barter. The currency will be mostly paper; it can be pieces of cloth or leather as well. The sanction behind the currency will be yarn and not silver or gold. The system could, therefore, widely be called the yarn standard.

The advantages of the yarn standard will be many. It will enhance the prestige of spinning and, through it, of manual labour. Unlike gold or silver, yarn can be earned alike by a child or even a decrepit person; it can be produced at any time and for any duration. It has its direct utility in meeting one of our vital needs, namely clothing.

The new currency will also make our villages panic-proof in these days of international holocaust. Even in the event of internal dislocation of trade, commerce and currency, the villager will feel secure within his self-sufficient co-operative life. The villagers will also be obliged to restrict their wants and make their village self-sufficient by producing all the necessities of life. Exploitation will be considerably reduced, and production will be almost simultaneous with distribution.

Payments will be made in terms of 'lattis' and 'gundis'; the paper or cloth currency notes will bear the numbers of hanks on them. The value of each hank (640 rounds) will be roughly one anna. The prices of commodities like grain, cloth, milk and ghee produced in the village will not be allowed to fluctuate violently in terms of hanks. The real and face values of khadi currency, therefore, will be, more or less, constant and identical.

The stability of the value of yarn currency will have to be maintained by establishing a Central Co-operative Stores and supplying the commodities at fixed prices. Without regulating production and distribution, price control will be an impossibility. The whole village economy will have to be assiduously and intelligently planned.

If necessary, the village may also establish a Bank to accept rupees or annas for the yarn currency to provide for travelling or remitting money to relations and friends living outside the village.

The introduction of the yarn currency or standard implies the existence of village panchayats. Without a corporate life and village self-government no scheme of indigenous currency can make any headway.

WHAT AFTER THE FINAL ADIEU?

Apropos of my article 'A Peep into British History', a friend has sent an extract from Hume's History of England, which is fuller than the ones I have quoted:

"That they might leave the island with the better grace, the Romans assisted them in erecting anew the wall of Severus, which was built entirely of stone, and which the Britons had not at that time artificers skilful enough to repair. And having done this last good office to the inhabitants, they bid a final adieu to Britain about the year 448, after being masters of the more considerable part of it during the course of near four centuries.

"The object Britons regarded this present of liberty as fatal to them; and were in no condition to put in practice the prudent counsel given them by the Romans, to arm in their own defence. Unaccustomed both to the perils of war and to the cares of civil government, they found themselves incapable of forming or executing any measures for resisting the incursions of the barbarians. Grasian, and also Constantine, two Romans who had a little before assumed the purple in Britain, had carried over to the continent the flower of the British youth; and having perished in their unsuccessful attempts on the imperial throne, had despoiled the island of those who in this despicable extremity were best able to defend it. The Picts and Scots, finding that the Romans had finally relinquished Britain, now regarded the whole as their prey, and attacked the Northern wall with redoubled forces. The Britons, already subdued by their own fears, found the rampart but a weak defence for them; and deserting their station, left the country entirely open to the inroad of the barbarous enemy. The invaders carried devastation and ruin along with them, and exerted to the utmost their native ferocity, which was not mitigated by the helpless condition and submissive behaviour of the inhabitants. The unhappy Britons had a third time recourse to Rome, which had declared its resolution for ever to abandon them. At times the patrician, sustained at that time by his valour and magnanimity, the tottering ruins of the Empire, and revived for a moment among the degenerate Romans the spirit, as well as discipline, of their ancestors. The British ambassadors carried to him the letter of their countrymen which was inscribed, 'The Groans of the Britons'. The tenor of the epistle was suitable to its superscription. 'The barbarians,' say they, 'on the one hand, chase us into the sea; the sea, on the other, throws us back upon the barbarians and we have only the hard choice left of perishing by the sword or by the waves.' But Aetius, pressed by the arms of Attila, the most terrible enemy that ever assailed the empire, had no leisure to attend to the complaints of allies whom generosity alone could induce him to assist. The Britons, thus rejected, were reduced to despair, deserted their habitations, abandoned tillage, and flying for protection to the forests and mountains, suffered equally from hunger and from the enemy." (Italics mine)

This extract is important inasmuch as the facts given by the eighteenth century historian have stood the test of later evidence.

The date given by Hume (446 A. D.) is the same as Gardiner—perhaps Gardiner's source was Hume—and the date of the "final adieu" by the Romans is perhaps a typist's error. It should be 428 and not 448. The extract is coloured by Hume's prejudice against everything English, but there is no doubt that the Britons felt "the present of liberty as fatal to them", and they abjectly appealed to the Romans not once but three times to save them from the sea and the barbarians and appealed in vain.

There is also no doubt that the "present" of freedom was to them a blessing in disguise. They may have been driven to desperation and into the wilderness for the time being, but it was because they were left to fend for themselves that they later came to their own. The Romans were at least good enough to ask the Britons "to arm in their own defence". The singular contribution of the British rulers to India is the emasculation of the whole people by forcible deprivation of arms, so much so that, however hopeful some of our leaders may be of bringing an army into being after freedom is declared, the prospect is really nil. To raise a formidable army—and a mechanised army at that—to fight formidable foes, is no matter of a mango trick. Non-violent organisation is the only thing feasible, whether with or without freedom, and one can only hope that they may soon see the error of their thought and bend all the nation's efforts to organising it non-violently against the invader.

But says C. R. in a recent speech (I am quoting from The Hindu), "If Britain did not respond and this country had to face dangers, still I would appeal to all to be brave and organise measures for local safety and protection. If anyone thought that, if Japan succeeded, the freedom of India could be easily obtained, he was woefully mistaken, for Japanese exploitation would be more ruthless. We will have to resist every foreign rule and probably, if that rule was not British, we would have to give up the methods we had so far adopted for winning our rights against Britain and devise new methods." While it is true that Japan's or Germany's success cannot possibly make our freedom easy, it is no use adopting the theory of Edward Thompson and others that the British and American species of exploitation is or can be better than the Japanese or the Fascist species. These friends forget two things, viz. (1) the past history of British imperialism; and (2) that present comparatively milder repression is due to the non-violent methods employed, and that in the past the ruthlessness—no better or worse than that which is now attributed to the "enemies"—was in response to our ill-considered violent methods. Besides, if the milder methods will not succeed against other and worse foreigners, one wonders why it is not realised that wilder methods will succeed still less, for the simple reason that it is not possible when the country is invaded to organise any of the wilder methods, even if we were free.

'SCORCHED EARTH'

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Russian technique of scorched earth has staggered humanity, but humanity has been powerless to do anything except applaud the amazing sacrifice and bravery that counted no cost too great to circumvent the enemy. I have shared the amazement with the admirers but not their admiration.

We like to imitate what we admire. Now that the prospect faces us, are we able to contemplate with equanimity, or feel the glow of bravery and sacrifice at, the prospect of India's earth being scorched and everything destroyed in order that the enemy's march may be hampered?

As a war resister my answer can only be one. I see neither bravery nor sacrifice in destroying life or property for offence or defence. I would far rather leave, if I must, my crops and homestead for the enemy to use than destroy them for the sake of preventing their use by him. There is reason, sacrifice and even bravery in so leaving my homestead and crops, if I do so not out of fear but because I refuse to regard anyone as my enemy—that is, out of a humanitarian motive.

But in India's case there is, too, a practical consideration. Unlike Russia's, India's masses have no national instinct developed in the sense that Russia's have. India is not fighting. Her conquerors are. Supposing that the conquerors are worsted and the Japanese come, the inarticulate masses will not even notice the change for the time being or for a long time. The intelligentsia are divided on the issue of the war. The motive here is irrelevant. India's soldiers are in no sense a national army. They are soldiers because it is their profession. They will as soon fight under the Japanese or any other provided they are paid for fighting. In these circumstances the policy of scorched earth would be a wholly indefensible act.

It is therefore a matter for satisfaction that Indian opinion is being expressed against the policy of scorching. I know nothing of the requirements of the military, but they can never be allowed to supersede national or humanitarian considerations which the nation may have accepted. The military must thus be an arm of the dominant civil power, not its substitute. The Government of India will considerably ease the situation and allay anxiety by declaring in unequivocal terms that they will not apply, if the occasion ever arise, the scorched earth policy to India, especial regard being had to her peculiar position.

Defending the Indefensible

I have read Qaid-e-Azam's answer to my appeal. It has caused me deep pain. I had expected a better response. The reproduction of the whole offending article would make worse reading. For the whole of it is venomous. Qaid-e-Azam knows that I do not hesitate to criticise any party or person whenever the occasion demands criticism. I have more than once criticised unbecoming writings in the non-Muslim Press.

I do not know the writer of the offending article. If he is a Hindu, it makes Qaid-e-Azam's defence of it all the worse for it. I am sorry that Qaid-e-Azam has resorted to special pleading for defending the indefensible. This unexpected defence of an article designed to wound deep susceptibilities makes ominous reading.

A Harijan Colony in Bihar

Raja Bahadur Kamakhya Narayan Sinha, while opening a Harijan Colony in Arrah the other day, spoke against the sin of untouchability in a way which reminds one of the recent message to Harijans sent by the Maharaja Saheb of Indore:

"It is a crime on the part of us so-called Caste Hindus to treat lakhs of people as untouchables. They too are God's creation. They have the same physical form as we, they are activated by the same human desires, they feel insults and misery just as keenly as we do. But they are today powerless to raise their voice in protest. Their cry of distress, however, does go up to heaven, and we shall surely be damned by it if we do not mend. We must atone for our sins. That we have put up for them a dwelling place of bricks and mortar is only a drop in the ocean. We shall have atoned only when we give them a dwelling place in our hearts and shall embrace them as the great Bharat embraced the humble boatman Guha and thereby raised himself."

If all Caste Hindus were to root out untouchability from their hearts as Raja Bahadur has done, this blot would soon be removed from our society.

The Married Estate

A sister, who is a good worker and was anxious to remain celibate in order better to serve the country's cause, has recently married having met the mate of her dreams. But she imagines that in doing so she has done wrong and fallen from the high ideal which she had set before herself. I have tried to rid her mind of this delusion. It is no doubt an excellent thing for girls to remain unmarried for the sake of service, but the fact is that only one in a million is able to do so. Marriage is a natural thing in life, and to consider it derogatory in any sense is wholly wrong. When one imagines any act a fall it is difficult, however hard one tries, to raise oneself. The ideal is to look upon marriage as a sacrament and therefore to lead a life of self-restraint in the married estate. Marriage in Hinduism is one of the four Ashramas. In fact the other three are based on it. But in modern times marriage has unfortunately come to be regarded purely as a physical union. The other three Ashramas are all but non-existent.

The duty of the above-mentioned and other sisters who think like her is, therefore, not to look down upon marriage but to give it its due place and make of it the sacrament it is. If they exercise the necessary self-restraint, they will find growing within themselves a greater strength for service. She who wishes to serve will naturally choose a partner in life who is of the same mind, and their joint service will be the country's gain.

It is a tragedy that generally speaking our girls are not taught the duties of motherhood. But if married life is a religious duty, motherhood must be so too. To be an ideal mother is no easy task. The procreation of children has to be undertaken with a full sense of responsibility. The mother should know what is her duty from the moment she conceives right up to the time the child is born. And she who gives intelligent, healthy and well-brought-up children to the country is surely rendering a service. When the latter grow up they too will be ready to serve. The truth of the matter is that those who are filled with a living spirit of service will always serve whatever their position in life. They will never adopt a way of life which will interfere with service.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

How to Ward off Starvation?

Q. Is it not far more important today to find some solution for the shortage and high prices of foodstuffs than to organise civic guards? Speeches will not quench the fire of hunger. And we have neither enough capitalists nor capitalists with the right ideals to set things right.

A. It should be part and parcel of the work of civic guards to protect people as far as possible from hunger and exploitation. I have already given some advice as to how to economise in food during times of stress. Such economy should begin from today.

1. Food should be regulated scientifically so that there is no waste and a maximum of economy.

2. Whatever seasonable foodstuffs can be sown should be planted at once.

3. Use should be made of herbs etc. which grow wild and which can be eaten with advantage. Research therein is necessary.

4. No one must remain idle. If he cannot find employment, he should provide work for himself, such as spinning.

5. I fear that, if the war does not come to a speedy end and the Japanese invade India, it will become difficult or even impossible to transport foodstuffs. Therefore, if there happens to be any surplus anywhere, efforts should be made to send it where it is most needed.

I am aware that all this is no easy task. But I see no other way out of the difficulty.

What for City Employees?

Q. You have given the rich an idea of what their duty is if they migrate to the villages. But there will be thousands of evacuees who have been employed in the cities all their lives. They have no money and no ancestral homes in the villages where they can take refuge. What of them?

A. It is possible that many such workers will migrate with their masters. Those who do not will have to seek out some occupation for themselves in the villages. One of these is spinning. It would be as well for all such to prepare themselves for the crisis.

SOME FALSE ASSUMPTIONS

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

A professor in one of the best of our Universities asks if we hope to utilise our resources to the best advantage by means of cottage units, and cites the meat packing industry of Chicago as an instance of a complete utilisation of bye-products in large scale industries and thereby cheapening of the goods to the consumer.

There are three assumptions in the above question, viz. (1) that complete utilisation of bye-products is only possible in large scale industries, (2) that large scale industries are always economical in the utilisation of resources, (3) that low price is an invariable desideratum. These we shall consider in turn.

It is true to a certain extent that large scale industries do utilise their bye-products more completely, but to make that an inseparable feature of large scale industry is wrong. A walk through our tannery at Nalwadi or the one run by Shri Satish Chandra Dasgupta at Calcutta will show the visitor that every part of a carcass, the horns, the hide, the hoofs, the fat, the flesh, the bones, the entrails, etc., can all be used even through means within the reach of cottage units. If this is not being commonly done, the reason is the ignorance of our cottage tanners and not that such utilisation is foreign to cottage units. The remedy is not to abandon cottage units but to bring the light of science to cottage workers. This is where we have failed, and selfless scientists with the necessary initiative to adapt their knowledge to the simplicity of cottage resources are the desideratum, and not the large scale units.

In so far as a large scale unit reduces overhead charges it is economical, but it cannot be said to be the most economical utilisation of our resources, especially under a competitive regime, as the economic history of America can testify. Fields of cotton had to be burnt, shiploads of coffee were dumped into the sea or used as fuel, and many waste products, like molasses, rich in mineral products, are thrown out, which would not be the case under cottage units. In many cases the large scale units are the most extravagant when we look at it from the national viewpoint. Take paper-making from bamboos. No large scale unit can function unless it has a forest of bamboos at its disposal. Fresh cut bamboos have to be fed into the mill steadily. On the other hand, when we use a cottage unit, fresh cut bamboos are used for baskets, mats granaries, roofs, etc., in the first instance; when these get rotten with use, such waste bamboos can be converted into beautiful paper. Which then is the more economic use of our resources?

Whether low or high prices are good will depend on the cost constituents that make up the price. If the price is made up largely of cost of materials, low prices are good; but if such prices are made up of human labour represented by wages, then high prices will represent a better tendency to distribute wealth. When one rupee worth of mill cloth represents 12 as. worth of material, transport, interest, etc., and 4 as. of wages, then it would be desirable to cut the items totalling 12 as. and lower the price. But when in khadi the price is made up of 12 as. for wages and 4 as. for materials, cutting the price will lower the very function the industry serves in bringing happiness to mankind. Therefore under an economy of cottage units where labour enters largely into the composition of price, high prices are good, and under large scale industries where labour forms a low percentage of the cost, low prices are to be aimed at.

Without a careful analysis of all these factors it would be disastrous to draw conclusions. We have to carefully scrutinise the assumptions in most of the arguments advanced in text-books, written for consumption in capitalistic countries, and not accept them at their face value. The danger is often great because we are fed with half truths.

VINOBA ON KHADI

Shri Vinoba delivered on 20th January an address on khadi to the Khadi Vidyalaya in Sevagram. It was a valuable contribution to the khadi movement. I give below a fairly full summary of his address which was in Hindi:

"In all the practical schemes for national awakening, uplift and freedom that have been placed before us I give first place to spinning as a daily spiritual sacrifice with a view to identifying oneself with the poor and adding something to national production. But it is a tragedy that in spite of its tremendous intrinsic value it has not yet become universal. We produce annually Rs. 50 lakhs worth of hand-spun and hand-woven today. We are to make an effort to raise the output by another 50 lakhs this year. But we need Rs. 200 crores for the nation, reckoning on Rs. 5 per head. Why have we not been able to make khadi universal? It is because we have not understood the fundamentals of the science of khadi. We have failed to realise its moral and spiritual value and hence have failed to spread the gospel throughout the length and breadth of the land.

It is unfortunate that meditation and worship in the popular mind are divorced from the daily tasks. Yet we had some mediaeval saints who were craftsmen also. They pursued their crafts for their livelihood. And I always ask myself whether they experienced the joy of gaining spiritual progress through their daily activity. Did they experience the ecstasy of worship in it or was it an unescapable drudgery? Did they perchance feel that they were worshipping the eternal while they ploughed their fields or plied their spinning wheels? Were these crafts, as it were, their rosary? Did they sing praises to God only through their bhajans? I wonder whether the plough and the spinning wheel were not the best means of worship for these saints, whether absorption in them was not their best meditation, whether the balance of mind gained through their work was not their best 'yoga', whether intelligent and skilful pursuit of the crafts was not their knowledge, and whether offering the produce of their labour to society did not constitute their real offering to God. My inner experience makes me like to feel that the spiritual progress of these giants among men could not have been possible if they had not put the daily task on a par with the rosary and the bhajans.

Yet prayer and meditation have been separated from labour by the mass mind. I see no reason why this should be so. In fact the prevailing tendency has been to decry Karma and put an exclusive emphasis on worship. This has done our society grave harm. The honest labour of man is his best offering to God. If we want to become energised on a nation-wide scale, there is only one way and that is to practise and preach this truth. The daily labour thus considered puts us in tune with humanity or the infinite. Time was when the Congress asked every member to spin in token of membership of the national organisation. A bare minimum was demanded; but owing to mental laziness, apathy and lack of true appraisal of khadi, the membership relapsed into the mere payment of 4 annas. Instead of making labour the keynote of our fitness to serve we have made money the standard. There is much talk of socialism and the levelling of society, but we have rejected the only practical proposal suggested to achieve this end. It has been a definite step backwards. We have thereby not become one with the people, we have not upheld the dignity of labour, nor have we contributed our full quota to the economic and moral uplift of the country. I read in the Maharashtra Khadi Patrika that every worker of the A. I. S. A. there has to spin  $7\frac{1}{2}$  hanks during the month, but alas! all do not understand why they should. So much yarn comes in from the villages, what matters a paltry  $7\frac{1}{2}$  hanks from them, is how they probably argue to themselves. It is this laziness and un-understanding mentality that we have got to get rid of. Remember that insistence on even half an hour's spinning in silence daily is to make it a form of national sacrifice. Such acts discipline us and help us to make our lives orderly. It is not enough for you who are here to learn the science of khadi to be content with merely learning its processes. You have to dive deep into the whys and wherefores of khadi. And only when you have understood its inner meaning will you become fit representatives of this great endeavour.

I am convinced that, if we can bring about this spiritual revolution within us, it will also mean a political and economic revolution in the country. The spiritual aspect of khadi then is the first thought I want to leave with you today.

The second thing I want to talk to you about is carding, and here I want you to look at the practical aspect of khadi. This question has been before me for many years. Many of us took to spinning, but few learnt how to card. They were dependent on others for their slivers. Now inasmuch as spinning depends on slivers it cannot exist without carding. Much improvement has been made in carding instruments, but the problem of universal carding has not been solved. I have been experimenting for some little time in spinning from slivers made from cotton that has been carded purely by hand, and I have come to the definite conclusion that the method of hand combing (tunai) will solve our problem. I had placed a standard in my own mind whereby a person could prepare cotton in this way and spin 160 rounds in an hour, but only day before yesterday in Paunar one of our workers, Shankar, exceeded my expectations. He spent 3½ hours in preparing 7½ tolas of slivers. He spun 3 hanks (of 640 rounds each) of yarn of 20 counts in 4½ hours from 6 tolas of slivers. Of course I know that this output cannot be equalled by the average person, for Shankar is an exceptional spinner; but it just shows the possibilities of this method. It proves that it can definitely make khadi universal. It is a method that can be employed by children of 5-6 years old, it will produce stronger cloth than yarn spun from machine or bow carded cotton can, it cannot hurt anyone from the point of view of health, and it is extremely simple. Stronger cloth is in itself an economic asset, but even if the output of cloth is less by this method, we should not mind. Our main object is the self-sufficiency of the village, and from that point of view tunai is capable of working wonders. Then again for basic education I have no doubt that it is the only thing. Self-sufficiency is our goal not only from the point of view of our poverty. It is of special importance to us during this period of war, particularly if this goes on for some years as it well might. I want you students to become experts at tunai. Do not think of khadi in terms of production and sales. People look at the moon, and think it is the most important star in the heavens whereas it is not. Self-sufficiency is like the vast expanse of stars in the heavens far more important than the moon which we worship because she appears to be larger and more beautiful.

Finally I want you to realise that khadi cannot be separated from the other village industries. It has its unique place no doubt, but it is closely related to other village crafts. This realisation will dawn on you without any difficulty, if you grasp the spiritual power of khadi. I hope you will make the philosophy of khadi a part of your being. Let it become the breath of your life. This is more than ever necessary today when another philosophy is threatening to overpower the world.

If you succeed, as I hope you will, you will certainly have made this Vidyalaya worth while."

THE SIXTH YEAR OF WORK

II

Paper-making: Handmade paper is gaining in popularity with the public. It may be said to be becoming—like khadi—a symbol of nationalism. The higher price has, therefore, not been a handicap as far as sales are concerned. But we cannot be satisfied until it is able to sell at a higher price because of its superior texture rather than because of sentimental reasons. Every effort is being made to improve the technique as well as experiment with various types of equipment. Data in regard to pulp-making from various materials is also being collected at the Paper Production and Training Centre at Poona. It is interesting to note that the Gujarat office sales of handmade paper have increased from Rs. 1,058 in 1937 to Rs. 26,086 in 1940.

Soap-making: This has been carried out chiefly in the Gram Saboon Karyalaya, Sabarmati. The output and sales have been steadily increasing.

Dairying: Not many workers have so far interested themselves in this industry. Inasmuch as it is very important from the point of view of diet and cattle breeding, it needs endless emphasis being laid on its study and scientific encouragement.

Tanning and Leather Work: Centres for training in tanning, chappal-making and manufacture of leather goods have been started in certain places. Improvement is steady.

Horn Work: This industry is doing well at Cuttack.

Button-making: This is making headway in Karnatak. Ivory nut, horn, sandalwood, rosewood and ivory are the raw materials used. Improvements in sawing circular pieces, drilling holes and polishing have been introduced. The income of button-makers ranges from Rs. 12 to Rs. 15 per month of 24 days and 7 hours.

Coir Spinning and Weaving: Training experimentation and production are being carried on at Honavar (Karnatak) with the aid of a Government grant. The yarn is now as good as that produced in Travancore or Cochin. Several improvements have been effected in the looms and spinning wheels as also in the rope-making machine. But more capital is needed to employ more workers.

Mat and basket making are being tried to be revived in the Ranivan centre in the U. P. Good slate pencils have been made in Hubli.

Vegetable Oil Lamp: Experiments are nearing completion in the matter of producing a lamp which will burn indigenous vegetable oils instead of kerosene. This will be a great boon.

Maganwadi experimented with success in producing boiled oil on a cottage basis. The oil so prepared was mixed with finely ground charcoal powder and zinc white and gave a pleasing grey paint.

37 students were trained at the Gram Sevak Vidyalaya, Maganwadi, from June 1939 to March 1940, and 32 are now in training.

The report gives one a good idea of how much can be done for the economic betterment of our people if more attention were paid to village industries. A few only of these have been catered for. The field is immense. The work has barely touched the fringe of the problem, but it has, without any shadow of doubt, pointed the right way. Many workers are needed in this as in every department of nation-building. It is to be hoped that Gandhiji's emphasis on the constructive programme will fulfil this lack. The report should be read by everyone. It can be had from Maganwadi, Wardha.

TARRED WITH THE SAME BRUSH

In a remarkable article demonstrating by practical examples the similarity between Nazism and Imperialism George Padmore, the Negro leader, proves how essential it is for all predatory 'Isms' to be destroyed if the world is to live in peace.

"In the country which is mine by birth and which is supposed to be part and parcel of the Empire I could neither write this article nor have it published unless I wanted to spend the duration of the war in a concentration camp. British democracy is not for export. The whites are the Herrenvolk, the blacks the 'lesser breed without the law'." While sympathising with the sufferings of the people of Europe the writer feels their misfortune is due in large measure to their callous indifference to and participation in the sufferings and exploitation of the people of Asia, Africa and other so-called backward peoples. He points out how in 1885 at the Berlin Conference the Germans conspired with the British and other imperialists to carve up Africa and they used all the methods said to be employed by the Nazis and Fascists today. Mr. Padmore quotes the French historian Halevy who has described the battle of Omdurman as "a massacre rather than a battle. Kitchener apparently had given orders that no prisoners were to be taken. 30,000 Dervishes were killed and only 4,000 wounded. The Mahdi's corpse was taken from his coffin, his head severed from his trunk, and the officers of the Expeditionary force made souvenirs of his nails." Similar atrocities can be attributed to the Belgians in the Congo, the French in Equatorial Africa, the Portuguese in Angola, the Spaniards in Morocco, the Italians in Lybia and Abyssinia, and the Germans in S. W. Africa.

The writer goes on to show how similar to colonial conquest and exploitation is the German ideal in Europe today. Germany wants to de-industrialise those sections of Europe over which she has secured control and make of them "sources of agricultural produce grown by the cheapest possible labour and markets for the absorption of finished goods of which the Reich will be the unique manufacturer." What of Britain? "In Sierra Leone there are iron ore mines at Marampa. The Gold Coast is one of the Empire's main sources of manganese ore while Nigeria contains large deposits of coal and tin. Yet these three colonies with a population of over 25,000,000 could not produce a single article for use of any kind. Britain is obliged to transport them across the sea to factories at home with all the risks, expense and loss of time which this entails." The cruel treatment meted out to the Poles is what the 'blacks' have borne for centuries. They have been branded as racially inferior, barbaric, and incapable of self-government. Sir Godfrey Huggins, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, said openly, "It is time for the people of England to realise that the white man in Africa was not prepared and never will be prepared to accept the African as an equal, socially or politically." Just as the 'new order' in Germany wants to ensure for the German the highest wages possible in order to give him a higher standard of living, so in South Africa the colour bar regulations lay down that the white worker must be engaged on skilled jobs at a minimum wage of 20/- per day while the average wage of a black worker is 1/-.

The writer avers that the District Commissioner in colonial Governments is a sort of 'Gauleiter' who carries out his dictatorial rule with the aid of 'black' Quislings. In Nigeria 'Emirs' are permitted their own courts, police force, prisons, etc. They collect the taxes and supply forced labour whenever necessary. As a reward the British Government allows them part of the taxes collected from the peasants and the court fines. The Emir of Sokoto gets £ 5,000 per annum plus £ 1,000 State entertainment allowance, free palatial quarters, servants, etc. But rulers who "refuse to carry out official orders can be summarily dismissed by the 'Gauleiters' under the 'Appointment and Deposition of Chiefs' Ordinance'."

Is not all this proof positive that all the warring nations, barring Russia and China, are tarred with the same brush? How can peace and security ever come into the world without a frank acknowledgment of the wickedness of any sort or kind of domination by one race over the other?

The National Week

The National Week comes every year with the certainty of seasons. It has come for over twenty years now, and yet we seem to be as far as ever from our freedom or communal unity or universalisation of khadi. We started the celebration with these three definite things. They were convertible terms. If we had unity, we could get freedom, and so also if all were converted to the khadi cult. Though we have added many things since to our constructive programme, the original is as true today as it was when it was first conceived and started.

How shall we behave during the forthcoming Week? Let us not treat freedom apart from its components. Then there remain communal unity and the thirteen other items, at the centre of which stands khadi in its widest sense.

Communal unity at the top will come in its time. We want freedom for the masses, and so do we want communal unity for and among the masses. If we have it in our hearts, let us show it in our daily little acts towards one another.

I will not mention the other items. All organisations will look after them. A word is necessary about khadi. Hitherto we have had khadi sales. This time, thanks to many causes, we have no khadi to sell. But we can all produce, we can all collect funds. If we have enough capital, we can produce more khadi. But we can also do tunai or carding and even weaving not for self but for the nation. We would therefore give our output to the A. I. S. A. at its depots in our localities.

And let me not forget the 24 hours' fast on the 6th and the 13th April. Thousands believed in it when we began. We did not err in fasting. Let those who have faith in it not forget fasting and prayer.

The Curse

A Harijan sevak writes:

"1. There are in our country hotels, hair cutting saloons, etc., which deny admission to Harijans. Is it not expected of our national workers — khadi, Hindi and Congress propagandists — to boycott such institutions and use their influence to get these disabilities of the Harijans removed?

2. There are washermen employed by the A. I. S. A. Some of these washermen observe untouchability in their profession and are not prepared to wash the clothes belonging to persons other than Brahmins and Nairs. The A. I. S. A. dispenses with the washermen who are addicted to drink. Similarly, should not the

A. I. S. A. dispense with those washermen who observe untouchability in their profession?"

The questions are appropriate. Both have to be answered only in one way. All institutions which deny access to Harijans should be boycotted by those, whether Congressmen or others, who feel keenly that the curse of untouchability has to be removed if Hinduism is to remain as a faith to live for and, if need be, to die for. In the posers put by the sevak the difficulty is sometimes serious. But nothing can be achieved unless serious difficulties are seriously faced and surmounted.

The question gives rise to a dilemma on some occasions. The washermen are supported by the A. I. S. A. in common with the other artisans. These cling to untouchability with a tenacity that defies all attempt to make them see the superstition that the curse is. Whilst I cannot offhand ask A. I. S. A. workers to boycott the artisans that observe untouchability, there is no doubt that there should be greater vigilance than heretofore in these matters. Preference should certainly always be given to those who have shed the superstition. Much will depend upon the spirit in which the persons afflicted with the virus of untouchability are approached.

A Correction

In Harijan of February 22nd 1942, there was an announcement that Dr. Prafulla Chandra Ghosh had been nominated a member of the Board of Management of the A. I. V. I. A. This was a mistake, as he being a member of the Congress Working Committee cannot become a member of the A. I. V. I. A. Board.

Bhils and Harijans in Rajputana

Thakkar Bapa's work entails a good deal of touring. He snatches odd moments during his travels to write to Gandhiji. The following is extracted from the account of the recent tour Shrimati Rameshwari Nehru and he had in Rajputana.

Speaking of Udaipur he opines that education is terribly backward. There is only one primary school to cater for 20-25 villages and only two high schools in the whole State. Thikanedars — landholders who make states within a state — who comprise nearly half the State spend all the revenue on themselves and do nothing for the ryot. The State has, however, decided to open 40 new schools every year where Harijans and Bhils too may have some opportunities of education. On His Highness' birthday the interest from 2 lakhs was set apart for the service of Harijans and Bhils as well as an annual grant of Rs. 10,000.

Branches of the Harijan Sevak Sangh have been opened in Mewar, Chittor, Bhilwada, Chhoti Sadri and Nathdwara, as well as two schools for Bhils and Minas in Rishabhdev and Kesariaji. It is an uphill task for Harijan workers, for there is great prejudice against Harijans in Rajputana. For example the images of Harijan gods may not have four hands. Only two are permissible for them! They may not take out processions on festival days in the main streets of the town. Music, other than drums, is not allowed to them during their weddings. A Harijan bridegroom may not wear a 'sehra'. One poor boy had the temerity to do so with the result that his associates received a sound thrashing from the inhabitants of Karjoo village, the party was robbed of all the money—Rs. 75—they had and 3 tolas of gold were literally pulled off their ears. Could tyranny go further? And even the Mahajan community, supposedly more advanced, harbours these prejudices.

At Nathdwara, one of the most famous Vaishnava temples in Mewar, Rs. 800 is spent daily in Prasad. How many Harijans and Bhils could be maintained with this money!

Women's education is next to nil in Rajputana and purdah is rife. In Jaipur Harijans are conspicuous by their absence in State schools and college. Harijan children need scholarships to encourage them to enter educational institutions. They should be given preference in State services. The age-long and cruel custom of forced labour should be put an end to. Sweepers and scavengers are terribly underpaid. Men get Rs. 7-8-0 and women Rs. 1-12-0 per mensem. No leave or provident fund facilities are given.

Barter in Bezwada

Shri Sitaram Sastry of Vinayashram writes that Shri Venkatakrishnayya of Gunadala (near Bezwada) has, since 1929, been carrying on with success a system of barter in his Khaddar Samsthanam.

To begin with he issued 138 and 50 chits worth Re. 1 and Rs. 3/8 each respectively. The chits were countersigned by the firm in which the funds of the Khaddar Samsthanam to the extent of Rs. 20,000 were then deposited. They circulated for four years among the residents of the institution and ultimately came into the hands of the firm. They served the purpose of coin, and holders were able on presentation of them to get the necessary articles or money. Later in 1933, because some people invariably wanted money in exchange, it was decided to give one bag of paddy per chit—a bag at that time being worth Rs. 3/8—and make paddy the medium of exchange. Other articles equivalent in value to the bag of paddy according to the scale of barter were given and cash was rarely used. For example a bag of paddy fetched 4 pairs of countrymade shoes. It was equal to 12½ lb. of carded cotton or 25 lb. of chillies or 6 lb.

of ghee, 50 lb. of tamarind, 8 yards of khadi 45" wide, or 25 lb. of oil, etc.

Recently Shri Venkatakrishnayya has developed the idea of a food ticket. He gives slivers and, if a person spins 1,000 yards of well-twisted, uniform yarn of about 12 counts, he gets 90 tolas of cooked rice and 30 tolas of soup and vegetable. The cost of this meal, which suffices for an adult, is one anna. The spinning wage thus works out at an anna for 1,000 yards, which would mean about 3½ annas per day of 8 hours, if the spinner were efficient enough to turn out 400 yards per hour.

Shri Sitaram Sastry is anxious to bring into practice Gandhiji's dictum that 'yarn is our basic coin' in his Ashram. At the present market rates one bag of paddy would be equivalent to 96 food tickets, i. e. the spinning wage payable for 96,000 yards of yarn or 5½ lb. of yarn of 12 counts. It would be good to try the experiment on a small scale and appraise results. But accurate observation is necessary, if success is to be ensured.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

About Children

Q. I quite agree that as society advances marriages between the different communities will increase and should be welcomed. You rightly advocate no change of religion for the parties concerned. But what do you advocate for the children? In which religion should they be brought up, the father's or the mother's?

A. Presumption in such marriages is that the parents respect each other's religion. If they are religiously minded, the children will unconsciously imbibe what they think is best for them and choose their own faith without let or hindrance from the parents. If the latter are indifferent, the children will also be probably indifferent and label themselves anyhow. This is what I have observed in such marriages. The difficulty crops up when there is a serious difference arising between the parents as to the upbringing of the children.

Conversion without Conviction

Q. You oppose all conversion without conviction. But are you not inconsistent? You profess equal respect for all religions. Why then worry about how the conversion is brought about?

A. I have extracted the question from your long and plausible letter, cleverly written. Conversion without conviction is a mere change and not conversion which is a revolution in one's life. You seem too to forget that equal respect implies respect for my own faith as much as for yours or any other neighbour's. My respect for my own faith forbids my being indifferent to my children abandoning their parents' faith without conviction. And I should have little respect for you, if you led my children astray by making all kinds of worldly promises in which matters of the spirit had no play.

HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Dr. Tara Chand, who has made a close study of the vexed question of the national language, recently wrote a Hindi letter to Shri Kakasaheb, from which the following important extracts are translated below:

"Hindustani and Brij were both colloquial languages at one time. What their status then was it is difficult to say. History only records that in the 12th century Saad Salman wrote a Divan in Hindi, but not a single poem of it has survived. Hindi or Hindustani made its first appearance in the 13th century, and its literature actually came into being in the 14th and 15th centuries in South India. Its language is the same as Khadi Boli (खड़ी बोली) and is the basis of modern Hindi. No writings in Brij are known to have appeared before the 16th century. In Prithviraj Raso there are some verses in this language, but when this work was written, especially the Brij portion of it, is not certain. Most persons attribute it to the 16th century.

"Rajasthani or Dingal was in vogue before Brij. The Raso is nearly all written in Dingal. Surdas was the first poet to write in Brij in the 16th century.

"The Muslims were the first to create literature in Hindustani. Their faqirs and saints used this language for their religious teachings and explained the principles of the Sufi religion in it also. Later, poets adopted it, and because Muslims used the language there came about a mixture of Persian and Hindi words. The sounds of Persian and Arabic letters also crept in which are not found in Brij but which have remained in Hindi up to date."

"The colloquial language which the Muslims employed is the language spoken even today round about Meerut and Delhi. It is termed Khadi Boli or Hindustani.

"Modern Hindustani, Hindi and Urdu are three forms of this language. Hindi and Urdu are its literary forms into which many Sanskrit and Persian and Arabic words have freely crept. Hindustani is that form of the language which includes both Sanskrit and Persian words. Writers of Hindustani lean towards one or the other according to their taste. But they try to avoid both as much as possible.

"In my opinion neither Hindi nor Urdu should be the lingua franca of India. Either we must agree to call Hindi the language of the Hindus and Urdu that of the Muslims, or we must try to make Hindustani the common language. So long as we call either Hindi or Urdu the national language we are certain to raise a controversy.

"I think you are on the right track. But truth is often not seen clearly because of prejudices. I should like you to save the country from going on the wrong path. The question of language involves the larger question of Swaraj."

AN ENGLISHMAN'S TRIBUTE

[In the course of a letter to me Verrier Elwin thus writes about Jamnalalji. M. D.]

"During the last few years I had seen very little of Jamnalalji though at one time we were very close together indeed, and I have never failed to think of him with love and gratitude. Only last week as we were walking over the sharp and rugged mountains of the Abujmar, one of the wildest places in India, I was telling a friend how ten years ago when I went to see Jamnalalji in jail at Dhulia I had been so shocked at finding him placed in the 'C' class that I had sworn to go barefoot (except in towns and cities where it would look conspicuous) as long as such things were possible in our country. I am still today having to go barefoot, and this single circumstance often served to remind me of my friend.

I remember, too, how when I had an operation in Bombay Jamnalalji, with all the burden of business and weight of administrative Congress duties upon his shoulders, came over to the hospital and sat beside me during the whole of the ordeal. They at first only gave me a local anaesthetic, and he was thus able to talk to me and distract my mind. I remember him again coming up to Karanja to see our work for the Gonds (and it was from the mouth of Jamnalalji in a motor car driving through the streets of Ahmedabad that I first heard the word 'Gond' which has come to mean so much to me later on) with Miss Muriel Lester and the lady who is now Mrs. Kripalani. I shall never forget the enthusiastic interest with which he examined everything, the generous and ready help that he gave when it was needed, and the remarkable sympathy and interest that he showed immediately into all our little problems.

In the old days, to visit Jamnalalji's simple little house in Wardha was a wonderful experience. Jamnalalji's own life never lost its simplicity, but when Wardha became a metropolis, naturally many other buildings and institutions sprang up and the others became crowded; but in 1931 and 1932 the note of simplicity and peace was as evident as in a sadhu's home. I think that only a very few Englishmen visited Wardha in those days, and Jamnalalji was never so well-known in England and America as some other Congress leaders, largely because of his unwillingness to talk much in English. I think that was a pity, for there was much in Jamnalalji to appeal strongly to the Western man. His simplicity and honour, his straightforwardness and plainness of speech (I remember him frequently rebuking me for saying 'thank you' so often, which, he said, I could not possibly mean), and his Quakerlike attitude to existence would have made a strong appeal. His devotion to truth was unique in a very rich man. You felt that every word he uttered was fit to be audited by a Chartered Accountant; you felt that all his emotions would balance properly and that his ideals would never show a deficit. I loved him very dearly, and now that he is gone, even though I had hardly seen him in the last few years, I feel a great gap. I realise, too, what a loss his genial, affectionate, generous and liberal presence must be to you all at Wardha and to the country. Please give my love and my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Bajaj and the other members of the family; and if you like to do anything else with this letter, you know you may do so."

INHUMAN IF TRUE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Honorary Secretary of the Social Service Department of the Marwari Relief Society writes:

"I have to place before you a very brief review of the activities of the Marwari Relief Society, Calcutta, in connection with rendering relief to evacuees from Burma and Malaya, absolutely irrespective of caste, creed and colour, and also to humbly seek your invaluable advice on a very grave matter. The Society has undertaken to provide food, medical aid, and facilities for repatriation to thousands of helpless refugees who are arriving in Calcutta daily by rail, road and sea. Several emergent cases of delivery have also been attended to. The Society is also trying to secure suitable jobs for unemployed evacuees with the kind co-operation of respectable local firms.

In this connection I beg to report a certain very regrettable incident to you, and shall be grateful if you kindly advise me as to my duties in the matter.

On the night of the 14th March, shortly after the arrival of the Chittagong Mail, as I, in company with a number of volunteers, was attending to the wants of the evacuees, a British Tommy got hold of a small child belonging to one of the poor evacuees and threw it under the train. Although I am a humble follower of your noble creed of non-violence, it was with the greatest difficulty that I restrained myself and my volunteers from punishing the soldier bodily for his brutal act. I reported the matter to the station military authorities, but their attitude was anything but sympathetic. I later approached Mr. K. C. Sen I. C. S. over the matter, and though he promised to duly enquire into the matter, nothing has been done as yet to rectify it. There are still large numbers of soldiers loitering about the platforms every night, and a violent clash between these soldiers and relief volunteers and the public is a possibility which has to be tackled in no time. I have already placed the matter before the Bengal Congress Civil Protection Committee.

I should be thankful, if you kindly advised me on the following points:

1. Should I start an agitation in the press over the matter?

2. Supposing a soldier behaves indecently towards a helpless female evacuee, are we to put up with it silently, or should the soldier be forcibly dealt with?

It would help us very greatly, if you kindly issued a statement in Harijan in this connection. I am prepared to accept all responsibility regarding the truthfulness of the above incident."

I have suppressed many letters giving me authentic details about the misbehaviour of soldiers. I have published them when it would have been wrong, if not cowardly, to suppress them. The letter in question demands, in my opinion, the widest publicity, not merely for the safety of the public but also for the sake of the soldiers and the Government. The Marwari Relief Society is a big philanthropic institution of twentyfive years' standing having an all-India reputation. It has funds and seasoned workers. Its prestige should have been enough security for the good behaviour of the soldiers in the presence of its workers. The soldier must have run amuck or been under the influence of drink to have behaved as he is reported to have done. I trust that the Marwari Relief Society will not leave the matter till it is thoroughly thrashed out; and I trust too that the authorities will not wish to hush up the matter but will make ample amends, if the case is proved as reported by my correspondent.

So much for the case itself. The correspondent desires my guidance about similar cases in future. The action of himsa or ahimsa would have been identical. The volunteers should have, if they could, bodily prevented the soldier from touching the child or snatched the child from him, even if the soldier had been hurt in the act of preventing or snatching. The proceedings after the delivery of the child or the failure of the attempt would vary according as the deliverers were actuated violently or non-violently. Non-violent behaviour would dictate generous and gentle behaviour towards the culprit. But generosity and gentleness would have to be thoughtful and reasoned. It is difficult to lay down in advance the rule of conduct applicable in all cases. I can say this much that a truly generous act demands sincere recognition on the part of the culprit. I have known instances of Africans in South Africa insulted at railway stations saying to the rude white men, "My brother, God will forgive you for your rudeness," and the white men giggling, if not adding injury to insult. In similar circumstances I have myself remained silent and suffered the insult. I am quite clear that the Africans' so-called generosity was a mere mechanical act justly evoking derision. Mine was timidity. I did not wish to evoke further insult. I certainly did not want to take legal proceedings. I was trying then to shape my non-violent conduct. If I had had the real courage, I would have expostulated with the insulters and risked the worst.

I have interpolated an examination of so-called non-violent conduct in cases of personal insult or injury. What about the child injured or the injury imagined by my correspondent? I think non-violent conduct would not, should not, be different. The distinction that is often drawn between personal injury and injury done to wards is unjustified, if not wrong. A man is not expected to do more for his wards than he would for himself. He would no doubt sacrifice himself for his ward's honour.

but he would be expected to do likewise for his own. If he did otherwise, he would be voted a coward and is not likely to protect his ward's honour, if he is not able to protect his own. But I own that correct non-violent conduct does not come through mere reasoning. Reason is a necessary preliminary. But correctness of conduct will come only through repeated practice, maybe even repeated failures.

What violent conduct should be surely needs no examination.

THE ANDHRAS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The following has been sent to me by Maharaj Kumar Vijaya Anand of Vizianagram :

"There is a strong feeling amongst us Andhras that you do not like us, that you are against the formation and the establishment of a separate province. Despite Andhra Desh being overwhelmingly Congress, it never received your blessings. If three crores of yearning hearts are asking for a separate existence, would you not allow them the 'right to sin' as the great Tilak Maharaj once said? People of my Desh are so definite about your dislike for the Andhras that they even attribute your visit to Benares recently for the purpose of commanding me to drop the Andhra agitation. The Andhras would like to know whether you ever gave any advice to Tamil Nad regarding Andhras, and also wish to know whether during the last ministry the Andhra question was referred to you or not; if so, what advice did you give them? Do you put the Andhra question on the same footing as that of Karnatak and Kerala whose revenues may not be enough to have separate provinces? Pray, what is your opinion regarding Andhra Desh being self-supporting? Is it not a fact that, owing to steadfast loyalty of the Andhras to the Congress movement, they did not achieve what Orissa did? It is felt that, had the Andhras taken a different line of action when the Simon Commission came to India, they would have got their hearts' desire."

I can only say that the Maharaj Kumar is in bad hands. Being a novice in the art of handling masses, he has evidently not taken care to inquire into the credentials of his informants. I should like to know the Andhras who have given him the information which he has chosen to transmit to me. I am not a stranger to Andhra Desh myself. I refer the Maharaj Kumar to Deshbhakta Konda Venkatappayya, Shri Prakasam, Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, Shri Kaleshwar Rao and Shri Sitaram Sastry. They will probably bear witness to the fact that I was principally instrumental in securing from the Congress the recognition of the redistribution of the Provinces for Congress purposes on a linguistic basis. I have always agitated for the acceptance by the Government of such redistribution. I have indeed advised Tamil Nad, when such advice was needed, not to resist the Andhra demand. I know that the Congress ministry headed by Shri C. Rajagopalachari tried its best to get Andhra recognised as a separate province, and it was no fault of the ministry that Andhra Desh has not yet been so recognised. But it is true that I recognise no distinction between Karnatak, Kerala and Andhra or for that matter any other province recognised by the Congress as a separate province. I do not know enough about any province to be able to say which can be self-supporting on being recognised as separate. As to my visit to Benares, the purpose is too well known to need any clarification. The Maharaj Kumar is a sportsman, and he should be above worrying about baseless suggestions made about him. He would be an unworthy leader who can be deflected from his mission even by a Mahatma. I hope this answer will satisfy the Maharaj Kumar, if not even those who duped him into putting the questions he has.

THE RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENCE

(By K. G. Mashruwala)

Is a member of a Shanti Dal (Peace Brigade), by reason of the creed of non-violence, precluded from exercising his legal right to use violence in self-defence?

This question is raised, firstly when one does not perceive the difference between individual and collective violence, and secondly when one is not clear about the exact position which he, as an individual, chooses to take up in the task of advancing and perfecting the technique of non-violent resistance.

On the first point, the imperfections of human character will always give rise to acts of individual violence either deliberately or on sudden provocation. In such cases, until a fairly certain non-violent method of self-defence is discovered and made known to everyone, a spirited man will always resist the aggressor with counter-violence. This will take place even amongst such fully pledged disciples of non-violence as monks, sadhus, and the like. So again, not only children will fight with one another, but even parents and children, husband and wife, and blood brothers will sometimes abuse, beat and even go to the extent of committing murder. Even in a predominantly non-violent society we shall have such happenings amongst peaceful citizens, even as we hear of motor car accidents. As usual, the cause of quarrel will be generally property, sex, or petty selfishness in the enjoyment of common comforts. On such occasions there will be at times a combination of several individuals also. This combination may be premeditated or accidental. If it is the former, it is organised, and is not covered by the 'legal' right of self-defence. Even where arms and military training are given to every person, citizens are not allowed to organise themselves in a body, except under the control of the State.

Thus there is a difference between individual violence, collective unpremeditated (and so, unorganised) violence (such as by a mob), and collective organised violence, as by a trained body of goondas, dacoits, volunteers, policemen or soldiers.

In the suggested organisation of Shanti Dals (Peace Brigades) the problem of violence and right of self-defence by individuals cannot arise. They are concerned with the problem of organising collective protection of citizens against the violence of unsocial elements. And the principle laid down is that the Shanti Dals must not meet this violence by organised counter violence.

The personal right of self-defence is here not touched. But it does not follow that an individual may not choose to forego that right. The Shanti Dal is an entirely new type of organisation. Its purpose is to perfect a new method of counteracting violence by adopting its opposite. There will be two types of men amongst its members. They may be either members of a militia or a non-violent corps. Members of the latter, though not bound in rule, will not use violence even in self-defence, as that will interfere with the development of the new technique. If an engineer is studying the problem of friction in his factory, he will not be heedless of that factor in his private laboratory. So, too, an individual member of a peace brigade. He will rather court risk of defeat through non-violence than achieve an apparent success through violence. It is for each individual member to choose which place he would like to fill in the peace organisation.

The same considerations incidentally dispose of the question whether a votary of non-violence may not also help the organisation of a corps, not pledged to non-violence, if the latter seeks his guidance. It is clear that he can do so only at the risk of defeating his own objective.

COW'S MILK FOR LEPERS

[ Dr. Santra is an authority on leprosy. What he says should carry weight. Apart from my views on the cow, the medical profession owes a duty to the country to discover the relative values of different milks.

Sevagram, 23-3-42

M. K. G.]

"Recently I was in Bajajwadi in connection with work at the Maharogi Seva Mandal. During my spare hours I visited places of activities at Maganwadi, Nalwadi and Mahila Ashram, etc.

I bought some pamphlets and reports, and it was very pleasing to read what you said on the 30th September, 1941. You said, 'Fundamentally by protecting the cow we realise our duty towards all living beings, but having reduced cow service to a farce we have forgotten our real duty.'

Some fifteen years back when most of my evenings were spent in villages giving magic lantern lectures on leprosy, I laid particular stress on the protection of the cow while explaining the effect of milk on leprosy. I told people that, if we have more leprosy, it is because of the fact that we have ill-treated the cow which was supposed to be a goddess but was the most neglected, and therefore God punished us with leprosy.

It might appear to be a sentiment or a religious mania. I cannot offer scientific argument in favour of the theory that protection of the cow will protect us from leprosy; but there are indications that the use of milk reduces the virulence of leprosy.

In the last century a Sikh Baba got the reputation of curing leprosy at Sitalani in the Amritsar district. This reputation reached the ears of the Government, and the popular belief regarding the cure was so strong that the Government instituted an enquiry. The Civil Surgeon of Amritsar visited Sitalani and reported that the reported improvement was true, and that it was due not to any secret remedy but to the inclusion of a liberal amount of milk in the diet of the lepers who came to stay there.

Dr. Muir, the father of anti-leprosy campaign in India, advised that lepers should take two seers of milk a day. The propaganda leaflets that he prepared had the picture of a cow, and he advocated the use of cows' milk.

In recent days Dr. Cochrane of South India found that children having a malignant type of leprosy became benign more quickly when they got skimmed milk in addition to treatment. He would have done a great service, if he had obtained the milk locally rather than getting the powder from foreign countries. That would have given an opportunity to the lepers to do goseva and provide manure for the kitchen gardens. Some time back it was claimed that vitamin A produced changes in leprosy toward good. We know that cows' milk, specially of those who feed on green grass, is very rich in vitamin A. Thus we have some scientific indication that the use of cows' milk will decrease the virulence of leprosy. When it becomes benign, the disease being unable to propagate itself, the number of lepers will naturally decrease.

To my mind today a leper in India is neglected as much as, or more than, our cows. They are not dumb like the cows, but they have not organised any association through which they could speak their mind. The care of the leper like the care of the cow was a part of Indian culture. Even today daily meals for lepers at the local leper asylums at Deoghar and Puri are supplied by the temple authorities. In South India there are temples where there is a special place for a leper to live. Their food is supplied by the temple authorities. Customs like this might have originated from the time when Manu laid down laws for the conduct of lepers. He advised them to leave their homes and spend the remaining part of their life at holy places. I met Shastriji (who is a case) of Sevagram and requested him to study the status of lepers in our old shastras.

Today our culture might have been rendered weak but it has not vanished. The protection of the cow and eradication of leprosy will progress in proportion to the effort we make to revive our old culture. They should have their place in the national planning of our country."

LOVE OF ONE'S OWN LANGUAGE

I

In his pamphlet on the Constructive Programme, referring to our indifference to and disregard for our indigenous languages, Gandhiji has cited, by way of contrast, the examples of Japan and the Chinese Generalissimo, Marshal Chiang Kai-shek. A few facts about both of these are given below in the hope that they will interest the reader.

The Japanese language is very difficult to learn. "A child should learn about 3,000 different characters by the time he is ten or twelve; he must know about 5,000 to read a newspaper intelligently. These characters are Chinese, but the language is different." The efforts of the Japanese to simplify interpretation of the Chinese characters have only made Japanese "by all odds the most formidable tongue in the world", says John Gunther. But the Japanese have neither given up their language nor do they think of Romanising their script. All their education is given through their own tongue, and yet "Japan has a record in education that no Oriental country can remotely match." Japanese literacy is 95% as compared with less than 15% in India and 10% in China.

The Japanese Emperor, Hirohito, is a man of wide culture and the first Japanese Emperor to travel abroad. He prefers, though he knows a little English and French, to use his own tongue, Japanese, while speaking to foreigners. "One discovers soon," says Gunther, "that Tokyo, for all its modernity, is the hardest of the great eastern capitals to get around in. This is largely because a recent Home Minister . . . abolished foreign language street signs. . . Later when tourists became hopelessly confused, some English signs were permitted to reappear at railway stations." The authorities frown even on such semi-English expressions among Japanese as "Papa-san" which children use for father.

The Chinese language is perhaps no less difficult than the Japanese. Yet the Chinese have not given it up. They are now trying to evolve a simple variant of it in order to make it easier for the masses to learn. Though pronunciations differ widely from province to province, the written language is the same throughout China, and "the uniform written language has played a colossal role in keeping China together."

The love of one's language is shared in an eminent degree by the Generalissimo, Marshal Chiang Kai-shek. When the Generalissimo and the Madame meet a foreign visitor, she interprets for him since his only foreign language is Japanese. Here is one of the makers of modern China, one whom Gunther describes as "probably the strongest Chinese individual since the third century B. C. when the Great Wall was built", feeling no sense of shame because he cannot talk in any language other than his own. Gunther also reports that the Marshal was responsible for the removal of English road signs in China. The Marshal's insistence on the use of his own tongue is shared by some of his most prominent associates like General Chan Cheng who is reputed to be the choice of Chiang Kai-shek as his successor.

II*

Let us now turn to Western Asia. It has been a characteristic common to all nationalist movements of modern times that the resurgence of the national spirit has been accompanied by a linguistic revival. Arabic was the predominant language of Western Asia, being the language of the Koran, and was the common bond that united all sects of Islam. It was also the mother-tongue of the populations inhabiting Arabia, Syria, Egypt and some other territories. Syria was the first to "awaken to the idea of nationalism in its modern form . . . Like European nationalism, Arab Syrian national consciousness had its origin in a literary renaissance. The ancient, classical language and the poetical and philosophical works written in it were studied: new life and a spirit of romance were breathed into the old, traditional subjects: the speech which for decades had only been current among the people or used for theological disquisitions was raised once more to the dignity of a modern literary language by the creation of a new terminology: foreign classics were translated, and finally the new knowledge was sifted and collected in great encyclopaedias and dictionaries." The linguistic revival made rapid strides in subsequent years. The most remarkable fact emerging from this movement was the determination of the educated ones — both Arabs and Christians — to refashion and develop their own mother-tongue in order to make it an efficient vehicle of modern thought and science, and their insistence throughout on making it a medium of instruction instead of adopting a foreign tongue for the purpose.

In the first decade of the present century, when attempts were made by the Turkish rulers to force the Arabian provinces to adopt Turkish customs and to suppress Arabic even in the schools, Arabic national sentiment rose in revolt which spread even to Mesopotamia hitherto less advanced than Syria. Among the demands made by the Syrian Arabs from the Turkish rulers were these: "Arabic was to be recognised as the official language in the provincial administration and courts of law; Civil servants were to know Arabic; European experts employed to reorganise the administration were to sign a 15 year contract and were to know either Arabic or Turkish."

In Egypt, where the people's language was Arabic, the people had to struggle for years to get the English rulers to make adequate provision for the teaching of Arabic and adopt the people's language as the medium of instruction in schools. The national leaders, however, carried on the political education of the masses through papers conducted in Arabic and acquired, in the meanwhile, a remarkable hold on them.

John Gunther, writing in 1938 about the regime of Reza Shah Pahlevi in Iran, says that "only Persian characters may be used in street signs and the like. Name-plates of foreigners in Teheran will be torn from the doors unless they are in Persian. Even kilometre posts along the roads are painted with Arabic numerals which are quite different from the English numerals." It is necessary to note that the national language which was thus fostered and encouraged not only did not prove a barrier to the progress that Iran made in recent years but the message of reform and enlightenment perhaps reached the masses more easily because of its being conveyed in their own language.

III

The brotherhood of Islam included many nations. In several of these countries nationalist movements often began with an effort to break away from the common religious language. In Morocco, for example, "as early as the 12th century Ibn Tumart, who was champion of Berber nationalism, translated the Koran into Berber and had the call to prayer proclaimed in Berber instead of Arabic." Turkey of the eighteen-fifties seems to have taken the lead in the movement, inspired by the liberal sentiment that was aroused in the wake of the Crimean War. The Edict promulgated by the Sultan in 1856 breathed a new spirit of liberalism. Till 1860 literary Turkish had been a highly artificial language made up of Persian and Arabic words and turns of speech. The people could not understand it. With the growth of the nationalist sentiment there grew up also "a new unaffected and natural language akin to the vernacular". Shinasi Effendi was the father of the new language, which he was the first to use in translations and his newspapers. Turkey woke up from her torpor. A similar movement was afoot amongst the Russian Tatars of Crimea and the Volga who wanted to substitute "the Russian alphabet for the Arabic" in the Turco-Tatar language and replace all Arabian and Persian words by words of pure Turkish derivation."

There are a few States belonging to people of non-Russian Asiatic origin within the U. S. S. R. Be it said to the credit of the latter that the peoples within its borders are allowed "to lead a national life of their own and to develop their own language and traditions. In every small autonomous republic or territory the vernacular was the official language and became thus a written, literary language." In the province of Turkistan, inhabited largely by Muslims, the indigenous language is used as the medium of instruction, and these local tongues are coming into general use and beginning to oust Russian as official languages. Even Afghanistan, without adopting English or any other Western language as the medium of instruction, achieved remarkable results. The progress made in education, the London Times (1929) declares, can hardly be described as other than astonishing.

Hebrew is now the language of the Palestinian Jews not only in schools and colleges but in all cultural and social activity, having completely replaced Arabic.

IV

Europe has not been free from this universal process, and the national upheavals there, which preceded those in Asia, had this one feature common to all. The struggle of the Irish nation, to cite but one instance out of several, for establishing its birthright of using its own national language in all spheres of life, is a glorious episode in the history of humanity's fight for freedom. Even the Englishmen's love for their own language and the devoted labours of generations of them to enrich it provide an object-lesson to us. And it was a German lexicographer, Jakob Grimm, who, in his introduction to the German dictionary, wrote thus: "German fellow countrymen, whatever your political allegiance, whatever your religious faith, enter the portals of your ancient hereditary language that stands open to you all, learn it and hold it sacred and cleave to it. Your national vigour and survival depend upon it."

In none of the countries mentioned has education suffered a setback because it did not adopt a foreign language as the medium of instruction, nor has any of them found it an impediment in their self-expression. What Gandhiji has been saying on the subject is, as is evident from the foregoing facts, wholly in consonance with experience and entirely in keeping with the spirit of the times. Indeed the national awakening in its many aspects penetrated the masses of our country only after, and in so far as, the Congress adopted the national language or the provincial languages in the conduct of its affairs and succeeded in popularising the use of the latter in the provinces.

A COMPLETE VINDICATION

A most important item on the constructive programme of the Congress, ever since its adoption of non-cooperation in 1920, was total prohibition of intoxicating drugs and drinks. In pursuance of this programme, peaceful persuasion of addicts and peaceful picketing of liquor shops was undertaken by Congressmen and Congresswomen throughout India, and thousands suffered imprisonment and sustained physical injury in furtherance of the cause. Therefore when the Congress accepted office in 1937 the Working Committee were none too hasty in advising the Ministries that it was "incumbent on them to work to this end", and expected them "to bring about total prohibition in their respective provinces in three years." The Committee even appealed "to the ministers in other provinces and to the Indian States also to adopt this programme of moral and social uplift of the people."

Three provinces — Madras, Bombay, Bihar — took up the work in right earnest. The masses hailed the programme and legislation with delight. Madras was the first to begin, Rajaji bringing in a Bill within three months of assuming responsibility. Bombay followed the lead within a few months, making even a bolder experiment by introducing prohibition in the premier industrial cities of Bombay and Ahmedabad. There was strong opposition in Bombay by the vested interests, though the legislation was cautious to a degree, and was in no way as thoroughgoing as the prohibition legislation in the United States. There were permits for Europeans and addicts, and the whole objective was the moral and social uplift of the masses, especially the working classes.

Whereas Madras had an Act, Bombay took a short cut by issuing notifications under section 14 B (2) of the old Bombay Abkari Act of 1878. This Act already contained specific provisions authorising Government to prohibit entirely the possession of intoxicants by "a person or a class of persons". The notifications of 1938 applying prohibition to Ahmedabad and Bombay did not go beyond these provisions, excepting in the extent of their application.

There were prosecutions against those who infringed the law, an accused in Ahmedabad being convicted, and the accused in three cases in Bombay being acquitted. The Government filed appeals against these acquittals, and the convicted man filed an appeal against his conviction. All these appeals came in for hearing on the 10th of April 1940, and a special Bench consisting of five judges heard the appeal. The special Bench held that

1. The notifications were ultra vires;
2. Whereas the notification could be issued with respect to "a person or a class of persons", the Government had no power to apply it to the public generally;

3. Power to control or regulate the trade was conferred on the executive, but it was never intended to authorise "the introduction of total prohibition of intoxicants as a measure of social reform".

The judgment delivered by the Chief Justice went even further than the bare interpretation of the law. It was a specious plea for the vested interests. The Chief Justice observed that, if the words "any person or class of persons" were held to include "the public generally", the construction "would place it in the power of the Government of the day not only to bring the whole administration of the Abkari Act to an end, but by a stroke of the pen, without any warning or the provision of any compensation, to destroy the value of businesses built up, it may be, over many years and with the expenditure of much capital in reliance of the continuance of Government policy under the Abkari Act."

The Chief Justice used an argument which upheld a trade which, to use Gladstone's words, has wrought more ruin (he was talking of England) than war, famine and pestilence put together. It is common knowledge that those who had invested capital in the liquor trade had done so in spite of the warning of 20 years. If as a result of the 20 years' work there was voluntary abstinence from drink on a vast scale, whom would the liquor dealers or the Chief Justice have held to blame?

II

But the decision of the Bombay High Court went even further to undo the work of the Ministry as we shall presently see. In order to remedy the effect of the special Bench decision, the Bombay Government immediately brought in a remedying legislation, viz. the Bombay Abkari Act of 1940, validating the notification and removing all doubts as to the purpose of the legislation, viz. promoting, enforcing and carrying into effect the policy of prohibition. This Act, in its turn, soon came in for judicial interpretation. The Presidency Magistrate, before whom a person in possession of country liquor was brought for trial, referred two questions to the High Court: (1) Has the Provincial Legislature power under item 31 of List II of the 7th Schedule of the Government of India Act of 1935 to pass a law of which the object is to introduce a policy of total prohibition? (2) In the event of the question being answered in the affirmative, whether there is in existence any effective notification under section 14 B (2) of the Bombay Abkari Act of 1878 absolutely prohibiting the possession of intoxicants by persons generally in the city of Bombay.

The High Court on this reference held that the Amending Act went beyond the powers of the provincial legislature, and that it would not affect the notifications already declared invalid. The Government thereupon applied for a certificate under section 205 of the Government of India Act to enable the Government to appeal to the Federal Court. The High Court refused to grant this certificate on the ground that no question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution Act was involved in the case.

Prohibition was thus given a decent burial, and an effective step was taken to prevent its resurrection.

III

Not so, however, in Bihar. The Bihar legislation was also on the lines of the Bombay legislation. Prohibition was introduced by a notification of March 26th 1939 issued under a sub-section of the old Bihar and Orissa Excise Act. There was a prosecution and conviction under this notification; as in Bombay; also an appeal to the High Court, and the decision by the High Court that the Provincial Government had no power to make a notification prohibiting the public generally from possessing intoxicating liquor. As in Bombay, again, the Governor of Bihar enacted a Governor's Act amending the preamble of the original Act, so as to bring in prohibition within its scope, and also amending section 19 (4) of the old Act so as to include, under "any person or class of persons", all persons in Bihar or in any specified area. There was a fresh notification in terms of this Governor's Act; a prosecution under it, an acquittal, but, unlike Bombay, a reversal of the order of acquittal by the High Court who held that "in view of the Amending Act the appellant had no defence in law."

It was against this order of the High Court that the convicted man appealed to the Federal Court. Chief Justice Sir Maurice Gwyer's judgment, delivered a short while ago, upheld the order of the High Court, and in the course of a lucid analysis of the whole question it discussed and disposed of effectively practically all the questions raised in the Bombay province, and completely vindicates the action of the Congress Ministries both in Bombay and Bihar. The Chief Justice, without expressing any opinion on the two judgments of the Bombay High Court and the Patna High Court which questioned the validity of the notifications, held that the Legislatures were competent to issue the notifications they did, and that the view which influenced both the courts that the old Acts were merely revenue or excise Acts and not meant for promoting a policy of total or partial prohibition, was wrong:

"There is no reason in theory or principle why an Excise Act should not have a double object, the benefit of the revenue and the improvement of public health or morals by a greater control of the liquor trade; the Licensing Acts in England are an example. We find it not easy to understand the purpose or object of section 19 (4), if it were not intended for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance, whether by means of the policy which used to be known as local option or by means of total prohibition; and its appearance on the statute book in so many provinces in the course of the same generation is a proof that temperance doctrines were, as indeed is common knowledge, attracting public notice at that period over a considerable part of India. The only novelty about more recent legislation is that it goes further and is more radical in character."

The Chief Justice also disposed of the argument about the loss resulting to the liquor dealers, which argument was only "faintly suggested" by the counsel for the Bihar appellant, but was made much of by the Chief Justice of Bombay:

"It was faintly suggested that, in the absence of any provision for compensating those whose livelihood might be taken away by the enactment of prohibition, it ought to be assumed that the Legislatures had not been given power to enact it. Where a statute is ambiguous, the presumption that a Legislature does not intend to interfere with vested rights is no doubt reinforced by the absence of provisions for compensation; but where the language is clear and there is no ambiguity, as we hold to be the case here, there is no room for such arguments."

One would have thought that there should have been no doubt about the interpretation of entry No. 31, which sets out the matters about which a Provincial Legislature is empowered to legislate:

"Intoxicating liquors and narcotic drugs, that is to say, the production, manufacture, possession, transport, purchase and sale of intoxicating liquors, opium and other narcotic drugs."

But much argument was expended to show that this gave no power to the provincial legislatures to introduce total or partial prohibition. On this point the Chief Justice, who characterised the argument as "bold", has clearly held that "A power to legislate" with respect to intoxicating liquors "could not well be expressed in wider terms, and would, in our opinion, unless the meaning of the words used is restricted or controlled by the context or by other provisions in the Act, undoubtedly include the power to prohibit intoxicating liquors throughout the Province or in any specified part of the Province." Also: "A power to regulate does not include a power to prohibit, but since neither the word 'regulation' itself nor any other comparable expression appears in entry No. 31, it does not appear necessary to pursue the argument further."

There is another aspect which, it is gratifying to note, has not escaped the learned Chief Justice's attention. If the great Reforms introduced in 1935 which transferred certain departments to the Provincial Legislatures had any value, it was this that the people's representatives were given the fullest liberty to legislate for their moral and social well-being. Entry No. 31 could have no other meaning, and if it was held, as the Bombay High Court held, to have a narrow meaning, the little value that the Reforms had would be gone, and the Reforms would be reduced to a mockery. The Chief Justice did not say so in so many words, but his meaning is clear beyond the shadow of a doubt:

"We must again refer to the fundamental proposition enunciated in The Queen v. Burah that Indian Legislatures within their own sphere have plenary powers of legislation as large and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself. If that was true in 1878, it cannot be less true in 1942. Every intendment ought, therefore, to be made in favour of a Legislature which is exercising the powers conferred on it. Its enactments ought not to be subjected to the minute scrutiny which may be appropriate to an examination of the bye-laws of a body exercising only delegated powers, nor is the generality of its powers to legislate on a particular subject to be cut down by the arbitrary introduction of far-fetched and impertinent limitations." (Italics mine)

IV

This weighty judgment has far-reaching importance. It validates prohibition to the extent it was introduced in Bihar. But what about Bombay? In Bombay anarchy prevails. The Government of India cannot legislate on a provincial matter, and the Bombay High Court decisions which still stand have deprived the Governor and the legislature of the power to legislate in the matter of prohibition. Does the Federal Chief Justice's decision validate the Bombay Governor's Act of 1940 and resurrect prohibition? The criticism made by certain legal luminaries, after the Bombay High Court's decisions, that the Congress Governments had, in their zeal for reform, driven a coach and four through all principles of law, is now dispelled by the Federal Court's judgment. There must be a way found whereby the good work done by the Congress Government, which "by a stroke of the pen" was ruined by the Bombay High Court decisions, can be revived.

A POSER

An esteemed friend writes:

"Recently, under the caption 'Criminal Assaults', Gandhiji advised women at the mercy of ravishers to use nails and teeth when non-violence had failed. In the current Harijan similar precepts are taught. If the non-violent way is not clear, Gandhiji recommends organisation for armed defence against robbers and dacoits. Again, the work has perforce to be done by the evacuees violently, non-violently, or both ways. Am I incurably stupid at some point in the reasoning? Can this be the deliberate teaching of the apostle of non-violence? Is ahimsa only the preferable of two legitimate courses, the one which has the right of prior trial but may properly be abandoned as soon as its inadequacy is perceptible? Time was when I understood himsa to be the antithesis of ahimsa, to be abhorred as much as the other was to be worshipped; the one was away from God, the other towards Him."

Himsa is certainly the antithesis of ahimsa, as much as untruth of truth; and for him or her who is wedded to ahimsa as a faith there is nothing higher than ahimsa which must be adhered to at all costs. For him or her ahimsa is the only way towards God, himsa away from Him.

The precept that my friend has facilely tried to reduce to an absurdity is addressed not to those who have unflinching faith in ahimsa but to those who are vacillating or in doubt, or who would fain take to their heels in the name of ahimsa. To these Gandhiji has always said: Ahimsa or himsa, but no cowardice. Let me remind the friend that what Gandhiji has been saying now was said in identical language twenty years ago.

Having said this, I would invite the friend's attention to Hindu moral philosophy. In the ultimate analysis everything but Truth is relative, and the distinction between ahimsa and himsa is relative, not the absolute distinction between Truth and untruth. Hindu moral philosophy—Gita ethics—posits three gunas, Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas, and declares that there is no being in the three worlds that is free from the three gunas—in a greater or less degree. A man of sattwa guna is predominantly sattvika, but he has a certain amount of rajas and tamas in him. The Gita goes even further and classifies even virtues like tapas (penance), yajna (sacrifice), danam (charity) into the three categories sattvika, rajas and tamas. Sattvika has to be worshipped in preference to the rajas and tamas which last is to be abhorred, but everyone and everything earthly cannot but manifest in himself or itself the three gunas in a greater or less degree. The only one who transcends the three gunas is He. Ahimsa belongs to the sattvika category, himsa belongs to the rajas category, and cowardice belongs to the tamas category. Fearlessness, which may express itself in ahimsa or himsa according as a person is sattvika or rajasa, is the antithesis of cowardice. The one is the attribute of the brave, the other brings down man from man's estate. That is why cowardice has to be shunned at all costs.

A YOUNG CANADIAN'S QUESTION

(By M. K. Gandhi)

From my American post I pick up the following typical letter from Vancouver:

"I cannot truthfully say that I am an advocate of your 'India for the Indians' policy, but I have read your article in Liberty magazine and followed newspaper accounts of your illustrious life. I say 'illustrious' not in the sense of the mighty heads of Europe but of a man who is truly attempting to better his own people, not to perpetrate his personal fancies. I knew, of course, that your principles constitute a return of India to village industry and more international economic co-operation and goodwill towards men, but I should like to know just what stand your new democracy would take in world politics. The small countries of Europe thought that they would keep their finger out of the pie, as the saying goes, but look where they are now. I should like to know from the pen of the spiritual leader of India himself what the Government's attitude towards resident Britons would be and if British and other foreign trading firms would be allowed. Would the new Government of India follow the policies of Japan until Admiral Perry and the United States fleet entered the harbour of Yokohama in 1853? That is, would foreigners and foreign trade be excluded?"

I hope that you will pardon the intrusion of a young Canadian who wishes to more fully understand the problems of your country."

Denuded of the courtesies, the writer's straight question is, "Will there be room for Britishers and foreigners in free India?" The question should have nothing to do with my spirituality supposed or real. It does not arise for free America or free Britain. And it will not arise when India becomes really free. For, India will then be free to do what she likes, without let or hindrance from anybody. But it is pleasing to speculate what India would do if she becomes free, as she must sooner or later. If I have any influence over her policies, foreigners will be welcome, provided their presence is beneficial to the country. They will never be allowed to exploit and impoverish the country as they have done hitherto.

What free India will otherwise look like remains to be seen. She has nothing to fear from the contemplation of the helplessness of the small nations of Europe, if she continues to tread the non-violent course she has done with more or less perfection and with more or less success. For a non-violent State bigness is wholly unnecessary for its protection against aggression. Such a State will need spend nothing for protection against aggression from without. Whether such a State will ever come into being is a fair question to ask. Reason suggests no flaw in the theoretical conception of it. Whether human nature will respond to what has been called an exacting call is another question. It has been known in individual cases to rise to unimaginable heights. There is nothing to prevent its multiplication by patient endeavour. Anyway I am not going to lose my faith and abandon the attempt because I can show no visible sign of such a response from India. One might as well abandon all hope, as some have done, for the attainment of India's unadulterated freedom. For they say, it will take centuries for India, which is largely and wholly unarmed, to become a military nation. I refuse to be prey to such despair. In the ringing words of Lokamanya, "Freedom is India's birthright, and she will have it cost what it may." Glory lies in the attempt to reach one's goal and not in reaching it. I passionately believe in the possibility of attainment through the perfection of the non-violent technique whose hidden resources no one has fathomed. We have only found a foothold. Perseverance opens up treasures which bring perennial joy. If the toil is great, so is the fruit thereof.

Scorched Earth

From the well-reasoned press statement of Shri Gaganvihari L. Mehta, President of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry, I give below the following important extracts:

"It should be pointed out that economic relationships are so close, complex and delicate that it would be impossible to demolish important industries or plants without grave repercussions on the economic fabric and life of the country. For example, if industrial plants like those of jute, cotton or sugar are destroyed, they will take years to be rebuilt even after the war and, meanwhile, not merely the owners of the factories but also the cultivators of these commodities, the industrial workers as well as those engaged in ancillary and subsidiary industries, trades and occupations would all suffer. Such demolition of industries built up after years of struggle at large expense and often against heavy odds will cause economic dislocation and disorganisation altogether disproportionate to any benefits secured as a measure of war.

After the grossly discriminating treatment which has been admittedly meted out to Indian evacuees in Malaya and Burma, the Indian commercial community and the public naturally have apprehensions as to the manner in which such a vital policy as that of scorched earth would be carried out in practice. The representatives of the people of this country have had no voice whatever in the formulation and execution of the defence policy of the country so that the people have no means of determining whether the heavy sacrifices entailed in any policy such as that of scorched earth is justified in any particular situation."

Scorched earth policy is a self-defeating measure. Time will show how true this remark is.

Caveeshar

Lala Dunichand of Amballa writes:

"I have been asked by the dear and near ones of S. Sardul Singh Caveeshar, who is being detained without trial, to write this letter to you. Since his arrest about a fortnight ago, he is being detained inside the Lahore Fort, and he is not being allowed to have any kind of contact with his relations and friends. Authorities have been repeatedly approached for an interview with him, but the request has been flatly refused. I and a few other M. L. A.s wanted to see Mr. Wace, D. I. G. Police (C. I. D.), with a view to put his case before him for proper treatment, but he peremptorily refused to see us in this connection. I am reliably informed that S. Caveeshar is being kept by himself in a cell, and this amounts to solitary confinement. He is not being allowed even those few facilities such as newspapers, correspondence, etc., which other detainees enjoy. The fact that he had been suffering from fever for a long time at the time of his arrest adds poignancy to his case. Other detainees of similar position such as Babu Sarat Chandra Bose and others are being treated properly."

One can understand detention, in these times, of persons who are suspected of complicity with the Japanese. Therefore, in spite of my having receiving angry letters, I have observed silence about Sarat Babu's detention though I have felt keenly about it. There was no question of his ill-treatment. Sardar Sardul Singh's is a different case, if what Lala Dunichand says is true. There can be no cause for the ill-treatment of any prisoner, no matter what his offence is. Caveeshar is detained on mere suspicion. The public know nothing about the evidence against him. In war times it is difficult to demand an open trial or even disclosure of evidence in certain cases. All the greater, therefore, is the reason for the special treatment of such prisoners. I hope that Caveeshar's case will receive the attention of the authorities concerned and all cause for complaint will be removed.

Praja Mandals and Congress

Thus writes a correspondent from an Indian State:

"On page 67 of Harijan (of March 8, 1942) there is a question which is of great interest and importance to Praja Mandals in Indian States. The latter part of the question is, 'Who should be responsible for political policies there (in States)?' I am afraid that the answer does not sufficiently clear the position. From what appeared in this connection in Harijan before, and from the present answer, in an indirect way, it seems that you wish the Praja Mandals to be responsible for the political policy in the States concerned. It would follow that the local branch of the Congress would not independently initiate any political policy or come into conflict with the policy of the local Praja Mandal."

I think there was no confusion about my answer. The Congress organisation has its centre and chief work in British India. It has branches in some States. They are not expected to dabble in local politics. They are, therefore, advised to confine themselves to constructive work. But Praja Mandals have to do constructive work always, and political work properly so called wherever it is allowed or where there are brave and able enough men to carry on the political struggle. It is thus purely a question of local ability and opportunity. At the present moment when everything is in the melting pot, no heroics in politics are called for in the States.

Stopping Animal Sacrifice

A Belgaum correspondent writes:

"The Marikamba Fair which is being generally held at Sirsi is one of the biggest in the Bombay Province. The Sirsi temple is well known in this part and has a huge income which is utilised for various purposes by donating a high school, a maternity hospital, etc. This was the first temple in the Province which opened its doors to Harijans when your Harijan campaign began. You asked the people not to kill the buffalo, sheep or hens in the name of religion, and had said that such a temple did not deserve support. Your speech had its effect on the public. Shri S. N. Keshwain, M. L. A., President Canara District Harijan Sevak Sangh and one of the trustees of the temple, was responsible for stopping the killing of buffaloes a few years back. This year he was responsible for stopping the killing of sheep and hens at the recent Mari Fair. Thus the lives of about ten thousand sheep and fifteen thousand hens were saved, for which the whole district is grateful to him for his courageously coming forward at the proper time without heeding a few resenting voices."

This is indeed good news. Shri Keshwain deserves congratulations for his humanitarian spirit. Those who wish to may eat what meats they like, but it is defaming God to offer animal sacrifices in temples. What God wants, if He can be said to want anything, is the sacrifice made by a humble and contrite heart.

Literary v. Craft Work

Shri Narhari Parikh writes:

"I feel that in many of our khadi and other schools the emphasis laid on literary training is wholly wrong. Certain hours are assigned to craft work and certain to literary work, but it is believed that knowledge can only be imbibed through book reading. I hold that more intellectual progress is possible for our students through craft work than books. I shall be grateful if you will give your opinion on this issue."

The writer's complaint is justified. Literary training does not always mean expansion of the intellect. Primarily it is a matter of memorising. A letter is imprinted on the brain in the same way as any other picture. But literary training is more than mere reading. The same thing is true of handicrafts. A knowledge of handicrafts is not limited to the mere craft. It includes a knowledge of its science. Then the expansion of the intellect is much greater and quicker than in the high schools and colleges. Therefore, to run down craft work or give it a secondary place in the school programme is greatly to be deplored. Students thus underrate the value and place of craft knowledge in the expansion of the intellect. Book learning damages the eyes and cramps thought and originality. There is no such danger in learning crafts and their science. This too involves some study of books.

But that study is related to crafts and, therefore, requires the exertion of the intellect. This is what I mean by basic training. It must, in time, come into its own, for it is so true. But meanwhile let there be no differentiation made between book learning and craft work. The latter must be looked upon as an integral part of education and must have the same status as any other subject. This obvious truth should be recognised at least in national schools. ## TRAGEDY OF THE ENGLISH MEDIUM

(By Shriman Narayan Agarwal)

Gandhiji's trenchant criticism of the English medium of instruction on the occasion of the Benares Hindu University's Silver Jubilee celebrations has once more roused Indian educationists from their mental torpor. Whether it will stir them into fruitful activity is, however, quite doubtful. But if our educationists fail to do their duty, time cannot wait endlessly to restore the balance. Indian youth is restive under the yoke of a foreign language, and the English medium is, assuredly, on its last legs.

Apart from other baneful effects, the greatest tragedy of the English medium is its crippling influence on the intellect. It is now patent that the students who learn through the mother-tongue show a better grasp of subjects and develop a healthier intellect than those who study through English. Authentic and weighty evidence in favour of this statement is, indeed, overwhelming. Messrs Abbott and Wood in their educational report of 1937 observed:

"It is not possible accurately to assess the mental dislocation and the inhibitions which boys suffer from being required to give and receive information, to formulate ideas, to record their experiences, and to express their sense of values in a language other than which they use and have always been in the habit of using in domestic and social life. . . . They are hampered at every turn by having to handle an instrument which comes between them and spontaneity."

Dr. Mackenzie, the late Pro-Vice-Chancellor of the Osmania University, also confessed that students learning through an Indian language showed better progress than those learning through a foreign medium. One language only holds the key to our emotions, one language only conveys to us, surely and instinctively, the subtler overtones of suggestion which its words possess. That is the language that we use at our mothers' knees; the language of our first prayers and our first spontaneous outbursts of joy or grief. To make any other the vehicle of education is not merely to add immeasurably to the pupil's labours; it is to lame his mind in its freedom of movement, remarks Mr. H. N. Brailsford, the renowned English thinker.

This fact is also corroborated by the Hartog Committee which reported:

"Many witnesses have told us that the boy who has received a vernacular schooling, though he may be handicapped at first by his weakness in English, very often outstrips the Anglo-vernacular boy in the long run in consequence of his better grasp of those general subjects which he learns through the vernacular."

The Government of India Resolution of 1913 also stated:

"There is much evidence to the effect that scholars who have been through a complete vernacular course are exceptionally efficient mentally."

The Rev. W. E. S. Holland, who was the Principal of St. Paul's Cathedral College, Calcutta, and later the Principal of St. John's College, Agra, replying to the questionnaire issued by the Sadler Commission, observed:

"A large part of college teaching and learning is concerned with understanding the meaning of the English words in which the subject is being studied. There is less time and strength for the attainment of high standards in the subject itself. I consider that the large number of failures at each successive stage in the University course is due to the same cause. . . . Further, freshness and keenness of interest in a particular subject evaporate when the medium through which it is studied interposes such difficulty. . . . Enquiries from staff and students alike have revealed the fact that they do almost all their thinking in the vernacular. To be educated in a language which is not the vehicle of thought must cramp intellectual development in all kinds of ways. The foreignness of our whole curricula sterilises our best Indian minds. . . . There will be a new outburst of intellectual life in Bengal when throughout their education they think and express themselves in the vernacular."

Mr. W. C. Wordsworth, for some time Principal of the Presidency College, went a step further and wrote:

"I believe that students should be permitted to use their own vernaculars in all University examinations. . . . I think that the teaching of English would be improved if schools were permitted to make it a second language, and not the medium of instruction in the higher classes."

Miss A. L. Janau, Principal of the Bethune College, Calcutta, also eloquently advocated the introduction of the vernacular medium and wrote to the Sadler Commission:

"There is no excuse for imposing English as the language of teaching or of examination, and so to impose it is to lay a burden on the Indian pupil which is likely to kill any originality of thought individuals may possess and is sure to kill the genius of Indians as a race."

I have purposely cited the evidence of only English educationists to lend added weight to my argument. I have no quarrel with the English language as such. It is a rich and well-developed language and has gained international importance. It can very well remain a compulsory second language in high schools and colleges. But I see no justification for making it the vehicle of instruction.

Will University Vice-Chancellors and Directors of Public Instruction care to check the colossal waste of national energy without further delay?

VACATION WORK

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A Poona correspondent writes :

"Students are now going on long leave for their summer vacation. Most of them will leave the cities and go to their native places. Looking to the urgent exigencies in the country due to the war situation, and its consequent responsibilities on the people of India, will it not be useful if a message is sent to the student world reminding them of their responsibility and duty at this critical juncture? May I therefore request you to kindly issue an appeal at the earliest to the students calling them for some action during the vacation and after? My humble suggestions are as follows:

1. Reading out the news to the villagers about the War and the Indian political situation and special articles from Harijan.

2. Explaining to them the present emergency and possible events.

3. Organising Nagarik Samrakshana Dals.

4. Propagating and organising the idea of self-sufficiency in villages, so far as food and clothing is concerned.

5. A persistent campaign against untouchability. It is possible that the students, some of whom are under the fanatic influence of communal organisations, might harm rather than help the cause in view. But we have to take the chances with the students as they are, and hence I have deliberately dropped, out of the above list, items of communal unity and Congress ideology and mentioned only such items as would give least scope for either communal or ideological differences."

I have no difficulty in endorsing the suggestions made by the correspondent.

Self-sufficiency is a big word. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has adopted that and self-reliance as slogans in his U. P. speeches. They should prove catching at this juncture. Villages will be swept away, if they are not self-sufficient as to their primary wants and self-reliant as to their protection against internal disruption by dissensions and disease and external danger from thieves and dacoits. Self-sufficiency, therefore, means all the cotton processes and growing of seasonal food crops and fodder for cattle. Unless this is done there will be starvation. And self-reliance means corporate organisation ensuring adjustment of internal differences through arbitration by the wise men of villages and cleanliness by corporate attention to sanitation and common diseases. No mere individual effort is going to suffice. And above all villagers must be taught to feel their own strength by combined effort to make their villages proof against thieves and dacoits. This is best done by corporate non-violence. But if the way to non-violence does not seem clear to workers, they will not hesitate to organise corporate defence through violence. I am not having in mind Congressmen who have adopted non-violence as their final creed and so have no choice in the matter.

Thus the students, if they will, can have a strenuous vacation. Who knows that the vacation may not prove even indefinite? But if it is not, two months are good enough time for laying down a good foundation for self-sufficiency and self-reliance.

My correspondent is timid. There is no cause to fear communal strife. Students who take up village reorganisation cannot afford to be communal. Communalism is an urban product fated to flourish only on urban soil. In rural areas the people are too poor and too interdependent to find time for communal quarrels. Be that as it may, student workers are assumed, for this note, to be free from the virus.

FROM UNOFFICIAL NOTES

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I extract the following useful information from the unofficial notes published from time to time by the Principal Information Officer of the Government of India, which sometimes make interesting and instructive reading:

Medicinal Plants

Research on Indian medicinal drugs has been undertaken to assist the local manufacture of drugs. By chemical and biological tests it has been established that pyrethrum cultivated in the hills of Northern India compares favourably with the imported commodity. Another investigation establishes that antrypol, a British product, is a good substitute for Naganol, a German product extensively used for veterinary medicine. A detailed distribution of medicinal plants growing in India is now being worked out. It will help in the supply of good vegetable products and stimulate the cultivation of medicinal plants.

The question of producing a fish liver oil containing vitamin 'A' and 'D' for both military and medicinal purposes has been examined. In the different fish curing yards of the Madras Fisheries Department, an oil of very high potency is extracted from the livers of sharks and saw-fishes. To develop this a proper organisation is necessary to work along the entire coastline of India.

Manuring of Paddy

Varieties of rice evolved at the Council's research stations have been multiplied and distributed to cultivators. Further experiments to find out the economics of manuring of paddy with oil cakes on the basis of their nitrogen content have been recommended.

Cheap synthetic manure from town refuse and other waste materials prepared in Mysore has been found to be effective in quality and to possess high manurial value for rice, millets, tomatoes and other crops.

Registration of Cattle

The Council initiated a scheme for Central Herd Books for the registration of Sahiwal, Sindhi and Haryana cattle and Murrah buffaloes. It has been found that 'berseem' makes a good substitute for concentrates up to three-fourths of the usual ration of dairy cattle.

Owing to increasing menace of adulteration of ghee, the Council sanctioned research on the detection of the adulterants at the Imperial Dairy Institute, Bangalore.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Weakening Non-violence?

Q. In the instructions issued by the Working Committee of the Congress in the matter of organising Congress volunteers it has been clearly stated that the organisation should be based on "strictly non-violent basis". In the pledge forms prepared in this behalf by some Congress committees, however, it is stated that volunteers when on duty only should observe non-violence. The Karnatak P. C. C. has prepared the volunteers' pledge in this form. The Chief Organiser of volunteers in the Province appointed by the K. P. C. C. declared in a public meeting held for the purpose of enrolling volunteers that a Congress volunteer even on duty might exercise the right of private defence by resorting to violence in an emergency, and further that such an action on his part did not contravene the instructions of the Working Committee. All this is creating confusion. If the instructions of the Working Committee are not to be strictly carried out, it would be better that the condition of non-violence were dropped altogether rather than were allowed to be diluted to suit individual ideas. What is your opinion in the matter?

A. My answers must not be taken as authentic in questions the answers to which require the imprimatur of the Congress as this one does. My personal opinion is decisive. Violence in self-defence has no place in any corps organised by or in the name of the Congress. There can be no laxity in the enforcement of this rule without risking a breakdown of the whole non-violent structure in the Congress. Use of violence in private self-defence is said to be permitted by the Congress because the Congress does not and cannot regulate the personal and private life of individual Congressmen. The individual in his private life is unfettered by the rules of the Congress. He is dominated by his own ethical code, if any.

Full Faith in Non-violence

Q. There are some Congressmen, though their number is very small, who have full faith in non-violence and who desire to organise on that basis. Should not Congress committees organise such men? Or should not Congress committees allow such men to form their corps under the auspices of the Congress?

A. Congress committees cannot organise sections. The Congress can have only one policy. Today it is pure non-violence so far as internal affairs are concerned. Therefore I see no reason for separate peace committees. Purists, if they are humble and not self-opinionated, will act as a leaven in bodies which may contain men and women even of doubtful faith, as there must be in democratic organisations.

Bewildering Conflict

Q. There is a bewildering conflict of opinion among Congress leaders. Sardar speaks with one voice, Rajaji with another, Maulana with a third, and Jawaharlalji with a fourth — not to speak of the lesser lights. Whom is one to follow, who is to be regarded as the sole authority to interpret the Congress policy and resolutions?

A. Legally and constitutionally the President is the sole authority. If there is a conflict of opinion between the majority of the Working Committee and the President, as was once the case in the early stages, the majority view would supersede the President's. But on critical occasions legal opinion is not of much value. People have their favourite heroes, and they will follow the heroes even blindly. My advice, therefore, is that in the ticklish question of ahimsa each one should be his own authority not on the law but on interpretation. If all the four distinguished leaders whom you have mentioned were to sit together, they would probably give the same interpretation, but in the course of their speeches each would put his special emphasis on one aspect or another of the same matter.

On the way to Delhi, 26-3-1942

Spinning in Midnapore

Sutabata Thana has, according to a letter from Dr. P. C. Ghosh, a population of 85,000 and can boast of 494 self-spinners today as against 60 charkhas plying there in 1940. The improvement is due in large measure to the efforts of satyagrahis who were not arrested. 371 spinners held a demonstration there last February, some of whom had walked 10 or 12 miles. Out of these 152 were habitual wearers of khadi, and in six months all should have sufficient cloth for themselves from their own yarn. 500 more charkhas and 1,000 dhanush taklis are to be introduced this year. One of the workers is being trained at the Khadi Vidyalaya, Sevagram. Spinners used to be supplied with slivers or carded cotton, but now people are being trained to card for themselves. Spinners have begun to stock their own cotton, and all the yarn is woven into cloth in the Thana.

SCORCHED EARTH

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Thus writes a correspondent on my article 'Scorched Earth' in Harijan :

"In your article headed 'Scorched Earth' appearing in Harijan of the 22nd March you say as follows :

'As a war resister my answer can only be one. I see neither bravery nor sacrifice in destroying life or property for offence or defence. I would far rather leave, if I must, my crops and homestead for the enemy to use than destroy them for the sake of preventing their use by him. There is reason, sacrifice and even bravery in so leaving my homestead and crops, if I do so not out of fear but because I refuse to regard anyone as my enemy — that is, out of a humanitarian motive.'

Firstly, although I do not approve of the violence which characterized Russia's resistance, I am of the view that there is great bravery and sacrifice in the scorched earth policy which they are adopting to resist the invader. I cannot, therefore, understand your saying that there is neither bravery nor sacrifice in destroying property for defence. Secondly, although you ask people to resist the invader, you would prefer them to leave their crops and homestead for the invader to use, not out of fear but out of a humanitarian motive. I cannot understand how this can be reconciled with your teaching of resistance to evil. I think that non-violent resistance to the invader demands it of me that I should prevent anything which will be of use to him, such as crops or homestead etc., from falling into his hands even if this means sacrificing my life. May I request you to clarify this subject because it is of vital importance that people should know how they should offer non-violent resistance to the invader?"

Surely the meaning is plain. There is no bravery in my poisoning my well or filling it in so that my brother who is at war with me may not use the water. Let us assume that I am fighting him in the orthodox manner. Nor is there sacrifice in it, for it does not purify me, and sacrifice, as its root meaning implies, presupposes purity. Such destruction may be likened to cutting one's nose to spite one's face. Warriors of old had wholesome laws of war. Among the excluded things were poisoning wells and destroying food crops. But I do claim that there are bravery and sacrifice in my leaving my wells, crops and homestead intact, bravery in that I deliberately run the risk of the enemy feeding himself at my expense and pursuing me, and sacrifice in that the sentiment of leaving something for the enemy purifies and ennobles me.

My questioner has missed the conditional expression "if I must". I have imagined a state of things in which I am not prepared just now to die and therefore I want to retreat in an orderly manner in the hope of resisting under other and better auspices. The thing to consider here is not resistance but non-destruction of food crops and the like. Resistance, violent or non-violent, has to be well thought out. Thoughtless resistance will be regarded as bravado in military parlance, and violence or folly in the language of non-violence. Retreat itself is often a plan of resistance and may be a precursor of great bravery and sacrifice. Every retreat is not cowardice which implies fear to die. Of course a brave man would more often die in violently or non-violently resisting the aggressor in the latter's attempt to oust him from his property, but he will be no less brave if wisdom dictates present retreat.

HOW TO BE WORTHY OF OUR HERITAGE

While the still-born proposals that Sir Stafford Cripps has brought are meeting the fate they deserved, a lot of speculation is going on as to whether the British Cabinet cannot yet be made to see the error of their ways and persuaded to revise the proposals and entrust the defence of India to us. Whether this can be done one does not know. But assuming that it can be done, it is worth while considering whether we can withstand an invasion violently. I have very grave doubts, and I shall endeavour to state some of the obvious reasons.

General Molesworth, Deputy Chief of the General Staff in India, in the course of an address at the Rotary Club, made what I should think was a grave admission for a General to make. Here are his words :

"Everybody in India is asking what are we going to do to keep the Japanese out. From the point of view of the Army in this enormous battle front we shall hold vital places which it is necessary to hold in order to make India safe, but we cannot hold everyone.

Therefore, what is to be done for the rest of India where we are unable to put troops or air or naval forces? That question is not entirely impossible of solution. The next few months will put us down in history either as worthy or unworthy of our heritage. This is the time at which we have got to put everything aside, political, communal, racial and social squabbles, and if we really feel India is worthy of having, we have got to see that we defend it. We cannot arm all. On the other hand we can do a great deal to educate the masses to give the Japanese a great deal of trouble.

This must be done by the civil people like you. The army cannot do it. The people can work in bands and give trouble and delay and destroy invasion. It may be there is no proper lead from the top and no proper leadership down below. Still I feel the Japanese invasion can be beaten, if we educate the people on the lines of 'They shall not pass'. Psychologically it can only be done by the intelligentsia, working definitely shoulder to shoulder to work up the peasant."

I would invite the reader to read carefully the words I have italicised. The General makes the candid admission that it is not possible for the Army to hold every one of the "vital places", and that there are vital places—how many he naturally did not like to say—where "we are unable to put troops, or air or naval forces." It might have been better if he had also told us what exactly is India's strength on the land, on the sea and on the air—after what India has sent to Lybia, Malaya, Singapore and Burma. And even though he has not acquainted us with these facts, it is not difficult to see that we are ill prepared to resist militarily a foreign invasion.

"But," it may be said, "if we are given full control, there is yet time, we can still get ready, and be yet worthy of what is really our heritage and not General Molesworth's heritage." It may not be forgotten that after all is said and done General Molesworth's heritage is not here but elsewhere. Britain is his heritage, and all the resources of Britain are being concentrated for the protection of Britain against a foreign invasion. In the face of that natural fact, can we pretend that we can militarily get ready, to face an invasion? Let us see.

Andre Maurois, the famous French writer, who served as a liaison officer attached to the British Army in 1914-18, and who served in a similar capacity with the British Army in France before the collapse of France during the present war, has recently published a book Why France Fell which throws a flood of light on the whole question. Before the war the French Army, it will be remembered, was regarded as invincible. Mr. Hore-Belisha, the British War Minister, was invited to France for the review of July 14th in 1939. He went there with Mr. Winston Churchill.

"It was a splendid occasion," writes Maurois, "Paris' last happy day. Never had the French army been more magnificent . . . Churchill beamed. 'Thank God for the French Army,' he said. We did not know at that time that the courage of men, their military virtues, and the traditions of even the finest regiments were powerless when the mechanical equipment is not worthy of the Army. . . . The procession of tanks reassured the onlookers in the Champs Elysees and filled them with enthusiasm, but the latter were uninformed of the situation in Germany; they did not know that the Germans possessed many more tanks, more heavily armoured and invulnerable to our anti-tank guns."

"In the afternoon," Maurois goes on to say, "Mr. Hore-Belisha came to see us at Neuilly with a colonel who was his aide-de-camp. He talked of the difficulties he was encountering in building up a British Army:

'Conscription,' he said, 'is all well and good, but for the moment it is more a formula than a reality. I cannot call up all the men who have registered, because I have neither equipment to give them nor officers to train them.'

'What about the officers of the last War?' I asked.

'They do not understand the new weapons.'

'And if war were to break out tomorrow, how many divisions could you send us?'

'Right away? Not more than six.'

That figure frightened me. I was even more terrified when I learned a few weeks later that our General Staff had asked from England for the whole duration of a European war only thirtytwo divisions."

I cannot summarise here the whole of Maurois' revealing document. There were numerous causes why France fell. Among them may be numbered (1) The stupidity of the French ways of industrial mobilisation; (2) The woeful paucity of machine-tools; (3) Failure of morale—"at a time of great peril Frenchmen and Englishmen were living routine lives governed by the petty rules of a military bureaucracy"; (4) Superannuated and scarce tanks in Britain; (5) Lack of enthusiasm created by the numerous political divisions and factions and squabbles in France, and too much optimism in England; (6) The intrigues of the three thousand persons in Paris, who, as Byron said, 'because they go to bed late believe they are the leaders of the world', "which placed the nation in great jeopardy"; (7) Successful German propaganda setting England against France and France against England.

But Maurois returns again and again to the charge and says that the principal cause was the military unreadiness and inferiority of France and even Britain.

"The war was lost, so far as France was concerned, at the very moment it was begun. It was lost because we did not have enough aeroplanes, or enough tanks, or enough anti-air-craft guns, and because we did not have enough factories to build what we lacked. It was lost because our Ally had only a tiny army and did not possess the means of expansion which could have permitted her to take quick advantage of her immense reserves of men and riches."

Again he says:

"A great civilisation was foredoomed because 5,000 tanks and 10,000 aeroplanes which we could have built or bought without trouble were not constructed in time."

Describing how the men in the army were unaccustomed to modern warfare Maurois says:

"I remember asking one of our Generals why he did not accustom his men to the sight of flame-throwing tanks and dive bombers. 'If their first experience of this method of attack takes place on the field of battle, they will be terrified.' 'You are perfectly right,' he replied. 'I asked about it on several occasions. But I received the answer that tank manoeuvres would ruin the crops and that the civil authorities were opposed to it.'"

This last extract reminds me of an article by Edgar Snow I read last year, in which he describes how China tried to train women for military service and what disasters occurred during the first months.

Many of the trained women screamed and fainted and fled, and casualties were heaviest without there being any casualty on the enemy's side.

I would like to find out whether with all our man power we can be militarily ready, even within ten years, to fight Germany and Japan; whether we can have the necessary training; whether millions of our men—if we could put them in the field—would not be mown down like hay. Let us also remember that we shall have to depend entirely for training on the British officers; let us also remember Mr. Hore-Belisha's admission to Maurois (already quoted) that "they do not understand the new weapons"; let us remember too that we shall have to depend for most of the infernal weapons of warfare on America, and General Molesworth's admission that "the whole difficulty is that the production in U. S. A. has not come up to expectation. They are always ten months behind whatever they may say. Let us remember too that, even if America was capable of producing much that we required, America like Britain has to look to her own protection. Britain, which was regarded as immune until a little while ago, is daily thinking in terms of an invasion, and America is no better case." Louis Fischer, in his book of memoirs, Men and Politics, says, referring to an interview he had with M. Reynand just before the outbreak of the war: "Reynand thought America would be in grave danger if Germany won the war. 'In 1914,' he recalled, 'we never dreamed of the arms that we were using in 1918. This war will see the birth of new weapons and the perfection of old ones which will bring the United States within easier range of European armed forces.'"

One last extract from Maurois bearing on the point I am trying to make. Talking of England before the outbreak of war, he says: "England had turned a deaf ear to all talks of armaments and fighting. Her professors taught the youth of the country that war was a survival of barbarism and could easily be eliminated. They did not tell their pupils that, unless force is used to sustain justice, injustice will triumph." Well, we do not know how much, if any, was the effect of the British professors' pacific teaching on the mind of the British youths. But if it really had the effect of undermining their mental and physical readiness for resisting a foreign invasion, how colossal unreadiness must be for that sort of resistance, when we have regard to our forcible emasculation since 1857!

One last consideration. A thing which is entirely forgotten by our military enthusiasts, if I may so call them, is that we who talk so loudly of a free and independent India shall have to be dependent on England and America, if we can dream of ever possessing the military equipment necessary to face a foreign invasion in the orthodox way. They refuse to calculate or even to contemplate the consequences of that dependence.

I am, however, thinking only of the human chances of our readiness, assuming that everything else was favourable. I think I have shown that they are none. President Roosevelt, in his proclamation declaring April 6 as the Army Day, called the day a total war day and reminded the Americans that "our army is a mighty arm of free liberty. It is the living part of the American peoples, a tradition that goes back to Israel Putnam, who left his plough in a New England furrow to take up a gun and fight at Bunker Hill." Can we get our kisans to leave their ploughs and march to the front with guns? Even if we can, General Molesworth has frankly said, "We cannot arm all."

What then is the alternative? Louis Fischer, in the book I have already quoted from, also analyses the causes of the fall of France in pretty nearly the same way as Maurois. While Germany was concentrating on giant tanks and giant bombers, France was watching supinely. "Cot shouted, 'More planes.' Colonel Charles de Galle cried, 'Produce tanks.' The appealers, the defeatists, the defensivists replied, 'We have the Maginot line.'..... But it is not merely a matter of counting planes, guns and soldiers. Munich demoralised France and made it more defeatist. That applied to some extent to England too. The small countries of Europe had less confidence in the stamina and courage of the big Western powers. Spirit can often be weighed against planes." There is no defeatism here, there need be none. But defeat—irretrievable defeat—stares us in the face, if we choose the wrong weapons. It is the spirit that we have to weigh against the planes. And that spirit, thanks to the practical teaching and experience of twenty years, we have in a fair measure. Even General Molesworth, who knows that he cannot arm our peasants, knows that they can be educated on the lines of 'They shall not pass', in other words, non-cooperation. That is in our bones. A few years' suffering, no matter how meagre, has trained us somewhat in the art. That can be cultivated without any foreign experts and foreign equipment. It does not require long time either. All that is needed is the spirit, the will to resist, the will to shake off our lethargy, cowardice, inertia, the will not 'to live routine lives'. The other thing is no better than a will-o'-the-wisp. Spirit pitted against tanks and planes can alone make us worthy of our heritage, which is essentially a spiritual one.

Whether the nation as a whole is prepared to offer non-violent resistance is another matter. As Gandhiji said to an Australian war correspondent, "That the nation is not behind me does not worry me. There is no cause to be impatient. What right have I to be impatient when I know that I cannot carry even my closest associates, the members of the Working Committee, with me? It is my fault. It means that I have not yet the necessary amount of non-violence to take everyone with me." The beauty of the non-violent method is that even individuals can make their contribution. Everyone must give expression, as best he can, of the witness he bears to the faith within.

NON-VIOLENT RESISTANCE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Japan is knocking at our gates. What are we to do in a non-violent way? If we were a free country, things could be done non-violently to prevent the Japanese from entering the country. As it is, non-violent resistance could commence the moment they effected a landing. Thus non-violent resisters would refuse them any help, even water. For it is no part of their duty to help anyone to steal their country. But if a Japanese had missed his way and was dying of thirst and sought help as a human being, a non-violent resister, who may not regard anyone as his enemy, would give water to the thirsty one. Suppose the Japanese compel resisters to give them water, the resisters must die in the act of resistance. It is conceivable that they will exterminate all resisters. The underlying belief in such non-violent resistance is that the aggressor will, in time, be mentally and even physically tired of killing non-violent resisters. He will begin to search what this new (for him) force is which refuses co-operation without seeking to hurt, and will probably desist from further slaughter. But the resisters may find that the Japanese are utterly heartless and that they do not care how many they kill. The non-violent resisters will have won the day inasmuch as they will have preferred extermination to submission.

But things will not happen quite so simply as I have put them. There are at least four parties in the country. First the British and the army they have brought into being. The Japanese declare that they have no designs upon India. Their quarrel is only with the British. In this they are assisted by some Indians who are in Japan. It is difficult to guess how many, but there must be a fairly large number who believe in the declaration of the Japanese and think that they will deliver the country from the British yoke and retire. Even if the worst happens, their fatigue of the British yoke is so great that they would even welcome the Japanese yoke for a change. This is the second party. The third are the neutrals, who though not non-violent will help neither the British nor the Japanese.

The fourth and last are non-violent resisters. If they are only a few, their resistance will be ineffective except as an example for the future. Such resisters will calmly die wherever they are but will not bend the knee before the aggressor. They will not be deceived by promises. They do not seek deliverance from the British yoke through the help of a third party. They believe implicitly in their own way of fighting and no other. Their fight is on behalf of the dumb millions who do not perhaps know that there is such a thing as deliverance. They have neither hatred for the British nor love for the Japanese. They wish well to both as to all others. They would like both to do what is right. They believe that non-violence alone will lead men to do right under all circumstances. Therefore, if for want of enough companions non-violent resisters cannot reach the goal, they will not give up their way but pursue it to death.

The task before the votaries of non-violence is very difficult. But no difficulty can baffle men who have faith in their mission.

This is going to be a long drawn out agony. Let non-violent resisters not make impossible attempts. Their powers are limited. A resister in Kerala is not physically responsible for the defence of Assam which is just now in imminent danger. If Assam is non-violently inclined, it is well able to take care of itself. If it is not, no party of non-violent resisters from Kerala can help it or any other province. Kerala can help Assam etc. by demonstrating its non-violence in Kerala itself. The Japanese army, if it gets a foothold in India, will not stop at Assam. In order to defeat the British, it has to overrun the whole country. The British will fight every inch of the ground. Loss of India will probably be admission of complete defeat for them. But whether it is so or not, it is quite clear that Japan will not rest till India is wholly in her hands. Hence non-violent resisters must remain at their posts wherever they are.

One thing has to be made clear. Where the British army is actually engaging the 'enemy', it would be perhaps improper for direct resistance to function. It will not be non-violent resistance when it is mixed with, or allies itself to, violence.

Let me therefore reiterate what I have said so often. The best preparation for, and even the expression of, non-violence lies in the determined pursuit of the constructive programme. Anyone who believes that without the backing of the constructive programme he will show non-violent strength when the testing time comes will fail miserably. It will be, like the attempt of a starving unarmed man to match his physical strength against a fully fed and panoplied soldier, foredoomed to failure. He who has no belief in the constructive programme has, in my opinion, no concrete feeling for the starved millions. He who is devoid of that feeling cannot fight non-violently. In actual practice the expansion of my non-violence has kept exact pace with that of my identification with starved humanity. I am still far from the non-violence of my conception, for am I not still far away from the identification of my conception with dumb humanity?

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OR PUBLIC CONTROL?

[A friend having great experience sends the following note.]

While the shortage of foodstuffs is partly due to the deficit in the total supply caused by the stoppage of rice imports from Burma and wheat imports from Australia, coupled with exports of wheat from India, the position has been greatly aggravated by the inefficient handling of the entire situation by the authorities in this country. Unless suitable measures are taken to rectify the defects of the present administrative control, the growing scarcity of foodstuffs in the country as a whole may lead to consequences, the implications of which may be very grave and widespread.

It is common knowledge that India is normally self-sufficient in respect of the total food requirements of her people. Virtual cessation of rice imports from Burma, which on an average amounted to nearly 14 lakhs of tons during the last three years, and of the small quantity of wheat imported from Australia, would no doubt cause a considerable deficit in the total available supply of rice and wheat for internal consumption. But it should be remembered that, against the imports of 14 lakhs of tons of rice from Burma, India's total production of rice was as much as 24 million tons in 1938-39 and 25 million tons in 1939-40. We may add to this the production of other food grains which amounts to nearly 23 million tons. The deficit caused by the cessation of imports thus hardly amounts to nearly 3 per cent of the total supply. Apart from the gap caused by the cessation of imports, the mishandling of the situation by the Government of India is, in the main, at the root of the serious position in respect of foodstuffs, which has developed in the market in recent months.

The attempt of the Government to control prices of foodstuffs has proved a complete failure. It is common experience that, far from benefiting the consumer, the recent control of the price of wheat at a maximum of Rs. 4/6 per maund created a regular wheat famine in a number of marketing centres inasmuch as it led to a psychology of panic and hoarding for private consumption. The result has been that wheat is not obtainable at any price in the market. The whole procedure of price control followed by the Government was wrongly conceived and inefficiently executed. They had no machinery for administering distribution of supplies, while whatever private machinery there was, was destroyed by the Government action. If the Government wanted to control the price of wheat, the proper course was to create efficient machinery for purchasing of supplies and distributing the same at cost price. This meant a vast and efficient machinery. That was not set up. The Government announced a maximum price for wheat one morning and then set about the task of searching for supplies. Such amateurish attempt of the Government to control prices without due regard to the machinery of distribution and the cost of replacement, coupled with the terrorising of the middleman in many places, the restrictions about the method of accounts in provinces like U. P., and the restrictions on the free movement of grain from one place to another, even from one district to another, seriously dislocated the normal channels of trade and led to public panic with the consequent hoarding for private consumption.

The authorities would, therefore, be well advised in abandoning the control over prices, distribution and free movement of food grains. The prices of certain foodstuffs, such as wheat, would tend to rise sharply upon the abandonment of control. But so long as the mass of consumers is not able to get adequate quantities of foodstuffs at the so-called controlled rates, the present policy can only cause artificial scarcity of food grains to the consumer. In most cases the control of prices as instituted by the Government led to a strange result in that all stocks in the market disappeared and the consumer was not able to get the controlled commodities at any price. The conclusion is, therefore, irresistible that the absence of control will be far more in the interests of the consumer than inefficient and incomplete control.

If there is no control, the public have a special responsibility. They must not get panicky and hoard foodstuffs which are out of all proportion to their normal requirements.

Traders and merchants should realise their duty by the country in these grave and difficult times by giving up all attempts at profiteering. Any policy of hoarding would be a serious danger to their own interests while causing great distress to the nation.

The mercantile community can do what the Government have failed to do.

Curious Non-violence

A friend sends the following extract from A. Vambery's translation of Travels and Adventures by Sidi Ali Reis (16th Century):

"Amongst the learned of this land of Banians (Gujarat), there is a tribe which they call the Bats (Bhats), whose business it is to escort merchants or travellers from one land into another, and, for a very small remuneration, they guarantee their perfect safety. Should the Rajputs, i.e. the mounted troops of the land, attack the caravan, the Bats (Bhats) point their daggers at their own breast, and threaten to kill themselves, if they should presume to do the slightest harm to the travellers entrusted to their care. And out of respect for the Bats (Bhats), the Rajputs generally desist from their evil purpose, and the travellers proceed on their way unmolested. Occasionally, however, the Bats (Bhats) carry out their threat, otherwise it would have no force. But if such a thing does happen, if a caravan is attacked and the suicide of the Bats (Bhats) becomes necessary, this is considered a terrible calamity, and the superstition of the people demands that the offenders be put to death, and not only the offenders themselves but the chief of the Rajputs deems it necessary to kill their sons and daughters also, in fact to exterminate the whole of their race. The Mohammedans of Ahmedabad had given us two such Bats (Bhats) as an escort, and so, about the middle of Safar of the said year, we started on our overland journey to Turkey."

A Correction

The Secretary to Government C. P., Education Department, writes:

"With reference to the allegation that 'the closing down of the Basic Normal Schools at Wardha and Seoni is, it is understood, being seriously contemplated by the Government of the Central Provinces,' published under the paragraph 'Sad contrast' in the issue of Harijan dated the 15th March 1942, I am directed to state that there is no proposal to close down the Basic Normal Schools at Wardha and Seoni. Adequate budget provision for 1942-43 has already been made on account of the two Basic Normal Schools. The allegation referred to above has, therefore, no basis whatsoever."

The statement that the closing down of the schools in question was contemplated was based on authority which there was no reason to question. But I am thankful for the assurance that the Government do not propose to close down the Basic Normal Schools at Wardha and Seoni.

The Merits of Amla

Vitamin C or ascorbic acid, the vitamin which prevents scurvy, is found in fresh fruits and vegetables. Among vegetables, the green leafy varieties are the best sources. When pulses and cereal grains are allowed to sprout this vitamin C is formed in the grain and in the growing green sprouts. Amla (Indian gooseberry) grows abundantly in all Indian forests and is obtainable in almost unlimited quantities from January to April. The fresh juice contains nearly twenty times as much vitamin C as orange juice, and a single fruit is equivalent in vitamin C content to one or two oranges. It is possible to preserve Amla without losing much of the vitamin, for unlike other fresh fruits or vegetables it contains substances which practically protect the vitamin from destruction on heating and drying. Amla is included as an ingredient in many Ayurvedic medicines and tonics. It was found to be a most effective cure for scurvy in 1940 in the Hissar famine area. The above useful information is gleaned from The Indian Medical Gazette of March 1942.

Improved Diets

"One of the tasks of those who are striving to improve diet in India is to educate the educated," writes Dr. Aykroyd in Health Bulletin No. 23. He bemoans the fact that it is not only the poor, whose choice is extremely limited, who are ignorant and prejudiced, but also those who can afford an excellent diet who do not feed properly, with the result that their children suffer from malnutrition and food-deficiency diseases. Even for people with limited incomes effective improvement can be made with little increase in cost. He says it is desirable that children should consume upwards of 8 oz. of milk a day, but, if funds do not admit, then butter-milk or skimmed milk may be supplied, for "even a little milk is better than none." Careful experiments have shown that the giving of 8 oz. of skimmed milk daily to children fed on an average 'ill-balanced' Indian diet results in an acceleration of growth and a great improvement in health and well-being." Calcium is found abundantly in milk, and children need relatively more calcium and other minerals than adults, just as they need relatively more protein. Rice being very deficient in calcium, its insufficiency is one of the most important defects of the rice-eater's diet. The milled rice eater, therefore, needs more 'protective' foods — milk, green vegetables, fruits, etc. than the consumer of whole wheat or ragi. "Parboiled rice, even when milled, is superior in nutritive value (particularly as regards the anti-beri-beri vitamin) to raw rice milled to the same degree." Since diets among the general population are low in fat, Dr. Aykroyd suggests that "addition of extra vegetable oil (at the expense of a quantity of cereal supplying an equivalent number of calories) does not greatly increase expenditure. Pure ghee or butter is, of course, preferable to vegetable fat, but very much dearer." Fruits, he avers, must always be included in children's diets. Tomatoes, oranges and other juicy fruits are richer in vitamins than bananas.

Non-slaughter Leather

At the last meeting of the Board of Management of the A. I. V. I. A. it was decided to give our support to the sale of goods made from leather tanned from the hides of cows, bullocks and buffaloes which have died a natural death. The reason that weighed with the Board was neither ethical nor religious, but purely economic. In most other countries cattle are reared for milk and meat. Milch cows are kept well, and when they cease to yield milk or bear calves they are sent to the slaughter house. Apart from the stud bulls the others are fattened for the table. Therefore rarely do any of them die a natural death. In India the case is almost the reverse. Excepting in large towns and cities, cattle are not slaughtered. A majority of them die in villages. Machine or factory tanning, which requires a large and steady supply of hides, is not possible in the villages, as only a few hides at a time are available in rural areas, and that not regularly. However, in addition to slaughter-house hides, large numbers of hides from cattle dying a natural death also are collected, salted, and sent to tanneries near towns. Comparatively this type of town-tanned leather is only a small proportion of the whole. Leather of slaughtered animals is usually in good condition and without blemishes from improper handling. Further, town-tanned leather on cottage basis is of good quality and capable of standing on its own merits with machine- and factory-tanned leather. So tanneries in towns do not stand in such dire need of help from our Association as the tanneries in remote villages. Hence our choice lay between leather that was machine-tanned, or cottage-tanned in towns, or cottage-tanned in villages, of which the last group was the largest and the most in need of improvement. The first two were concerned with hides of slaughtered animals mostly, while the last was exclusively with hides of naturally dead cattle. Therefore the Association decided to limit its patronage to leather from hides of non-slaughtered cattle. We hope, therefore, that not only those who have scruples on religious grounds against the use of leather from slaughtered animals but also the larger public which, even if indifferent to the question of leather from slaughtered or non-slaughtered animals, still have at heart the welfare of the indigent chamar in the villages, will restrict their patronage to the leather of non-slaughtered animals on economic grounds.

Hand-weaving in New Mexico, U. S. A.

Textile World, a New York monthly, for December 1941, contains a short article by Fremont Kutnewsky on the revival of hand-weaving in New Mexico (one of the Southern States of the U. S. A.) of which Santa Fe is the capital. Hand-weaving "was an old art in 1540" when the first seeds of European civilisation were sown in the American South-West. The "Red" Indians who lived there at the time "were weaving cotton garments for which they had grown the cotton and woven the fabrics." "Spanish settlers brought sheep, and taught the Indians to card and spin the wool. The art continued to develop in a homely way for 300 years, till Yankee traders brought in cheaper yarns and dyes, and the industry of hand-weaving in New Mexico became an adjunct of the curio shop." A few remnants of it survived in the shape, for instance, of the "heavy, well-woven rugs" woven by Navajos in their village homes.

The years following the last World War saw a revival of the craft, when "a group of artists and writers decided to stimulate the native arts, and Preston McCrossen and his wife arrived on the scene and gave the first big push to hand-woven production" by taking up weaving themselves in a village. Hand-weaving seems to have some decided advantages in this territory. "It requires," says the writer, "no costly machinery. A large number of the looms in use today were made by hand. The labour supply is unlimited. . . . McCrossen Hand-Woven Textiles Inc., of Santa Fe, have become the largest producers of hand-woven fabrics in New Mexico. They are now taking the lead in finding new world markets for tweeds and other fabrics." But they have evidently realised that no revival of the textile handicraft could be complete, stable and self-reliant without the spinning wheel. So they and several other operators are beginning to use hand-spun, vegetable-dyed yarns, from New Mexico wool." This is happening in a part of the United States of America, the most mechanised country in the world.

This is but one of the many instances which show how organised attempts are being made in many parts of the world to foster handicraft as an alternative method of production, in some ways even superior to the machine method. It possesses a vitality that has enabled it to withstand the onslaughts of machinery and survive to an extent which is astonishing.

NATIONAL WEALTH

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

An American Mission is coming to India to organise industries to help the war effort of the Allies. Up to now our raw materials have been taken away from the country and production of manufactured goods had given employment to nationals of countries other than our own. The difficulties of transport, shortage of shipping accommodation and the urgency for the materials in the Middle East has made the warring nations turn to India for production. The avowed purpose of this Mission is not the creation of wealth for India, but the seeking of better and quicker ways of destroying the opponent. Destruction cannot be the end of true wealth, nor can destruction create wealth.

At every turn we hear the word 'wealth', but few of us understand its full significance. We talk of 'wealth production', 'distribution of wealth', 'national wealth' and so on. What does wealth consist of? It is commonly used to signify the possession of materials in plenty. The root meaning signifies welfare, which implies the wholesome reaction of material things to human well-being. The man who possesses merely gold is not wealthy unless he can make it serve his needs. What good is the yellow metal in the pockets of a man who is sinking in water? It will only make him sink the faster. Therefore, before we can declare anything to be 'wealth', we have to see how it affects the welfare of human beings. Do we produce wealth when we merely add to the number of chairs we possess when there are no human beings to sit on them?

When a country abounds in iron ore can we say that that country is wealthy? If not, how can we convert that iron ore into wealth? Iron ore can be regarded as wealth only from its relationship to human welfare. If such iron ore afforded opportunities to the people to supply their wants, then such opportunities are wealth. We cannot convert that iron ore into wealth by selling the material any more than a young man can produce wealth by selling his ancestral property. He may convert that inherited property into cash and run through it by wasteful living. But that is not wealth production. Our country is much in the position of such a prodigal when it exports its raw materials which represent rich potentialities of being converted into human well-being if such raw materials were worked on and made into consumption goods by the people of the land where such materials are found. Working up the raw materials of India is the birthright of the Indian people. Therefore, exporting of such raw materials to other lands to be converted into consumption goods is to impoverish our own land. It is for this reason that we have been advocating the converting of raw materials into finished goods by the people of the locality as far as possible.

Production of goods of any kind in itself is not wealth creation. Manufacture of a lancet for a surgeon or fruit knife may be wealth as these are calculated to increase the welfare of human beings.

C. S.

Shall we call a burglar's jimmy or an aerial torpedo, which are intended to injure or destroy others, wealth? Leading economists of the West have stated, "Burglars' jimmies are wealth by the very fact of the marketable services that they afford, their proceeds." Is this going to be our criterion? Is the bearing of children for the purpose of replenishing the army true motherhood?

Industries must provide for supply of the needs of people, distribute wealth in the process, and contribute towards the happiness and well-being of mankind, if they are to be real contributors to the national wealth of the country. Ammunition production may make a few men rich, but it does not ennoble humanity. On the other hand, it degrades it to the level of beasts of prey.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Theory of Trusteeship

Q. From your writings one gathers the notion that your 'trustee' is not anything more than a very benevolent philanthropist and donor, such as the first Parsi Baronet, the Tatas, the Wadias, the Birlas, Shri Bajaj and the like. Is that so? Will you please explain whom you regard as the primary or rightful beneficiaries of the possessions of a rich man? Is there to be a limit to the amount or part of the income and capital which he can spend upon himself, his kith and kin and for non-public purposes? Can one who exceeds such limit be prevented from doing so? If he is incompetent or otherwise fails to discharge his obligations as a trustee, can he be removed and called upon to render accounts by a beneficiary or the State? Do the same principles apply to Princes and Zamindars, or is their trusteeship of a different nature?

A. If the trusteeship idea catches, philanthropy, as we know it, will disappear. Of those you have named only Jamnalalji came near, but only near, it. A trustee has no heir but the public. In a State built on the basis of non-violence, the commission of trustees will be regulated. Princes and Zamindars will be on a par with the other men of wealth.

Expedience

Q. Several years ago I once had the temerity to ask whether the fact that you had allowed non-violence to come into the Congress as an expedient rather than as a creed would not be conducive to its breakdown at the critical time. You said you did not think so. But do you still feel the same? Would you not today have had an organised band of believers in non-violence whom you could have sent in groups all over the country? It almost seems as if we had lost time and are found unprepared, as it were, to shoulder responsibility?

A. Yes, I adhere to my opinion that I did well to present to the Congress non-violence as an expedient. I could not have done otherwise, if I was to introduce it into politics. In South Africa too I introduced it as an expedient. It was successful there because resisters were a small number in a compact area and therefore easily controlled. Here we had numberless persons scattered over a huge country. The result was that they could not be easily controlled or trained. And yet it is a marvel the way they have responded. They might have responded much better and shown far better results. But I have no sense of disappointment in me over the results obtained. If I had started with men who accepted non-violence as a creed, I might have ended with myself. Imperfect as I am, I started with imperfect men and women and sailed on an uncharted ocean. Thank God that, though the boat has not reached its haven, it has proved fairly storm-proof.

The Roman Script

Q. You are prejudiced against the Roman script because you are prejudiced against the English. Otherwise you would unhesitatingly advocate it in the place of Devanagri and Persian.

A. You are wrong. I am prejudiced against neither. But I am against anything or anybody usurping a place not belonging to it or him. The Roman script has come to stay in India. But it cannot take the place of the Indian scripts. If I had my way, there would be only the Devanagri script, for all the provincial languages, and Devanagri and Persian for the all-India speech. The Arabic script, from which the Persian is derived, is a necessity for Muslims as Sanskrit is for Hindus. Roman has been suggested as a compromise and not for its merits. It has none except that it is almost universal in the West. But it must not displace either Devanagri, which is the parent of most provincial languages and is the most perfect of all the known scripts, or Persian, because it is written by millions of Hindus and Muslims in the North. So far as the scripts are keeping them apart, Hindus and Muslims will not come together by adopting a neutral and imperfect script. But they will, if both take the trouble, for the love of one another, to learn both scripts. The Roman script has its own great and unique place. It need not aspire after greater.

Notes

Acharya Anandshanker Dhruva

The death of Acharya Anandshanker Dhruva is an irreparable loss not only to Gujarat but also to the U. P., for he had rendered invaluable services to the Benares Hindu University for a number of years. It will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to replace him. He was an active educationist to the end. Many students have lost a true friend in him. He was Malaviyaji's right hand. Malaviyaji's grief can be better imagined than described. But Anandshanker Dhruva was no mere educationist. His interests were many and varied. He was a keen student of politics, a worshipper at the shrine of Swaraj, and a social reformer. His relations with the orthodox were cordial, for he was an observer of many of their ceremonials. But his instinct and heart were always with the reformer, and he expressed his views fearlessly. He was widely respected for his outstanding knowledge of Sanskrit and the Hindu scriptures, and was a fine representative of the Hindu religion. As for me I had invariably received his help. He was friends equally with labour and capital and, having gained the confidence of both, was able to render great services to both in Ahmedabad. The bereaved family's sorrow will be shared by, and they will have the sympathy of, all who had the privilege of knowing the late Acharya.

Lala Shankerlal

I have two letters about the treatment accorded to Lala Shankerlal of Delhi in jail. They say he is no better off than Sardar Sardul Singh Caveeshar. I have nothing to do with Lala Shankerlal's politics or views, but the same remarks apply to his case as to Caveeshar's. He is as much entitled to decent and humane treatment as Caveeshar. This is what his nephew writes:

"I went to the place in the company of my aunt, the wife of Lala Shankerlal, for an interview at 3-30 P. M. on the 23rd inst. When face to face, I at once detected signs of great weakness and reduction in the energy of Lalaji. He was reduced physically, his complexion was pale, and his face drawn. To my great horror and dismay I found that he is confined day and night to a dark, damp and unhealthy dungeon which could hardly be a befitting place for confinement even for a criminal, much less a gentleman of Lalaji's status."

If this statement is true, the matter calls for immediate attention and redress.

Economy in Travelling

B. B. & C. I. Railway management are discountenancing travelling as far as possible. It is a timely warning. People should travel as little as possible. Only urgent necessity can warrant railway travelling. One fine morning we may find that all civil booking is stopped. Movement of troops may render this precaution absolutely necessary. It is a good thing to accustom ourselves to the practice well in advance of the necessity.

Distress in Bengal

Bengal has suffered from communal riots, it is suffering from famine, and now it threatens to be the target of Japan. Military preparations are inevitable. This means eviction of villagers. Satish Babu sends me a graphic account of an eviction near Chittapore. Thirtythree villages have been evacuated under very short notice. The notices were dated 1st April, served on the 2nd, and the villagers had to leave on the 4th. The troops entered on the 4th. In one village the villagers got the notice on the same day that the troops entered. The evacuees were paid removal cost at the rate of Rs. 10 to 100 according to the Union rates they were paying. Compensation is to be determined and paid hereafter. The rules framed for evacuation are elaborate and read reasonable. But however reasonable they may be, the hardship of sudden evacuation is inevitable, and the enforcement of the rules having unavoidably to be left in the hands of many and petty officials, fairness cannot be ensured. Under the circumstances the utmost that workers like Satish Babu can do is to cheer up the people. Their solid contribution must be to teach the villagers to face the inevitable hardships calmly and bravely and derive comfort from within. Unless they are depressed by their so-called comforters, they respond to the best in them and cheerfully face the worst. This is not to say that the authorities should be callous to the sufferings of the poor. In the present case I do not see what they could have done if the troops had to be located where they have been all of a sudden. Laymen cannot judge whether the military officers should not have anticipated events and made arrangements in good time.

Linguistic Basis

My reply to the Maharaj Kumar of Vizianagram on the Andhra Province has brought me lengthy correspondence about Hindi- and Marathi-speaking provinces. The argument is that all Hindi-speaking areas should be regarded as one province, as also should Marathi-speaking areas. So far as I am concerned I am quite in sympathy with the suggestion. I believe that the linguistic basis is the correct basis for demarcating provinces. I should not mind two provinces speaking the same language, if they are not contiguous. If Kerala and Kashmir were speaking the same language, I would treat them as two distinct provinces.

The writers suggest, however, that I should lead the agitation for the redistribution, or in this case amalgamation, of the Marathi-speaking and Hindi-speaking areas. This is an impracticable proposition. The demand for amalgamation has to be made by Congressmen living in the respective areas. If it is unanimous, the Congress cannot resist it. The thing is entirely in their own hands.

Let my correspondents and others not mix up the Andhra agitation with their proposals. Andhra is already a separate province for the Congress. But, whilst the Congress ministry was in office, the Andhras agitated for legal recognition. My correspondents ask for Congress recognition of their proposals.

Whilst on merits I endorse the proposal, I would discountenance any such agitation and diversion from the main theme before the country — the duty of every Indian in face of the impending invasion of India by Japan. Redistribution of provinces etc., important matters though they are in themselves, pale into insignificance before the question which overshadows every other. These things may easily await the termination of the war. We hope to see a new vision and a new order at the end of the present catastrophe.

Hissar Famine and Spinning

Dr. Gopichand has been discussing with me famine in Hissar. It seems to have become almost chronic. The A. I. S. A. has been working for many years in that district and giving relief to the poor people through spinning. Dr. Gopichand thinks that, if more capital can be made available, much aid can be given. It is perhaps not possible to make a successful appeal outside Hissar. There is so much distress everywhere, and with the terrible spectre of war much more is to be expected. Therefore everywhere local charity has to be depended upon. As often happens even in poor areas there are to be found monied men. Bhiwani is a big trade centre in Hissar, and it has several monied men. Let me hope that they and those others in Hissar who can will come to the rescue and do what they can for the much-needed relief.

SOME DANGER-SPOTS OF YARN CURRENCY

(By K. G. Mashruwala)

I have long been an advocate of a currency based on a commodity like grain or yarn. I agree that yarn is more suitable than grain in this respect. Naturally, I am glad to find that the idea is now taking some practical shape. But haphazard isolated experiments of introducing this currency are likely to be attended with failure and loss either to the public or the institution introducing it. I, therefore, hasten to point out a few danger-spots which should be avoided in making the experiment.

Firstly, it should be remembered that, as long as the rupee continues to be the legal tender of the country, it will remain the ultimate controller of prices. All the problems of 'bimetallism' and 'ratio' will arise, and the advantage will generally accrue to the legally recognised currency. The attempt to maintain a fixed ratio between the yarn and the rupee will not succeed in the event of heavy fluctuations in money-prices of essential commodities. This is more likely than not during the war. If you insist on having a fixed ratio, there will be a heavy loss either in your grain and village products department, or in your khadi department. For you will be constantly faced with the operation of Gresham's Law. You will find either the yarn-rukhas or the coin-money disappearing rapidly from circulation. The disappearance of the former will mean that shrewd people are hoarding the rukhas and, since you cannot exceed your own limits of issuing them, you will find that after a certain stage you have to pay and receive ordinary coins only in your dealings. The disappearance of the coins, on the other hand, will mean that all those who have need for it will have to pay premium to those who have them.

You should also remember that the A. I. S. A. has a special schedule of wages for its spinners and other artisans. It is higher than what they are able and willing to receive elsewhere. A part of the wage is paid in the form of khadi. The dire economic condition on the one hand and the low standard of life on the other tempt the A. I. S. A. artisans to sell off their wage-khadi even at a discount to consumers or uncertified khadi dealers. The latter as well as professional money-changers will purchase the yarn-rukhas at a cheap rate, when the ratio between yarn and coin is in their favour, and the coin is not easily available though badly wanted. This will happen when they have to discharge their legal obligation to the Government and creditors; also, when you cannot provide all those things which the villagers rightly or wrongly badly desire, e. g. toddy, tobacco, kerosene, a cup of tea or sweets at the hotel, a cinema show (on the bazar day), a showy foreign toy, an umbrella and the like. The yarn-rukha thus cheaply purchased will be returned to you in exchange for khadi, which will be resold by them at prices lower than yours. It will be in all outward appearances genuine khadi made by your own institution, and still sold cheap.

So, I think, it will not be right to lay down a principle that the ratio between the gundi and the coin will be unalterable in any case. I do hope, however, that the necessity to revise the ratio will not be very frequent, if proper precautions are taken in fixing the right ratio.

The precautions are : (1) You should not make all your payments in rukkas only, but partly in rukkas and partly in coin. (2) the gundi price of the commodities which you undertake to sell must be as nearly as possible equivalent to their money-price. That is to say, if the price of grain in our centre is, say,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  as. per seer, and your gundi is priced by you at 1 anna, you should not sell grain very much cheaper than  $1\frac{1}{2}$  gundis per seer. (3) If you want to help your villagers by giving them cheap grain, you should do so directly. That is to say, you should set apart a sum to be written off as loss, issue passes to such villagers as you consider to be deserving of help, and put a control on the quantity to be sold to each. (4) Until the yarn-currency becomes the legal tender of the country, i. e. it is accepted by Government in payment of revenue and taxes, and debtors are entitled to tender it in discharge of their obligations, it would be wrong to expect that it can by itself keep prices steady. So, if in your enthusiasm to rapidly introduce the yarn-currency, you begin by giving an undue advantage to the possessor of the rukkas, you will ultimately ruin your own business. (5) In the initial stages, you should not undertake to sell too many articles which you yourself do not produce or get produced and have to purchase them from the market. If you want to open a general store, you should freely sell the commodities for money, and not give an extra advantage to the possessor of the rukka.

The possibility of counterfeit rukkas will be another danger-spot. You cannot afford to take all those precautions which a Government takes in manufacturing its currency notes. Very probably you will use handmade paper. It will more often than not vary from piece to piece both in its quality and tinge; and your design will be far from complicated. In spite of their vigilance, even Governments have to face the problem of counterfeit notes. If the ratio between the rukka and the coin is in favour of the possessor of the rukka, the temptation to make counterfeit rukkas will be very great.

To avoid this, I make the following suggestions :

(1) There should not be a common issue of the rukka for a large area but a separate issue from each centre. The forms and policy will be common, but the patterns of the rukkas should be different, so that each centre will easily identify its issue. (2) The rukkas of one centre should not be accepted at another centre as currency. They should circulate only within the limits of that centre. (3) If a person from one centre wants to use his rukkas in another centre, the issuing authority should give him a credit note or draft upon the other centre at par. Thereupon the other centre will issue to him its own rukkas of the same value. (4) The denomination of the freely exchangeable rukkas should not, for the present, exceed, say, 25 gundis, and should not be less than one lati (a quarter of a gundi). I suggest a lati, a gundi, 5 gundis, 10 gundis and 25 gundis. Large payments should be made either in these prices or by appropriately drawn cheques, hundis, promissory-notes etc., drawn in favour of a specified individual or institution. Of course, I assume that the usual precautions about numbering, section, dating, signing etc. will be carefully taken.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Why Not in Universities ?

Q. You have expressed yourself against communalism in cricket. Are not communal universities also to be deplored ? In colleges and hostels that are open to all, deep friendships spring up and religious tolerance becomes a natural thing. Would not well-endowed Chairs in common centres of learning serve the purpose of advancing different cultures ?

A. You are right. If we can do without communal institutions, it would be good. But I am unable to say that there should be no Muslim or Hindu Universities as I am able to say positively that there should be no communal cricket. The communal universities, if their origin is not tainted, may conceivably serve a national purpose. Thus the Hindu University and the Muslim University may, as they ought to, be seats of communal concord. But communal sports seem to be a contradiction in terms. I wholly agree with you that there should be, as there are, non-communal colleges and hostels. Unfortunately the virus has entered even these. Let us hope that it is a passing phase.

When Leaders Differ

Q. You say people in the cities should evacuate under certain circumstances. Panditji and Rajaji say they should not on any account. What are we to do ?

A. I appreciate your difficulty. I can only advise you to use your judgment and choose that advice which appeals to your reason. We are living in hard times such as we have never experienced before. I am quite sure of my ground. People who are not wanted should evacuate from cities which are within the danger zone. There is no cowardice in orderly withdrawal. Women and children and aged people and all those who are not wanted should evacuate so as to enable the defenders the better to regulate defence of cities under their control. The evacuees will show real courage, if they will settle down in villages and tackle problems that face villagers. Differences of opinion between leaders ought not to worry people. Honest differences are often a healthy sign of progress. And the differences you refer to are honest.

THAT ILL-FATED PROPOSAL

(By M. K. Gandhi)

It is a thousand pities that the British Government should have sent a proposal for dissolving the political deadlock, which, on the face of it, was too ridiculous to find acceptance anywhere. And it was a misfortune that the bearer should have been Sir Stafford Cripps, acclaimed as a radical among radicals and a friend of India. I have no doubt about his goodwill. He believed that no one could have brought anything better for India. But he should have known that at least the Congress would not look at Dominion Status even though it carried the right of secession the very moment it was taken. He knew too that the proposal contemplated the splitting up of India into three parts each having different ideas of governance. It contemplated Pakistan, and yet not the Pakistan of the Muslim League's conception. And last of all it gave no real control over defence to responsible ministers.

The fact is that Sir Stafford Cripps, having become part of the Imperial machinery, unconsciously partook of its quality. Such is its strength. It is the almost invariable experience in India that those Indians who are drawn into it lose their originality and become like their companions in the service and often outdo the latter in their loyalty to the Moloch of Imperialism.

Had Sir Stafford remained detached, he would have conferred with his radical friends in India and secured their approbation before undertaking his very difficult mission. If it be said in answer that he could not very well do so, that is exactly what I mean when I say that, having become part of the machinery, he was bound to fall under its spell and could not do the obvious thing.

But it is no use brooding over the past or British mistakes. It is more profitable to look within. The British will take care of themselves, if we will take care of ourselves. Our mistakes or rather defects are many. Why blame the British for our own limitations? Attainment of Independence is an impossibility till we have solved the communal tangle. We may not blind ourselves to the naked fact. How to tackle the problem is another question. We will never tackle it so long as either or both parties think that Independence will or can come without any solution of the tangle. There are two ways of solving what has almost become insoluble. The one is the royal way of non-violence, and the other of violence. In the first way the formal consent or cooperation of the other party is unnecessary. If there is a dispute between two boys over the ownership of an apple, the non-violent way is to leave the apple for the other party to take, the latter well knowing that it would mean non-cooperation on the surrendering party's part. The second way is the usual way of violence. There the parties fight with each other till one is for the time being worsted. All interested in freedom have to make the choice. I suppose the choice has already been made by the chief actors. But the rank and file do not know their own minds. It is necessary for them, if they can, to think independently and take to non-violent action in terms of unity. It consists in Hindus and Muslims on the wayside fraternising with one another, if they believe that joint life is a perfect possibility, nay a necessity. Whether those who believe in the two nation theory and communal partition of India can live as friends cooperating with one another I do not know. If the vast majority of Muslims regard themselves as a separate nation having nothing in common with Hindus and others, no power on earth can compel them to think otherwise. And if they want to partition India on that basis, they must have the partition, unless Hindus want to fight against such a division. So far as I can see such a preparation is silently going on on behalf of both parties. That way lies suicide. Each party will probably want British or foreign aid. In that case, good-bye to Independence. The fight will then range round not Independence but the imaginary apple after the manner of the imaginary boys. I dare not contemplate the actuality. I should not like to be its living witness. I would love to see a joint fight for Independence. In the very process of securing Independence it is highly likely that we shall have forgotten our quarrels. But if we have not, it will be then only time to quarrel, if we must.

WITH FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

There were three foreign correspondents in Delhi who succeeded better with Gandhiji than others. Miss Eve Curie, the daughter and biographer of her distinguished mother, Madame Curie, has had an American education and is now a press correspondent representing New York Herald, Tribune and allied newspapers in London. She happened to catch Gandhiji when the Working Committee meetings had not yet begun. The other two were war correspondents from London and Chicago—Mr. Moorehead representing The Daily Express and Mr. Busvine of The Chicago Times. Some of Miss Curie's questions were the same as these war correspondents' who persisted for days in asking for a few minutes from Gandhiji and succeeded at last on the eve of his departure.

Miss Curie's question was direct—on the present situation. She admired the sincerity with which Sir Stafford Cripps was trying to bring about a settlement, and she wanted to know Gandhiji's reaction to his efforts. The other friends asked if there was any hope of a settlement. To these latter Gandhiji said: "It is a question I should avoid. I am not officially on the Working Committee which has not yet arrived at a final decision." To Miss Curie he gave a more suggestive reply: "Sir Stafford is a very good man, but he has entered bad machinery—British Imperialism. He hopes to improve that machinery, but in the end it will be the machinery that will get the better of him."

Miss Curie spoke like a partisan, and naturally. She belonged to a nation that had lost its freedom, and the hope of betrayed France lay in the victory of the Allies who had pledged to restore freedom to their erstwhile Ally. "Axis Powers' triumph would bring India to a fate comparable to that inflicted on Poland and France. That is why the average citizen of conquered countries puts his belief and hope in Allied victory," she said.

"India can win her laurels only through non-violence," said Gandhiji to her. "What we have achieved during the last twenty years shows what immense results could be obtained if the principle of non-violence was generally practised by our people."

"But," said Miss Curie, using the stock argument, "Indians will have a tougher time opposing by non-violence German and Japanese divisions than undermining British rule."

"Quite possible," said Gandhiji. "But this is the hour to live up to our faith. If the Japanese invaded India, I would not encourage our people to fight with arms. Neither would I suffer them to make a pact with aggressors. Our struggle will be hard, but it will bring out the best in us."

"So you accept the idea of India refusing to fight or even to be defended by others?"

"It is physically impossible to transform India suddenly into an armed nation. To give our people weapons and to teach them non-violence are two different methods of making them strong. Both take time. I simply believe that my method is surer, more precise, and in the long run more successful. In order to beat the Japanese and German armies by force, you must become stronger than they are, and therefore worse and more ruthless. Then what have you won? Nothing. On the contrary, nations fighting with non-violence are unconquerable, for their strength does not depend on the number of rifles and machine-guns they possess. And when the method is good, there is no need to worry about immediate results. Success is bound to come in the end. In a non-violent struggle there are two alternatives: either the enemy comes to terms with you, then you win without blood; or the enemy annihilates you. This last solution is not worse than what a violent war in any case brings about. I don't blame you for wanting to liberate France just as I want to see India free; but it is a sign of too great impatience to think that any country can really be liberated by use of arms."

The American and British correspondents tried to take a more detached view, and thus succeeded in drawing Gandhiji into a fairly long argument. They requested Gandhiji to say something generally about the situation. "I would not like to say anything," said Gandhiji. "All I can talk about is my special subject, viz. how non-violence can work in the difficult circumstances of today. But what use is that to you? Is it relevant? As war correspondents, it will not interest you."

"No, sir," said Mr. Moorehead, "anything you say would be of importance."

"Well, then," said Gandhiji, "it puzzles me to find fine people deriding non-violence, when it is emphatically made clear that non-violence requires greater courage, though both the violent and non-violent men have to face death. The one inflicts death and destruction; the other inflicts no death but endeavours to gain what he wants by death, if he has to die. Let us take the instance of China. If that mighty nation said to the Japanese hordes, 'Do what you like, we will not cooperate with you'?"

"It did happen to some extent. But it did not succeed."

"No, it should have happened to the fullest extent. A sufferer from malaria must take the full course of quinine—say thirty grains for the prescribed number of days—and cannot stop short midway."

"But if the Japanese were to run over the whole of China?"

"They cannot do so. They have to cut to pieces every man and woman before they do so. Violent warfare requires tremendous previous training; not so non-violent warfare. It is not the skill of arms, but the skill of the heart. It will mean an immensely larger number of men and women in the field; it will be a living wall. If the nation is trained in non-violent warfare, it will give no kind of cooperation to Japan, who will have either of the two alternatives—exterminating the whole of the Chinese race (assuming that the whole nation participates), or retiring and leaving the country free."

"But the Japanese will do no such thing. They will quietly occupy the country, consume the food crops, etc. Or do you suggest that the Chinese will destroy the crops?"

"The Chinese will destroy nothing—not a single crop grown with patient toil. But the Japanese cannot use the crops, because there will be a human Chinese wall between the Japanese and the crops, if the Chinese can bring that non-violent courage into play."

"But what about a nation (like Japan) which has no heart?"

"Then China has a victorious death."

"If the whole of India takes to non-violence, the Japanese will enter India."

"That being the assumption, you can see that the Japanese cannot have India without mowing down 350 million people."

"But they will land."

"I grant that."

"You will also have to grant that the Japanese are evil people bringing a crop of evils to India. In that case non-violence will succeed in inviting results which you would never desire."

The correspondents had probably in mind the stories of Japanese and Nazi brutalities in China and Poland respectively, e. g. the injection of various poisons in defenceless men and women, rapes, etc.

"Non-violent resistance means resistance to all these things. I am prepared to assume the worst."

If Japan will kill every man and woman, we will be the better for it."

"So the only hope of survival is non-violence?"

"Yes. What is happening today is mutual slaughter."

"You mean to say that violence will cause worse evils in the long run?"

"I do not admit that the evils of non-violence in the short run will be greater, if that is what you mean. The evils of violence both in the short and the long runs are terrible. The only evil, if you will call it so, of non-violence is voluntary death. But I proceed all the while on the assumption that the stoniest heart will melt, given sufficient non-violence."

The war correspondents went on putting questions one after another, deeply interested.

"But how would people protect their food? By surrounding it?"

"In the technique I have assumed, while there is a single Chinaman living, the Japanese cannot help themselves to the crops. They will have to kill all."

The whole argument rested up till now on the fact that we were an unarmed nation. But if we had arms? Would we then too talk of non-violence? That was the next question.

"Then I would say," said Gandhiji, "choose. Why kill the Japanese who have the same skin, the same eyes, the same ears, the same minds as we have? It is easier to lay down arms than to take others' lives. Why not lay down arms and be killed?"

"But that would be, if you had inferior arms. If you were superior to them in military strength?"

"The same answer—for it would be beneath human dignity to crush one's inferior."

"I see. There are three alternative situations to which you react with the same answer for different reasons. If you are inferior—do not fight. If you are equals—the mutual slaughter is useless. If you are superior—it is beneath human dignity. So there is no compromise on any point between British policy and yours. There is thus no hope of a settlement?"

"You are trying to catch me," said Gandhiji laughing. "I like your quick grasp of what I am saying. I will not say, 'There can be no settlement.' On the basis of non-violence a settlement is always possible. But I know I am treading here on delicate ground."

"You are not thinking of a surrender, I hope," said the American friend.

"Never any idea of a surrender. That is what I said in my open letters to the Czechs and to every Briton. I am sorry that my words have been wrenched from the context and my appeal has been distorted both in England and America."

"Then our difference is a difference of degree, not of principle. For both of us want to avoid war, if it were possible, and both want India to remain for the Indians."

"You may put it that way, if you like, but our means are different. No one will, however, admit that it is only a difference of degree."

PLANNED ECONOMY

The following is an abridged version of Shri J. C. Kumarappa's illuminating article in the March issue of The Indian Journal of Social Work on the Gandhian approach to planned economy.

The writer maintains that while planned economy is new to the Occident it was the rule in India and, what is more, while the Western plans are conceived purely from the economic standpoint the Indian is all-inclusive, covering the political, social and religious aspects too. Inasmuch as our ancient social order was planned to fulfil the requirements of people thousands of years ago it cannot cater in detail to the needs of today, but the soundness of the eternal principles on which it was based remain. It was based on the philosophy of non-violence. Gandhiji clings to this ancient culture with might and main, and that is why we also find him battling for our political freedom through non-violent means. "Freedom for the individual means freedom to do what is right, to think for himself and express his thoughts and to work for himself as and how he likes. Freedom implies duties, rights and limitations. Our rights are curbed by our duties to others. When the curbing comes from within we have a society based on non-violence." Naturally when the curbing is external, society has to depend on force. But true freedom cannot be in a State based on violence. In the modern highly organised States, like Germany and Italy, citizenship has become a form of slavery to the State. Fear, hatred and suspicion are bred, man becomes selfish, materialistic; his growth and evolution are unnatural and therefore ephemeral. If then we are to save ourselves and rebuild on solid foundations, we have to preclude violent methods and resort to cultural means to develop the individual. Self-discipline and self-control are the pivots on which a non-violent society can work. They cannot be developed in a day. "Superficial experience and knowledge do not produce culture; it comes only with the permeation of experience into the subconscious self. It will involve considerable conscious effort." A cultural standard means a standard based on eternal values. It is as poles apart from the money values which dominate Western civilisation. These have led to the glorification of wealth and violence, whereas in a non-violent society the emphasis will be on the renunciation of property and the dedication to service. There is always a temptation to mistake the means for the end; but Gandhiji has with unerring precision pointed to the non-violent way in economics, social reform, education and politics.

Economics. If we concede that the wealth of a nation does not consist in what the few possess but in the majority being able to satisfy their daily wants, we shall have to condemn centralised methods of production. Cottage industries which will distribute wealth must predominate in a country where there is no shortage of labour but where capital is deficient. Methods of production must, therefore, be adopted which involve little or no capital and for which raw materials and a ready local market for finished products are easily available. The money spent on village industries goes towards payment of wages, whereas the bulk of expenditure on mills is for overhead charges, sales organisation and materials. Unlike the economics of the West which are dictated by prices, the prosperity of an agricultural people demands high prices. The capitalistic system depends for its development on the helplessness of its customers. It kills initiative—the opposite is the case with cottage industries. Division of labour there must be, but drudgery makes an automaton of man, while work intelligently performed develops the individual both mentally and spiritually. The writer stresses the necessity of cow protection in any scheme of economic reconstruction in an agricultural country, in particular, for obvious reasons. He wants exhibitions to be centres of education and research, not organised merely to attract sales. People should know what they buy, how it is produced, and why khadi, to take one example, is the only type of cloth one should buy from the moral and humane standpoint. "For a business transaction does not begin and end with the transfer of goods and payment of money. It involves the consideration of one's duties to one's fellow men."

Social Reform. In the matter of social reform emphasis is laid on communal unity, untouchability, prohibition, sanitation and hygiene, and uplift of women. All these connote the right relationship between man and man and are essential to a well-ordered society.

Education. In the matter of education the urgency of instruction through the mother-tongue is stressed. It is surely violence to do otherwise, and the English medium of instruction has been one of the biggest crimes committed by the alien power against our motherland. The value of basic education or education through a craft is being gradually acknowledged by most countries. For us, as Gandhiji has said, it is the only type of education that will develop the minds and bodies of our children.

Politics. Most interesting of all is the portion on non-violence in politics. The main difference between Gandhiji's approach and that of most politicians is that the former looks upon political power as a means to serve the masses better, while with the latter politics is an end in itself usually culminating in a political career and enjoyment of power and patronage. The moment Gandhiji entered into politics in India he brushed aside the city outlook and told us that the roots of politics were in village India. The essence of democracy is that the executive and legislative power must be vested in the people—in each individual. Each citizen must be capable of being a law unto himself; and if the State is to work for the common good, a high standard of moral individual development is essential. Democracy in the West differs little from the totalitarian States. They are based on rights. An emphasis on rights leads to conflict ultimately. In the non-violent approach the emphasis is on duties. The one may be said to be the primitive stage, the other a high stage of evolution. When each citizen is disciplined to act on what is right, he can be trusted not to abuse executive and legislative power. It follows that there will then be no place for armed forces. The effort, in Gandhiji's plan, is to ennoble man. Satyagraha invites self-suffering. There is no room in it for the baser elements of human nature. It is an appeal to the higher nature in man.

Government. Those items which have to be undertaken in the common interests of the nation will be detailed out to a group of trusted men. Their pay will be on the basis of the earnings of the average citizen of a village. Today this income is about a rupee a month. "The best of village industries cannot pay more than about Rs. 75 per mensem per family. Hence even a salary of Rs. 200 p. m. for a Commissioner of a Division would be on the liberal side." Everything, including emoluments, professional fees etc., would be on a standard in keeping with the country's capacity to pay.

The Government—apart from efficient administration—has to be the chief partner in the business of the people. Therefore it should control forests, minerals, power resources, and communications for the economic betterment of the people. Today, for example, only the revenue-yielding capacity of forests weighs with the Government. Mines and quarries are treasure houses. They may be exhausted by exploitation. The ores may not be sent out of the country as they are today. A Swaraj Government will help the people to use them in their industries.

Supply of cheap power and light must be provided by the Government. Roads, canals, railways, shipping etc. all have to be provided by the Government too, but all must be in the people's interests. Today railways in many instances impoverish the people by depriving them of employment.

Taxation. This may not fall heavily on the taxpayer who is below the subsistence level. Taxes from the villages today go to benefit the towns. This must cease. Taxes may also be collected in kind. Allowances to officials can be met partly in kind. This system worked well in ancient times, still prevails in most Muslim countries, and is employed with satisfaction today in the Pathan States of the North West Frontier Province. Money from taxation should as far as possible be spent on the area from where it is gathered.

Large-scale Industries. There will be a restricted field for these, but they must be State-owned and State-managed. Within those limits there is a large field of service for such units. If run on a service basis, their natural place can only be as part of the Government organisation of the country.

TREACHEROUS JAPAN OR COMPLACENT BRITAIN?

(By Rammanohar Lohia)

The Japanese victories are incredible. But the British attempt to explain them is fantastic, at least in one direction. It is said that Japan struck treacherously, and that her onslaught was so sudden that the Briton in Asia was taken unawares and the swift series of Japanese victories inevitably followed. Had I been a friend of the British Empire in Asia, I would have called this explanation subtle fifth column work, an attempt to sleep-dose the patient before his death.

Let us recall the first act in what is now misnamed Japanese treachery. A good two years before the war in Malaya broke out a British Commission of expert Generals and such like investigated into the defences of the country. It reported that the soil of Malaya was too soft to bear the weight of 10 and 15 ton tanks. Bren-gun carriers were, therefore, ordered for the defence of the country. One may easily guess the surprised and tortured faces of the British commanders, when the Japanese actually marched into Malaya with their heavy tanks. Were these really tanks? But the experts had said no! Unless it is suggested that the British experts were bribed by the Japanese — and I have nowhere heard this charge made — it would be ridiculous to call this first collapse of Britain in Malaya an act of Japanese treachery. The British experts are foolishly ignorant, although excellent diners and winners who dance through the small hours.

The second act of the Malayan collapse has something similar to tell about the British administrator. Some six months before the Malaya war broke out, a deputation of Indians waited upon Governor Shenton and asked for shelters and other precautions against air raid. The reply of the Governor was characteristic. After gentlemenning the deputationists, he pooh-poohed the idea of a Japanese attack on Malaya, oh, the tiny Japanese craft against the mighty British navy, and added that, although a very occasional bomber might come, that surely would be nothing so serious as to worry about. This amazing complacency was not the monopoly of the British administrator; it was shared by the army-man. May I ask to be told the number of hours that elapsed between the first request for instructions from Kota Bahru and the reply from the Headquarters?

The good and frank Americans have given us documentary evidence of this amazing complacency in their own ranks. The Pearl Harbour authorities were far too complacent to listen to the panicky calls from Washington! The British and Americans do not yet realise that enslaved Asia has its own way of revenge. Through constant association with our kow-towing gentry and because of their mounting luxury at our expense the Gentlemen of the East combine an overdose of arrogance with an underdose of grit.

Naval and air bases on the coast are of no importance unless the hinterland is secure. The real security of Britain in the Mediterranean, it was so well said years ago, was not the little rock of Gibraltar but Don Alfonso of Spain. The Alfonso tribe in Asia, even where it exists, is barren. The British themselves have castrated it. Did not the lifts of Singapore carry a notice, until a few months ago and perhaps even up to the date of surrender, that Asiatics, unless carrying heavy loads, were not permitted to use them? Have not motor cars been commandeered from Indian owners in Burma ostensibly for the war effort but actually for the evacuation of Europeans? And an Indian refugee has come back to this country with the pathetic story of how, when he was trekking, he glimpsed his car and British evacuees inside. Indians and Burmans have no inducement to fight the battles of Britain against Japan; it is the other way about.

Indians are a humbled and humiliated Asiatic race, let us not run away from that fact. And Japan is an Asiatic power. Had I been trained merely in the European ethic and not been impressed by Mahatma Gandhi and what I consider as the nobler side of my history, I would have hailed Tojo. He is not merely defeating Britain, that is a small affair, he has outclassed Hitler. If Hitler can strike over a thousand mile front, Tojo is fighting over how many thousand miles, I do not know. As the Indian idiom goes, Tojo has proved to be the uncle of Hitler. That is a matter of vicarious satisfaction for all Asiatics. As it is, I regard Tojo just as wicked as Hitler or Churchill, for, if this wretched slaughter were to end in the victory of one or the other, my hopes for a better world are dashed.

It is perhaps too late for Britain to save India and, presumably, too early for India to save Britain. But what we can do, Indians and Britons alike, is to attempt to save the whole world. That is not so absurd as it sounds. Formulate a genuine basis for a free and peaceful world, and ask every warring power to accept it and, should some powers prove too greedy and arrogant, it might then be a different war for the Asiatics.

[I do hope that this note will receive the attention it deserves from all concerned.

TEN QUESTIONS RE: THE NATIONAL LANGUAGE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

1. Q. The Persian script did not originate in India. It came during the Moghul period just as the Roman script has with the advent of the British. But you do not advocate the Roman script for the national language. Why then the Persian?

A. If the Roman script had made a home for itself in India in the same way as the Persian, I would agree with you. But the knowledge of the former is confined to a mere handful of English-knowing persons, while crores of Hindus and Muslims are conversant with the latter. You should try to find out the exact number of persons knowing the Roman and Persian scripts respectively.

2. Q. If you advocate the learning of Urdu for the sake of Hindu-Muslim unity, then please remember that a large number of Mussalmans in India do not know Urdu. They are conversant only with their own provincial languages. These people would far more easily understand a national language comprising of words familiar to the provincial languages. The Northern India languages are all derived from Sanskrit and therefore resemble each other a good deal. Sanskrit words have even crept to a large extent into the Southern languages. Then why advocate for these people the learning of an unfamiliar Urdu tongue full of Arabic and Persian words?

A. There is force in your argument. But I would like you to delve a little deeper into the question. I admit that in asking people to learn the Persian script I have at the back of my mind a contribution to Hindu-Muslim unity. There has been a long-standing conflict between the Hindi and Urdu tongues as between the two scripts. Today it has assumed a virulent form. In 1935 in Indore the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, while defining Hindi, gave a definite place to the Persian script. In 1925 the Congress gave the national language the name of Hindustani. Both scripts were made permissible. Thus Hindi plus Urdu was recognised as the national language. The question of Hindu-Muslim unity was definitely in the forefront in all these decisions. I have not raised this issue today. I have only given it a concrete form. It is a logical outcome of events. If we want to develop the national language to the fullest extent, it behoves us to give the two scripts an equal status. In the end whichever is appreciated more by the people will be the more wide-spread.

The provincial languages are closely allied to Sanskrit, and it is true that lacs of Muslims are conversant only with their provincial languages, and that Hindi and the Devnagri script will, therefore, be easier for them to learn than Urdu and the Persian characters. My scheme will not interfere with this. In fact the people will benefit more than ever by learning the Persian script. Your trouble arises because you look upon this as a burden. Whether it is a gain or a burden depends on the outlook of the learner. He who is filled with a love of country will never consider such learning a burden. There will be no compulsion by my scheme. Only those who consider it a gain will learn the Persian script or the Devnagri as the case may be.

3. Q. A very large proportion of persons in India know the Devnagri script. Surely Punjabis, Sindhis and the Frontier folk can easily learn it too.

A. The reply to this is really embodied in the preceding answer. Frontier people and others will have to learn the Devnagri script.

4. Q. A national language is really more for speech than literary purposes. Its script is, therefore, not so essential or is, at any rate, of secondary importance. Moreover is it not easier to learn the national language through one's mother-tongue? And where would be the harm in so doing?

A. You are right. It is easier to learn the national language through one's mother-tongue. As far as I know this is being done in Southern India though perhaps not systematically. Unlike you I do not look upon the learning of two scripts as a burden. It is not so hard as you fear. I can never be opposed to the learning of the national language through the mother-tongue. Given the keenness to learn it, all systems will be employed.

5. Q. If it is not possible to make real contacts with the non-Hindi-knowing provinces until some of us have learnt the national language, why not limit the acquiring of this knowledge to workers only? Why make it obligatory for the whole of India?

A. The question of everyone learning Hindustani does not arise. Indeed everyone will never do so. The necessity is for those who have to travel and those who want to serve. The latter's ability for service will be greatly increased by a knowledge of both languages and scripts. If you agree, your opposition and suspicion should subside.

6. Q. Today the national language is written in both scripts. Whoever wants to learn can choose the one he prefers. Why the insistence on both?

A. In spite of my so-called insistence, only those will learn it who find real gain in so doing. In my eyes he who knows only one of the languages and one script will be half-equipped. If he desires a full certificate from me, he must be conversant with both. I am sure you will have no objection to the desirability of there being many such persons in the country. And unless this number goes on increasing there will never be a proper blending of Hindi and Urdu. The Congress ideal of Hindustani will never be fulfilled. That Hindus and Mussalmans in the Hindi-knowing provinces should have a common speech is a consummation devoutly to be wished. Many of us cling to this hope, and some day it will certainly come to pass.

7. Q. Will it not be a terrible burden and a futile endeavour for people of the non-Hindi-speaking provinces to learn the national language through both scripts at the same time? To learn first one and then the other would surely be simple.

A. The answer to this will best come from experience. He who does not know either script will not learn both at the same time. He will master one before commencing on the other. So far as the vocabulary is concerned the words used in the textbooks in the early stages will more or less be the same. I look upon my scheme as a most important and useful experiment. If it is properly worked, it will be found to have energised the nation and made a big contribution towards giving practical shape to the Congress resolution. I hope lacs of patriotic men and women will take to it.

8. Q. Certain changes must inevitably take place in any language, as for example, the ingress of foreign words which become part of the language and cannot be evicted. But Devnagri has been the traditional script all through the ages. During the period of the Moghul dynasty the Persian script came in. But Gujarati, Marathi, etc., while assimilating Persian, Arabic and English words, have not abandoned the script. Why should the Devnagri script then not be maintained?

A. There is no question of giving up anything that is ours by tradition. It is a question of adding to or improving what already exists. If I know Sanskrit, what harm if I learn Arabic too, or vice versa? The result will probably be an enrichment of my knowledge of either language. And my contacts with the Arabs or Hindus, as the case may be, will increase. Surely there can be no opposition to the acquiring of right knowledge in any sphere.

9. Q. From the point of view of easy mastery over the pronunciation of the national language, is not the Devnagri script the best? The Persian script is surely defective for the purpose.

A. You are right, but your opposition to the Persian script has no place here. Devnagri is not to be displaced. It is a question of adding to the existing knowledge.

10. Q. Where is the need for a national language? Will not the mother-tongue and an international language suffice? And then why not the Roman script for both?

A. Your question surprises me. English no doubt is the international language. But can it ever be our national language? The latter must be the common property of millions of our people. How can they sustain the burden of learning the English tongue? Hindustani is the natural national language, for it is already understood by 21 crores. The remainder of the population can also easily understand it. But English may be said to be the mother-tongue of a mere handful—say, a lac at the most. If India is a nation, it must have a national language. English will appropriately remain the international language with the Roman script. But the latter can never be the script of the national language.

HANDICRAFT AND EDUCATION

(By E. W. Aryanayakam)

In discussing the fundamental principle underlying the system of Basic National Education, that education should centre round some form of manual and productive work, and all other activities to be developed or training to be given should, as far as possible, be integrally related to the central handicraft chosen with due regard to the environment of the child, we have often been confronted with the question: "Can you tell us of any other countries where this system is being practised?" In answer to this question the following extracts from the Bulletin of the International Bureau of Education (Geneva) will be found interesting. What is going on in the countries mentioned has been here reduced to a science.

Switzerland

The Swiss Society of Handwork and School Reform has launched an appeal to all the Swiss communes to allot a piece of land for cultivation by the upper classes in the school. It asks that the scholars should carry through the whole process of working the land, sowing seed, tending the young plants, observing and studying the growth of the plants, keeping records of their observations, harvesting the crops and calculating the turnover, and preparing the soil for the next year. By planting vegetables the pupils will be helping the commune to increase the area of land under cultivation. The Department of Public Instruction of the Canton of Vaud publishes this appeal in its official Bulletin of Feb-March 1941; and asks the Vaudois municipal and school authorities to carry it into effect.

A report published by the Education Commission of the National Alliance of Women's Societies shows that in 1939 and in 1940 the majority of cantons encouraged schoolchildren to help with agriculture. Several of them opened labour exchanges so that the young helpers could be sent to the peasants most needing their help. Apart from this, many teachers and youth leaders organised agricultural work days for their classes or groups. The "relief" troops, for example, helped with the potato harvest or with weeding.

U. S. S. R.

The ten-year education plan introduced in 1932 makes it compulsory for children to attend school for ten years. There are three classes of schools for general education: (1) pre-school; (2) single labour school; (3) institutions for protection and education of homeless and ill-treated children and defectives. The pre-school group, for children between the ages of 3 and 7, includes children's homes, day nurseries, kindergarten, supervised playgrounds and evening recreation rooms. The single labour schools correspond to the elementary and secondary schools. They are divided into interrelated standards allowing the pupil to pass from lower to higher grades. Essential features of the system are practical training in the use of the simplest tools of all industries and the close connection between teaching and the economic needs and developments of the country. There are three main types in this group of schools: (1) elementary for ages 8 to 11, consisting of four classes; secondary for ages 8 to 14 with seven classes; (3) secondary for ages 8 to 17 with ten classes. All the three types are co-educational and free of charge. The attendance growth at these schools has been remarkable, altogether out of proportion with the increase in the number of schools, resulting in serious overcrowding and the necessity of arranging for the children to attend school in three shifts. From the lower schools the pupils pass into the technical schools, which are of five types: (1) elementary technical schools which are the trade schools, workshop schools and training workshops; (2) secondary technical schools or institutes; (3) workers' faculties; (4) higher educational institutes and special technical schools; (5) non-school technical courses.

BEGGING FOR HARIJANS

"This practice of charging a price for an autograph is peculiar to Mr. Gandhi," said a foreigner. "No other leader in India and none in other countries charges anything for his autographs. The request for an autograph is itself an honour and should not be charged for like this. Besides one may like to pay Rs. 5 for some object other than the one that is dear to Mr. Gandhi." Well, Gandhiji knows that it is a practice peculiar to himself, but he also knows that it is he alone who has invested a useless, if a harmless, hobby with value and purpose. (I remember, though, that Gurudev once in London fixed a price of one pound for his autograph and used the collections for Visvabharati.)

Without a price attached it adds perhaps to the sense of possession of the owner of the album, and often becomes a nuisance to the giver of the autograph who at all hours of the day and on all occasions is pursued by the autograph-hunters. With the price attached it blesseth him that gives and him that takes, and also the poor Harijan. Thus it is not twice but thrice blessed. As for those to whom the cause does not appeal or who do not want to pay, the best thing is not to covet the autograph.

But I began this note not to give a reply to the foreign critic, but in order to tell those who do not know that Gandhiji tries to serve the Harijan brethren in a variety of ways, and this is one of the many. I have not got the exact figures, but I am not far wrong when I say that every year Gandhiji gets a few thousand rupees for the Harijans by signing autographs. If he did the continual travelling that he used to do when he was much stronger, he would earn very much more.

The other practice is begging for Harijans during travel and after the evening prayers. It is amazing how at small wayside stations poor people come in to put a few coppers into his outstretched palm for the benefit of the Harijans. Often he is too preoccupied to go to the carriage door. I have seen people coming unasked to pay their mite for the Harijans. They know that it is usual for him, whenever he travels, to beg for the Harijans, and if preoccupation or silence makes him omit the task, they remind him of it.

The readers may be interested to know that during his recent stay in Delhi, over and above the autographs, he collected quite a fair amount at the evening prayers. For the first day the prayer was noisy and disturbed by sight-seers, but from the next day only those who cared to join in a devout spirit came. (It may be remembered that Birla House is a long distance from Old Delhi.) One day a young man asked for Gandhiji's autograph as this collection was being made. He signed it, as usual, in Hindi. The young man happened to be a Tamilian. But he did not ask Gandhiji to sign his name in English. Instead he said: "Please also sign in Tamil." "I shall try," said Gandhiji, "but you will have to pay another five rupees." "I have paid ten, Mahatmaji," said the young man laughing, and he watched Gandhiji scratching his head to remember his Tamil alphabet and sign his name in Tamil, letter after letter. But the autograph was perfect without a mistake, so much so that the young man exclaimed: "It is flawless. Mahatmaji, your memory is wonderful." With these words, he gave another ten for the autograph. "But nothing for my memory feat? I have passed creditably and you must give me a prize." A third ten rupee note came immediately out of his pocket, and Gandhiji said in great delight: "Thirty rupees for the Harijans within a few seconds. They will bless you."

The figures of the evening collections at Delhi will be of interest (note the pice and even half-pice):

FOREIGN SOLDIERS IN INDIA

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Among the multitude of questions contained in my correspondence is the one referring to the advent of foreign soldiers in India. We have foreign prisoners enough. Now we have promise of a never-ending stream of soldiers from America and possibly China. I must confess that I do not look upon this event with equanimity. Cannot a limitless number of soldiers be trained out of India's millions? Would they not make as good fighting material as any in the world? Then why foreigners? We know what American aid means. It amounts in the end to American influence, if not American rule added to British. It is a tremendous price to pay for the possible success of Allied arms. I see no Indian freedom peeping through all this preparation for the so-called defence of India. It is a preparation pure and simple for the defence of the British Empire, whatever may be asserted to the contrary. If the British left India to her fate as they had to leave Singapore, non-violent India would not lose anything. Probably the Japanese would leave India alone. Perhaps India, if the main parties composed their differences as they probably would, would be able effectively to help China in the way of peace and in the long run may even play a decisive part in the promotion of world peace. But all these happy things may not happen, if the British will leave India only when they must. How much more creditable, how much braver it would be for Britain to offer battle in the West and leave the East to adjust her own position! There is no guarantee that she will be able to protect, during this war, all her vast possessions. They have become a dead weight round her. If she wisely loosens herself from this weight, and the Nazis, the Fascists or the Japanese instead of leaving India alone choose to subjugate her, they will find that they have to hold more than they can in their iron hoop. They will find it much more difficult than Britain has. Their very rigidity will strangle them. The British system had an elasticity which served so long as it had no powerful rivals. British elasticity is of no help today. I have said more than once in these columns that the Nazi power had risen as a nemesis to punish Britain for her sins of exploitation and enslavement of the Asiatic and African races.

Whatever the consequences, therefore, to India, her real safety and Britain's too lie in orderly and timely British withdrawal from India. All talk of treaties with the Princes and obligations towards minorities are a British creation designed for the preservation of British rule and British interests. It must melt before the stern reality that faces all of us. Princes, in so far as they rely upon their armed strength, are more than able to defend themselves against unarmed India. The fiction of majority and minority will vanish like the mist before the morning sun of liberty. Truth to tell there will be neither majority nor minority in the absence of the paralysing British arms. The millions of India would then be an undefined but one mass of humanity. I have no doubt that at that time the natural leaders will have wisdom enough to evolve an honourable solution of their difficulties. This presupposes Japan and other powers leaving India alone. If they do not, I should hope even then for wisdom to guide the principal parties to devise a scheme whereby they can act with one mind to face the new menace.

Holding the views I do, it is clear why I look upon the introduction of foreign soldiers as a positive danger thoroughly to be deplored and distrusted. The present state of things and the attempt to uphold it are a distinct sign of corroding consumption of the body politic in India.

Deenbandhu Andrews Memorial

Deenbandhu Andrews Memorial and Gurudev Memorial are convertible terms. Gurudev had initiated the Deenbandhu Memorial, but before it had fully materialised Gurudev followed Deenbandhu. Therefore Deenbandhu Memorial has become also Gurudev Memorial. The purpose is worthy of the two great souls — the improvement and upkeep of Santiniketan, Visvabharati and Sriniketan. These are all in reality one. It is a matter of great shame and sorrow that the paltry sum of five lacs of rupees has still not come whether from the rich or the students or the labour world. Everybody admits that Gurudev and his institution have brought a name and prestige to India which no one and nothing else have done. It was Santiniketan which stirred Generalissimo and Madame Chiang Kai-shek who gave very handsome contributions. For the work done at Santiniketan, the expense is ridiculously small. The reason is the comparatively low salaries paid where the work done is not purely honorary. The donations so far collected amount to nearly one lac. I hope that the balance will be forthcoming without delay and absolve me from having to venture out on a collection tour. I am in honour bound to finish the collection. When Gurudev was dying the last letter I wrote to him was that, if it was God's will, I would finish the Deenbandhu collection. It was also a trust handed by Andrews in that Santiniketan's financial condition was his daily concern. It is a call from these two servants of India and humanity which I dare not neglect. Let those who revere their memory and who value Gurudev's living creation help me to discharge the self-imposed trust.

CREED v. POLICY OF NON-VIOLENCE

(By Kailas Nath Katju)

[More than a month ago Dr. Katju sent to Shri Kishorelal Mashruwala what may be called a short thesis on non-violence. The latter was to decide what to make of it and, if he liked, show it to me. Shri Mashruwala gave it to me some time ago. But I could get time to read it only during the journey. I read it carefully. It was too long for publication in Harijan; and yet I felt that it should be placed before the readers of Harijan in some form. The following is the result. I have spent considerable time in reducing the original without leaving out the essential argument. I wholly agree with Dr. Katju that non-violence cannot make further headway without the Congress making it a creed. He suggests that there should be a plan to show how it can be worked under given circumstances. He suggested a book or a series for the guidance of the votaries. Much literature has sprung up on the subject. Richard Gregg has spent years of labour in research. He has written text-books for the guidance of the votaries of the West. His books are very readable. Let Dr. Katju set apart time for producing a book which would be a guide for us in India at this critical hour.

On the train to Wardha, 5-4-42 M. K. G.]

The efficiency of non-violence with non-cooperation as a potent instrument of defence against external aggression has been very much discussed during the last three years. Gandhiji has emphasised that what can win us our freedom from British control must also prove equally useful to protect that freedom from violent attack. But the Working Committee were not prepared to go that length, and they said so in the well-known Wardha resolution last year. They thought that the country was not prepared to go that length. In this, I think, the Working Committee were quite right.

The shattering events of the last two years in the present war have influenced men in different ways. From many, with the growing realisation of India's utter defencelessness, there is an insistent demand for rapid 'militarisation' and industrialisation. On others, however, the reaction has been in a contrary direction, and they now realise vividly, as never before, the utter futility of resort to violence for purposes of defence. The collapse of strong, well-armed armies in Poland, Norway, France, Yugoslavia and Greece, and last of all the carnage in Russia, have shown to them—and I am one of those persons—that armed defence leads nowhere. If civilisation and human liberties are to be saved, we must seek and ensure peace by means of non-violence. It is obvious that non-violence can be of no use to nations imperialistically inclined to conquer and exploit others. That, I take it, is not the ambition of any Indian. So the question is only of the defence of a free India.

It must be conceded that, though the Congress has been working on non-violent lines for the last twenty years, that has only been as a matter of policy. Leaving Gandhiji aside our leaders have not presented to the people the excellent doctrine of non-violence with all its possibilities and implications. Few, very few, have believed in it as a creed; and anyone who advocates its adoption as a mere matter of policy is likely to break down at the critical juncture. I think that on those of us who believe in the matchless efficacy of non-violence and non-cooperation as an instrument of defence and protection against external aggression now rests the duty of infusing into and inspiring our countrymen with that faith.

Previous preparation is essential. Just as you cannot turn an ordinary citizen into a trained and disciplined soldier overnight or manufacture guns and aeroplanes in a week, similarly you require time and patience to train a whole people in the art of non-violence and non-cooperation.

Violence has stolen a long march during thousands of years. There are so many misconceptions to be removed. Non-violence is unintelligible to so many. To some it is a counsel of perfection, fit for rishis only. To others it is stupid; there is seemingly such a childlike faith in violence. Non-violence ceases to be stupid when it is considered as non-cooperation. The present-day aggressor does not conquer in order to exterminate and settle down. He conquers or seeks to conquer in order to exploit, and it is at that stage that non-cooperation comes in.

We have to explain, to expound, to remove doubts, and to endeavour to make even the lame, the halt and the blind into heroes. All this requires time and devoted effort. And this can only be done with any reasonable prospect of success by those who themselves have a firm faith in the efficacy of the method of non-violence and whose personal lives are regulated by that faith. You cannot possibly divorce this doctrine from the purest and highest morals. And no distinction should be drawn between personal and public affairs. What is ethically bad in an individual is equally bad for a community and a nation. We must believe that it is feasible to conduct public affairs on that basis, and we must ourselves act accordingly to the best of our power and ability; and we must endeavour, by precept and example, to create a similar belief in our countrymen at large. Without this belief, I am convinced, non-violence cannot make any headway at all. Therefore those who advocate non-violence must live a life of non-violence, not resisting evil with evil but sterilising it with non-cooperation. The non-cooperation has to be above reproach.

I am by no means pessimistic of success, if only those of us who profess faith in non-violence are true to our creed. All philosophy seems to inculcate non-violence and chastity in thought and conduct and love of truth. The masses will follow, if properly educated in the doctrine. The doctrine of ahimsa has ever been there, and people have, all through the history of the race, regulated their private life by it. It is Gandhiji's contribution to world welfare that he has taught us to apply non-violence and non-cooperation in the field of politics and public affairs also. This is a signal experiment and should succeed particularly in India if we proceed on right lines.

It is from this point of view that I suggest that, while we must endeavour by all truthful and non-violent methods to persuade our countrymen to cling to the path of non-violence to aim at conducting the government of the country by non-violent methods and to win our independence and retain and protect it by non-violence and non-cooperation, there should be no such thing as an effort to capture power in the vulgar sense of the word. The idea of 'capture' more often than not connotes use of Tammany Hall methods, political jugglery and cunning, and improper and corrupt practices. There is no place for these in our scheme of things. We can only succeed, if we have the people genuinely behind us. Political power, not resting on the willing and genuine consent of a vast majority of the people, can only function, in the last resort, by the use of force and violence; and that use we forbid to ourselves. So our whole programme of action must be directed to persuade the people to our ways of thinking by methods of public education, study circles, public meetings, private discussions and the Press, and above all by our exemplary lives.

Insistence on mere non-violence without concrete action is apt to be misleading. You have all sorts of conundrums put before you to show that non-violence is merely another name for cowardice and timidity. This false notion is partly due to the fact that equal insistence is not laid upon non-cooperation. Non-violence and non-cooperation are two wheels of the chariot. And taken together they require the greatest courage and sacrifice in their votaries. It is the weapon, as Gandhiji is never tired of saying, of the bravest; and what is more, it is the bravery of spirit that is the requisite thing. Thus it permits everyone, man, woman and child, the strong as well as the weak in body, to avail of it, provided one is stout-hearted and firm of faith and devoid of fear. It is non-cooperation which gives power and strength to non-violence, readiness to die, and a determined refusal to obey and cooperate with evil.

Just consider our present situation. We blame Gandhiji for lack of complete success in our political struggle for freedom, and we cavil at the method he advises. But have we really followed his advice? Is not British rule in its entirety based on our own cooperation? Do we not serve our masters and often even take pride and glory in such service? The army, the police and the Civil Services are manned by us, and our brightest young men labour strenuously to put on such shackles and consider them adornments. We are ourselves—I refer particularly to the English-educated middle classes—the greatest sinners; and yet we blame Gandhiji. And has the method really failed? In spite of our tragic shortcomings, in spite of our weakness of faith, in spite of our half-hearted and apologetic pursuit of the method as a mere matter of policy, our success has been great indeed. The political awakening among the masses is marvellous.

The administration of a big country like India cannot be carried on by any foreigner, the Englishman or whoever he may be, without Indian cooperation. And if that cooperation is withheld, foreign domination is not possible. This is the lesson we have to burn into our minds, the minds of the masses as well as of the classes.

It is in this sense wholly true to say that non-cooperation is a powerful weapon for the defence of the country against an aggressor. As I have already said, extermination is a thing of the past. Aggressors aim at exploitation by making the subject people work for them and for their profit. And work is cooperation. Non-cooperation will make exploitation impossible and thus aggression itself unprofitable. The process of non-cooperation—we are aware of it—will put our non-violence through terrific tests. But if we can stand assaults; torture and shootings without any retaliation or even an attempt at retaliation from our side and persist in non-cooperation, the struggle must end in success. Examples of such heroic sufferings are not wanting. Guru-ka-Bagh morchas of the Sikhs, the Dharasana episodes, and the behaviour of processionists at innumerable places are shining examples of the practice of non-violence on a large scale. And the struggle of Bardoli peasants for relief against excessive land taxes is a valuable lesson in non-cooperation.

Much is said, in order to terrify people, of the results of the use of violence by the invaders and aggressors. But the thing is obviously overdone. I believe in the first place that human nature, though often bad and vile enough, will ultimately recoil from persistent cruelty and torture and slaughter of non-resisting non-cooperators. Suffering cheerfully borne will melt the heart of even a savage.

And after all does war—without non-cooperation—really sustain freedom? In the first place, national policies based on force and violence as instruments of defence lead to a race for armaments, and that race by itself indubitably leads to war. Moreover there is no finality in armaments. The machine masters and ultimately overwhelms mankind; and then what happens to the vanquished? Once the army is overthrown and defeated, people are forced to surrender.

What we have really to show is that people can act courageously and suffer hardship and even death without the temporary stimulus, and indeed intoxication, of war. A well-organised mass movement based on non-violence and non-cooperation for the noble purpose of winning or retaining national independence must raise people, not only young well-built soldiers but even the old and the infirm and men and women alike, to greater heights than a bloody war ever can. It is the hearts of the leaders that doubt and quail, but the heart of the common people is sound enough.

Non-cooperation with the aggressor and the foreigner is plain enough. That will obviously involve the non-payment of taxes, a refusal to enter his service or do his bidding, a refusal to work in his mills and factories, and non-resort to his law courts. But it may become necessary even to non-cooperate with those of our countrymen, our own kith and kin, who flout the national will and cooperate with the aggressor. The thing to remember is that our non-cooperation has always to be non-violent and will, therefore, never do personal injury to the opponent. So there should be no interference with the supply of water to the thirsty or food to the hungry, medical assistance to the sick or burial to the dead. Within these broad limits a community is entitled to protect itself from its own backsliding brethren. And where public interests so demand, even filial and all family considerations must yield. National freedom is above everything. Human history teaches us that no nation has ever been able through violence to retain freedom and defend its independence against superior violence. Given the correct training, this is possible only through non-violent non-cooperation.

Non-violence is not a mere negative concept. It is essentially a constructive contribution to world politics. The present structure of society puts a definite premium on violence. Vast aggregates of private wealth in the hands of individuals who also constitute the ruling classes in the community naturally favour violence as a means of defence. It is now a commonplace that often so-called national interests are in substance nothing but the interests of private capitalists and investors in foreign lands. And even in local disturbances it is the moneyed man, the man of property, who shouts the loudest for the use of force for his protection. The adoption of non-violence as a national policy will inevitably involve a radical alteration in the social and economic spheres.

It is obvious that national wealth must be more widely and equitably diffused and social inequalities must disappear. Every citizen must have equal opportunities to grow. Much in socialism and communism will be found useful and admirable in a non-violent society, the basic difference being that a believer in non-violence holds that changes can be brought about by peaceful persuasion and non-violent methods, whereas those who profess the other doctrines do not share this faith and think that violent expropriation is the only course.

A believer in non-violence does not wish to abolish capitalism by violence. He wishes the community to avail itself of the results of individual enterprise, and he takes all sting out of capitalism when he converts a capitalist into a trustee for the benefit of the nation. If a capitalist were really to consider himself a trustee, he would never endeavour to swell his profits by sweating labour. If his wealth were ultimately to be applied for the benefit of the community, there would be no incentive left to enrich oneself by improper and Shylockean methods. He would, even in the process of earning his profits, genuinely endeavour to benefit his fellowmen as widely as possible.

The real considerations in a society founded upon non-violence may well be twofold. Firstly, we have no outside countries to exploit, no foreign markets to capture, with the aid of our armies; and secondly, there must be profitable employment for every fit person. I do not think that in a free India the adjustment of industries will be beyond the bounds of human ingenuity. The needs of the hand-spinning industry will have to be particularly borne in mind, capable as it is of giving employment to millions of people who would otherwise be wholly without work. In planning an economic programme suited to our needs we can draw with great profit on the great social experiment in Russia. I personally believe that working on cooperative lines is the true way to national salvation and to non-violence also.

For the propagation of non-violence on sound lines it is necessary that a picture — at least in broad outline, but distinct and well-defined, not vague and shadowy — of a well-planned non-violent society should be drawn and placed before the public. Such a scheme would serve many purposes. It would educate and make people think, and the plan itself would benefit by public discussion and criticism. As it is, people are left in doubt and do not know where non-violence will land them and India.

I realise that, like the experiment in Russia, the way to perfecting a plan of a non-violent society must be through trial and error. But basic principles must be settled and (as far as possible) precisely stated, and outlines well drawn. Shri Mashruwala has recently made attempts in that direction. His articles published in newspapers and magazines were both thoughtful and thought-provoking.

I dare say that adequate material for drawing up a preliminary outline as a basis of discussion for planned non-violence can be found in the writings of Gandhiji spread over a period of 40 years. Valuable hints can also be gained from Tolstoy and other eminent writers. But at present the material is all scattered, the picture much too hazy. Like the famous Communist Manifesto, we should have a manifesto of non-violence and non-cooperation.

The political and economic structure of a non-violent society must be broad-based on the conscious will of the people as a whole. If force as a dominating sanction is eliminated, then cheerful and willing obedience to the national laws is the prerequisite to any durable constitution. People will only offer non-violent resistance to an aggressor, if they are proud of their country and prize their national freedom. But if national freedom merely means for a vast majority of the people a slavish, care-worn existence with ever-present fear of want and hunger, then it will not be surprising if there is not too keen a readiness to offer non-violent resistance and to die for an order of things which has done so little for the individual.

In a non-violent State there should not be any communal questions or any minority problems.

When the highest rules of morality and ethics become the mainsprings of political policy and administrative action and non-violence actually becomes the foundation of national life, then there will not be the bickerings and rivalries and struggle for power with which we are nowadays so familiar.

The aim, it is said, of all good government is to cease to govern, for the State to fade away and for society to become classless. These aims can only be realised by genuine non-violence. Government will be truly the government by consent. Problems of poverty and social amelioration confront all communities and require similar treatment. It is the fear that majorities will resort to the use of force and violence which poisons the air. The moment non-violence becomes the instrument of national policy the majority will have no sanction at its back other than the willing consent of the minority, and if it wishes to rule (if rule it can be called at all), it can only do so by winning the confidence and disarming all suspicion of the minorities. Indeed in a fully non-violent society there are no minorities, for all are one people.

The conclusion, in my view, is that in our present environment non-violence can only succeed as a creed and nothing else. Just as Soviet Russia made a deliberate attempt to alter the whole structure of society and to modify all the current and accepted notions of human nature by conscious State effort, similarly those who believe in non-violence and non-cooperation as the future hope of humanity must acquire power in the body politic in non-violent ways, and then endeavour to make non-violence the only essential instrument of our national policy. I personally think that the ideal of non-violence is not unrealisable. On the contrary I think that it can be reached, and that humanity, after the experience of the horrors of two World Wars in the course of a quarter of a century, will willingly strive after it. But to attain that goal we shall have to educate public opinion in its favour, more particularly by radically planning the whole field of education on the basis of non-violence. We must begin with the child, and mould the mind of the coming generation accordingly.

So far non-violence (ahimsa) has been practised to regulate men's personal lives, and therefore one life, well lived according to the principles of ahimsa, has influenced many others. But the sphere of influence has been limited to the region of private and personal affairs. Unfortunately, during thousands of years, mankind has been taught that private life and national life are things apart, governed by totally different principles. Gandhiji teaches us that there is no such distinction. That lesson can only be learnt by the people as a whole, if those in charge of national affairs first learn it themselves and then endeavour to impart it to others. I fear we have not done our duty by the people. We have doubted and hesitated ourselves. How then can we blame the people? Let Congressmen first be firm believers themselves, give a little further time to the people in general, and then put them to the test.

Evacuees from Burma

Much has been written about the hardships of evacuees from Burma. Making allowance for all possible exaggerations, the remainder itself is a horrible tale of woes. Some of them must be inevitable in the circumstances that face us. What has to be dealt with is the avoidable hardships and blatant discrimination said to be in vogue in the treatment of Britishers and Indians. I understand that there are over eight lacs of Indians in Burma, yet to be evacuated. Life for them in Burma is impossible. The question is too big to be tackled by any existing organisation. It requires a special temporary committee of experienced men whose sole work would be to attend to the orderly and quick evacuation of the eight to nine lacs of men and their disposal after they are on Indian soil. Let us hope that there are enough public-spirited men who will make it their business to form themselves into a committee and see this very humanitarian work through.

Simple Treatment for Cholera

Satish Babu recently spent 15 days in doctoring and educating the inhabitants of fourteen villages where an epidemic of cholera had broken out. He took with him one of his own workers and obtained the help of four village doctors. The following was the result:

Number of villages under treatment	14
" " cholera victims	114
" " recoveries	95
" " still under treatment	2
" " dead	17
" " those given saline injections — intravenous and subcutaneous	112

Out of the 17 that died 5 were beyond medical aid when Satish Babu got to them.

Only the following medicines were required for the treatment: 1. Calomel, 2. Bicarbonate of Soda. These were administered in the beginning and continued until such time as the bile began to flow freely. Subsequently 3. Castor oil and 4. Kaolin were given. 5. As constant diarrhoea causes great loss of blood serum in the patient, it is necessary every now and again to administer saline injections. The salt for the saline injection is prepared thus: Dissolve ordinary eating salt in water, and after filtering it bring it to boiling point. Continue to boil until the salt forms into crystals. Sometimes an alkaline saline is needed, in which case bicarbonate of soda can be added.

The villagers were terrified. Satish Babu and his helpers were soon able to gain their confidence and get complete cooperation from them. What might have been a severe outbreak was thus nipped in the bud.

PRICE CONTROL MUDDLE

The contribution in Harijan of the 12th inst. by an "experienced friend" on the price control muddle is to be greatly welcomed. A substantial reason why the present price control should be abandoned is that it has benefited no one, least of all the consumer. The whole question has to be considered afresh from the point of view not only of the manufacturers and distributors but also of the consumers. One very grave result of the price control policy was not only the driving away of the foodstuffs from the market, but of hitting the poor man hard where these stuffs were available. The Government announced the controlled price — without much forethought or consultation with the business community — but failed to make the commodity available at that price. If control had to be applied, it should have been applied to all "articles of daily need". It was applied to prices of articles of food but not to the prices of cloth, kerosene, matches, paper, iron and other articles which have gone up by 100 to 300 per cent — hitting the poor agriculturist hardest, who has profited little by the increase in the price of grains. From his point of view, the control of the price of grain is a terrible disadvantage inasmuch as the only commodity he has to deal with is controlled, while he has to pay through the nose for all other articles of daily need.

In this matter as elsewhere the main trouble is an irresponsible Government. An article in The Economic Journal of the Royal Economic Society on German price control during the last war throws a flood of light on the whole question, and shows a way out, if the Government will only care to benefit by it. The writer, Leon Zeitlin, says that conclusions from German experience may be drawn "for the benefit of the British efforts to strengthen the economic Home Front, and at the same time to try not unduly to disturb the equilibrium of equality of sacrifice."

The very first thing he has pointed out is the determination of the cost of replacement which has a twofold meaning: (1) For the manufacturer it means the cost of production; (2) For distributors (wholesale and retail) it means the price they have to pay for the repurchasing of the same qualities and quantities as they have sold from their stocks. But these costs should be determined by "an elastic system of averaging costs of old and new stock over a period of, say, three months."

The second point mentioned is about the number of goods coming under price control. "An efficient price control demands that the smallest possible number of goods should be exempted from its regulations." That would mitigate the hardship that the poor agriculturist has had to bear in our country.

But the most important of all points, and in our country one of primary importance, is enlisting the services of various trade associations. In independent countries like Britain or Germany, this was a natural course. Such a course would not occur, and even if it did, it would be repugnant to an alien bureaucracy. But the point is that the whole price control would be the woeful muddle it has been, unless the services of the trade associations are utilised for the purpose. This, the writer points out, "played a more important part in German economic life than similar organisations in other countries. A kind of 'closed-shop' system was developed, and the associations obtained the right to decide whom they might or might not be prepared to admit as a member. . . . The officers of the associations become trustees of the Government by being appointed 'Deputy Commissioners of the Reich'. A special department of the War Office established immediately after the outbreak of the War, which by sequestering all available stocks of raw materials, controlled not only war requirements but also civil demands, was the centre of this organisation. In order to decentralise its manifold and far-reaching economic activities, this department had set up a considerable number of bodies with special tasks concerning the various industries and trades, and it was these bodies which directed and supervised the semi-official activities of the trade associations."

The writer adds:

"The Government policy concerning trade associations coincided with their desire to obtain a predominant position in German economic life. The formation of Central Federations of manufacturers, wholesalers, export merchants, retailers and craftsmen was, therefore, encouraged by Government. These Central Federations embraced all associations, corporations and guilds of the respective professions and proved a great help to the Government, because it had then no longer to face the almost unsolvable task of settling the incessant and tedious complaints of individuals or discontented groups. Furthermore, these Central Federations very soon developed into competent and responsible bodies which had to advise the Government in all matters concerning war production and distribution."

This system of enlisting the services of trade associations by changing them into self-governing bodies was "preferable from the point of view of efficiency . . . to the setting up of Committees the members of which are, it is true, most distinguished individuals but not elected representatives of their trades." If this is true in self-governing countries, it is truer still in a dependent country like India where the Government have no relation or responsibility to the people.

The last point is the enactment of legislation against the abuse of economic power. By an Emergency Decree in post-war Germany, "a special Supreme Court was set up with competence to declare null and void agreements detrimental to the common weal, to release members of associations from their obligations, to dissolve associations, to fine associations as well as individuals trying to influence the policy of production, distribution, and prices, etc."

Until steps in this direction are taken, the reasonless, pointless, ineffective and ruinous price control policy must be abandoned.

As to what should be done in the interval, the suggestions made by the businessman-correspondent cannot be bettered.

WITH JAMNALALJI

( By Rammanohar Lohia )

"Whom have you come here for," asked Jamnalalji, and my reply needed no thinking. "For Gandhiji and 'you.'" I had arrived in Wardha the night before and was preparing to go to Sevagram. Jamnalalji would not let me go, and when I threatened to board the earliest train to anywhere, he brandished his stick, and there was nothing left for me but to submit to this affectionate tyranny. "The British have tyrannised over me for nearly two years," I added, "it is now your turn!"

We went to his old house. On the way Jamnalalji wanted me to tell him all the stories and scraps I had collected and, when he felt there was a really good one, he wanted me to reserve it for lunch. He was in a glorious listening mood. I rattled off about the British Governors who ruled over him and over me and about whom few Indians are ever interested to know anything except during the boredom of prison when a railway time-table and a sales-catalogue are adventuring fiction. Two of the tallest of these Governors receive half-a-dozen lines each in a British-written Who's Who, and one of them, it is said, was the parliamentary private secretary to the parliamentary secretary to the secretary to the navy before being appointed Governor, while the other had a mother who was the daughter of the daughter of the nephew of the 10th earl of somewhere. Jamnalalji had a hearty laugh. The smarting insult to an Indian's nationhood is no doubt there, but the ridiculous pomposity of the British mind overweighs it. Only once did I notice a vacancy in Jamnalalji's looks, while I was relating one of my stories, and I stopped. He assured me that my stories were dissipating the heaviness in his mind, but I was satisfied only after he had repeated what I had related. How could anybody have known that Jamnalalji was using up his last ounces of energy to cheer himself up deliberately? Death was not to come to him in sombre and gloomy clothes, casting grief all around.

As we arrived at the house, I was introduced to two persons, a graceful young woman and a young man. The presentation was incomplete, and they knew who I was but I did not know who they were. That was Jamnalalji's way of doing things. He wanted to extract a joke out of everything. I was, he said, on test and, if I had some commonsense and a little knowledge of physiognomy and psychology, I should be able to tell who these two were. Innocent irrelevance is laughter, and it is surely irrelevant to connect physiology and commonsense with reading an unknown name on an unknown shape. And yet I ventured, and I was right in guessing his daughter-in-law, and the young man, I had to be told, was his third son-in-law.

I was a little disagreeably surprised when Jamnalalji told me that his son-in-law was the son of a Raibahadur-so-and-so in the United Provinces. Jamnalalji had himself kicked away lustily at his Raibahaduri at a very young age and, although he could have risen to the top rung in the ladder of British titles earlier than most others, his own path had lain in an opposite direction. I must confess I have seen numerous Congressmen showing deference to wealth and titles and taking for granted all such as have not permitted themselves an interval of money-making between their playful and studious days and their political pursuits. Jamnalalji had, like Jawaharlalji, a redeeming feature; if he was a bit deferential to worldly goods, he was affectionate to the tramps and vagabonds. I am perhaps reading a bit too much into what was after all a mechanical nothing, an unthinking habit of rolling out a name along with its accustomed, though spurious, titles.

The mirth and satire during lunch continued afterwards. There were two little periods of serious talking on the part of Jamnalalji, one with me and another with his son-in-law, and some of the points raised with me were later swallowed up in the general talk. He wanted me to take up the work of the States' peoples. Apart from the vagabond's disinclination to be pinned down to anything specific, there are solid reasons for my refusal to accept such offers. I cannot tell them here. But one of these, not very convincing by itself, I told Jamnalalji, and his answer was significant. There was, I said, a good deal of difference between my way of looking at States' problems and that of the States' People's Conference. The Princes are, in my eyes, a useless lot who have lost every claim to govern, and I stand for their entire removal, while the States' People's Conference, undoubtedly for good reasons, cannot take up this position. I tried to make my language as aggressive as possible, but Jamnalalji was not put off. He suggested a variation. He said that the Conference could take up the line that most Princes were bad and, unless the Princely order reformed itself, it would have to be removed altogether. He reminded me that this was Gandhiji's language. Before I proceed further with the conversation, let me here pay a tribute to Jamnalalji's catholicity of outlook and his effort to accommodate what should be called extremist views. I do not deny that a part of this effort was due to a little trust that he otherwise placed in me. I have often noticed that, given an amount of trust in each other, two persons of different views may find it easier to talk and work together than if they were in the same group but had no trust between them.

I said that I could not talk Gandhiji's language, for, apart from its uniqueness, there were almost two generations between him and me. Moreover, Gandhiji was probably more cautious in certain spheres than he need be. Was it not time, I said, that Gandhiji should give up his theory of trusteeship or, at least, mix it up with the abolition of private ownership of capital? The war has caused a great deal of fear among property-owners, and could not Gandhiji turn it into disgust at capitalism and longing for a socialised economy in which there would be at least mental peace? Jamnalalji listened, and the talk ended up in general hilarity as to what I would do if I had a crore of rupees.

Was Jamnalalji a trustee? In his personal life, yes. It escaped me for a long while that a man of his income should have led a comparatively lower middle class life; I, as many others, just took him for granted. There is something extremely difficult in this voluntary abnegation; and it is no wonder that, despite thirty years' labour, Gandhiji has not been able to produce many Jamnalals.

Jamnalalji was undoubtedly a trustee in the sphere of personal expenditure and employment of profits towards social purposes. In the sphere of production, he was not and could not have been a trustee. His factories and business were conducted on the present basis, as any other basis within the existing economy would have meant their total disappearance. Men must submit to the law of money relations, hierarchy of incomes and injustice, if they wish to remain in capitalistic trade and industry. Again, there is the problem of inheritance, and it was the extreme sacrifice of his wife and the good sense of his sons that enabled Jamnalalji to achieve fifty per cent trusteeship in this sphere.

Full trustee in personal expenditure, full capitalist in the sphere of production, and half-trustee as a bequeather would not be an inappropriate description of Jamnalalji in the management of wealth.

We had a few hands of bridge, and contract bridge at that, when Jamnalalji felt drowsy and we retired to another part of the room. After some time he got up, went in for a wash, came back, and started to lie down again. I was eager to go to Sevagram and, as everything had been normal, I shouted at him for trying to sleep so much during the day. How could I have known that I was speaking to a dying man? Jamnalalji tried to sit up, looked at us mutely and made restless movements. The blood-vessel in the head had apparently already burst. There was just a quarter hour of conscious pain, and the rest was a vast sea of unconsciousness for him. The candle was snuffed out inside of an hour. It had only known to burn brightly or not at all. To flicker and dim away by slow degrees was not its way.

Gandhiji came and, within a few seconds of his arrival, gripped the widowed wife by the shoulder and said, "Look at me. Laugh, I am laughing." I have often thought of Gandhiji's heart as of a sieve with numberless big and little holes. Does it not change every personal grief into a state of restful sorrow? The conversation between Gandhiji and Jankidevi reminded one of Buddha and other spiritual teachers who consoled mourners. There was one difference. The ancients consoled on the spiritual plane, while Gandhiji appears to transmute his own spiritual experience into active morality before communicating it to the mourner. His morality is service of the people.

It is customary to honour a dead leader by saying that his place cannot be filled. There is not much in this custom. A leader who leaves behind him a vacancy was lacking in something, somewhere. It is true that Jamnalalji's place may not be taken up by any one man, and that is only proper, but the numerous workers in the constructive cause who worked under him and whom he trained will, I hope, replace their dead teacher.

IMPERIALISM WITHIN US

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

We usually understand by imperialism a state where one nation holds down another in bondage so as to obtain some benefit to itself at the cost of the subjection of the other. We may have the spirit of such imperialism without having to cross national, political or geographical boundaries. The essence of imperialism is often found in even a single individual. When reduced to its lowest terms it arises out of the desire to gain something for oneself at the cost of another. Wherever we find this we have the elements of imperialism.

In centralised industries under private ownership we find this spirit in a virulent form. Therefore every country that takes to this form of economic organisation will in the end produce imperialism and not freedom. It is a double-edged sword. It injures both him who uses it and the victim. It flourishes only with outside compulsion and external discipline.

Naturally, to such an evil the antidote is one's own initiative and self-discipline. The promotion of decentralised industries helps us to develop both. No country can then enslave us without our active cooperation. If we can generate sufficient internal discipline to resist any external enticement, we shall be able to attain and retain freedom; but until then we are doomed to be slaves. Hence Gandhiji's insistence on the constructive programme as the surest way to obtain Swaraj.

Imperialism governs from outside, and is based on violence and fear. But true freedom is an outcome of self-discipline, non-violence and love. Where the latter condition exists there can be no high or low, rich or poor, but all men will be brethren.

We are witnessing with our own eyes the ultimate outcome of the spirit of imperialism. Germany, Japan, Great Britain and U. S. A. are all fighting so that each may control the world's resources for its own benefit. We shall find this true, if we probe deep enough behind the ostensible causes set forth by each combatant. Imperialism amongst nations or within nations or between individuals leads to destruction, enmity and violence. Do we want this state of affairs to condition our lives?

As long as the selfish desire to benefit from another's toil is present amongst us neither Premier Churchill nor Sir Stafford Cripps can help us.

We are held in bondage so that we may supply the raw materials to the mills of Great Britain and afford a well-controlled market for their products. Therefore, the moment we begin to utilise our raw materials ourselves and supply all our needs, the foundation of imperialism is blasted. This then is the message of khadi that has been dinned into our ears in season and out of season by Gandhiji.

Though the prescription appears simple enough, the medicine is hard to take as it demands a considerable degree of self-control and presupposes self-discipline. As things are, village-made articles appear expensive as there is a greater degree of distribution of wealth included in the price, while the apparent cheapness of imported mill-made articles is due to a small share in the booty of the manufacturer and his Government. Are we to be led away by this small share in the loot? Village-made articles are sometimes crude, largely due to our neglect of the villagers. Shall we abandon these for the small satisfaction we may get from the use of standardised products? These are the small crosses we have to bear in the initial stages to attain Swaraj ultimately. Do these loom too large on our horizon, dull our distant vision, and distort our judgment to such an extent that we prefer the foreign yoke with fineries to Swaraj. Better is a dry morsel and freedom therewith, than a house full of so-called good things with bondage.

To the extent to which rural India supplies the major and primary needs of the people, to that extent we shall attain Swaraj. Both producers and consumers can help in this programme. Every man, woman and child can take part in this fight against imperialism.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

If They Really Mean?

Q. If the Japanese really mean what they say and are willing to help to free India from the British yoke, why should we not willingly accept their help?

A. It is folly to suppose that aggressors can ever be benefactors. The Japanese may free India from the British yoke, but only to put in their own instead. I have always maintained that we should not seek any other Power's help to free India from the British yoke. That would not be a non-violent approach. We should have to pay a heavy price, if we ever consented to take foreign aid as against the British. By our non-violent action we were within an ace of reaching our goal. I cling to my faith in non-violence. I have no enmity against the Japanese, but I cannot contemplate with equanimity their designs upon India. Why do they not realise that we as free men have no quarrel with them? Let them leave India alone. And if they are well-intentioned, what has China done to deserve the devastation they have wrought there?

Guerilla War

Q. You declared the other day at Wardha that Jawaharlal Nehru was your 'legal heir'. How do you like the idea of your legal heir advocating guerilla warfare against the Japanese? What will happen to your ahimsa when Jawaharlal openly advocates violence and Rajaji wants arms and military training for the whole nation?

A. As you have put it the situation does appear awful. But it really is not so awful as it appears to you. In the first instance 'legal heir' is not my phrase. I had spoken in Hindi. I had said that he was not my 'legal heir' but that he was virtually my heir. That means that he will take my place when I am gone. He has never accepted my method in its entirety. He has frankly criticised it, and yet he has faithfully carried out the Congress policy largely influenced, when it was not solely directed, by me. Those like Sardar Vallabhbhai who have followed me without question cannot be called heirs. And everybody admits that Jawaharlal has the drive that no one else has in the same measure. And have I not said also that when I am gone he will shed the differences he often declares he has with me? I am sorry he has developed a fancy for guerilla warfare. But I have no doubt that it will be a nine days' wonder. It will take no effect. It is foreign to the Indian soil. Twentytwo years' incessant preaching and practice of non-violence, however imperfect it has been, could not be suddenly obliterated by the mere wish of Jawaharlal and Rajaji, powerful though their influence is. I am, therefore, not perturbed by the 'apostacy' either of Jawaharlal or Rajaji. They will return to non-violence with renewed zest, strengthened by the failure of their effort. Neither goes to violence for his belief in it. They do so because they think probably that India must have a course of violence before coming to non-violence. No one can say beyond doubt how events will shape themselves. It may be that their instinct is correct and mine, backed though it is by experience, is not. I know this, however, that my line is cut out for me. Even though I may be alone in my faith, I must follow it unfalteringly, believing that the masses will never take to the violent method. They will either remain inert or take to non-violent action. Guerilla warfare can take us nowhere. If it is practised on any large scale, it must lead to disastrous consequences. Non-violent non-cooperation is the most effective substitute for every kind of violent warfare. If the whole nation takes to non-violent action, it can be wholly successful. It could not be quite so against the British because their roots have gone deep into the soil. The Japanese have not even got a foothold. I hope that the forthcoming A. I. C. C. will revert to the non-violent method and give the clearest possible instructions about non-violent non-cooperation. To aid the British effort in the violent way without any official connection and after the failure of the recent negotiations appears to me to court national disgrace.

QUESTION BOX

( By M. K. Gandhi )

Are You Not Inviting Japanese ?

Q. It is all very well for you to invite bravery, but are you not inviting the Japanese to attack India, by asking the British rulers to withdraw ?

A. I am not. I feel convinced that the British presence is the incentive for the Japanese attack. If the British wisely decided to withdraw and leave India to manage her own affairs in the best way she could, the Japanese would be bound to reconsider their plans. The very novelty of the British stroke will confound the Japanese, dissolve the subdued hatred against the British, and the atmosphere will be set up for the ending of an unnatural state of things that has dominated and choked Indian life. As far as I can see the Japanese seem to have made their plans independently of Indian opinion. They are not to be affected by any writing of mine. But they will be confounded by the action I have advised the British to take.

Evacuation

Q. You have advised evacuation from the cities of those who are not wanted for service or other reasons. But what are those poor people to do who have no homes to go to and who would be unwelcome wherever they go ?

A. This is a real difficulty. They must be provided for by the people of the provinces to which they belong. If we are one nation, we should have no difficulty in providing for every contingency that may arise. If we are to establish a new order of society, we can act from now. I can only speak from the non-violent angle and no other. If the national mind is working in that direction, consciously or unconsciously individuals and institutions will, without fuss, be absorbing all such persons as you mention. I know that the process is going on, but not on a scale large enough to be impressive. No able-bodied person should be put on charity; he should be given work enough to feed him properly. This shifting of the population, if it is wisely done, must result in a silent reorganisation of villages.

No Narrow Provincialism

Q. There are, in certain places, some people who have come from other provinces but who have practically settled in those places. There is already a feeling in certain provinces that when times were good these people came from outside, earned, and enjoyed themselves, but that when danger is drawing near and when their help and assistance would be needed by the residents of the province, they are thinking of fleeing to their 'homes'. Should you not advise such people to stay where they are and not to give vent to any narrow provincialism ?

A. This question has come to me in various forms. It comes from Bengal and Assam. Merchants from other provinces have settled there for generations. Though they went to the respective provinces for their own sakes, they supplied a want, often useful. There is no doubt that their sudden withdrawal must hit hard those who have been hitherto used to make their daily purchases from these merchants. They cannot be easily and suddenly replaced, especially at a critical time like this. Therefore for these merchants to wind up their businesses would certainly amount to desertion of duty, if they do not, before leaving, ensure the continuance of their shops by proper substitute. It would be a different thing, if the customers themselves evacuated and the merchants had to follow. The situation that faces the country is so novel that no opinion or solution can claim infallibility, nor can judgment be pronounced without carefully weighing all the facts. But it seems to me to be the duty of mercantile organisations to examine the situation and give guidance to the merchants affected.

Not an Incitement

Q. You have written :

"If the vast majority of Muslims regard themselves as a separate nation . . . no power on earth can compel them to think otherwise. And if they want to partition India on that basis, they must have the partition, unless Hindus want to fight against such a division. So far as I can see such a preparation is silently going on on behalf of both parties."

As far as the Muslims are concerned I can say with better knowledge than you that there is no such preparation. It would be foolish in the midst of the present armageddon. But since you are apparently aware of the preparation to fight on the part of Hindus, is it not criminal for you not to prevent your co-religionists from this suicidal activity ? Your article is both cowardly and mischievous; indeed it is an incitement to the Hindus.

A. This is the mildest indictment I have picked up from many I have received. Even from this much poison has been removed. It is perhaps wise to notice some of the criticism to which I am exposed. I must not mind it. It has been my lot throughout my public career. I suppose it is that of every public servant. But when the criticism is ignorant, as this is, it harms the critic and the cause he espouses. I take notice of it in the hope that sober men will use their influence to restrain ignorant criticism. I have no special knowledge of the preparation on behalf of the Hindus. All the knowledge I have is derived from the speeches of the leaders of both the parties and from the cuttings I receive from correspondents. They are proof positive of the preparations to which I have referred. But if what you say is right, in spite of the writings in the Muslim press, no preparation on one side alone can possibly provoke strife. It takes two to make a quarrel. You would be right, if I did not do so, in saying that it would be criminal on my part not to prevent my "co-religionists from this suicidal activity". You write about my co-religionists. I recognise none in such matters. Nor do they recognise me. For I claim Indians of all religions as my equal brothers, whether they believe me or not. I would, therefore, love to prevent everyone from quarrelling. All I write in these columns is designed to make reason rather than the sword the arbiter between rival parties. Hence the sentence you quote from my writing. I invite you to help me in my mission of peace. You can begin by understanding me and my writings.

A GLIMPSE OF RIKHIKESH

From Delhi I went to Rikhikesh—that is the name in Government records and the Post Office—for a few days' change and rest. But I could not somehow make up my mind to stay there more than three or four days. The Ganges offered all that was expected of that holy river, and I met a few sannyasins, very kind and hospitable, but I felt that I could not bear to stay on there even for rest. The rest I would get, but it would not be worth much without peace. And peace it was difficult to get, with so many factors challenging it wherever one went—flies and filth, stray cows and swarms of beggars, and not much better than these the swarms of sadhus.

The Congress committee people somehow found me out. They wanted me to address a meeting there. A meeting of whom, I asked. And they smiled. There are a couple of thousand sadhus who are fed by the chhatras, about a thousand sannyasins, the same number of itinerant pilgrims, about five hundred beggars, and a few shopkeepers. There is a large number of students—Sanskrit students—they said, and some hill people, who might listen to the message of the constructive programme, but "the sadhus," they said, "abhor us." "But have you seriously tried to do the work?" I asked. One of the friends said: "Attempt had been made. There is enough land at our disposal. But we have not been able to do anything. Can't you lay the foundation of a constructive work centre? Tell us exactly what we can do." I said to them that, if they were so minded, two or three workers might be sent out to learn all the processes of spinning and weaving, of paper-making and bee-keeping. Those who knew spinning might make the start with collecting cotton and a few spinning wheels, but I who had gone there on a flying visit could not make the start. Later I met a sadhu with matted locks and a long beard, who hailed me from a distance. For a moment I could not place him. But it was a familiar face, and I found that we had been jail mates years ago. He had chosen this kind of life and implored me to go to his kuti. He has two charkhas regularly working, he had two or three cows, and had laid out a nice little garden. "I have sat down here performing penance for Swaraj," he said, "and I am sure we will attain our goal." "But how? Have you been able to persuade any of the sadhus to take to the charkha? Will they go out to do constructive work?" I asked. He smiled and said he would work in the direction.

I had been drawn to Rikhikesh by Swami Shivanand who has settled there for some years and is conducting a monthly called Divine Life, and his Divine Life Society has numerous branches in the country and outside. The members pledge themselves to work daily for their moral and spiritual uplift, and meet together four times in the year. I met other sannyasins too—some of them very learned indeed—and all, it is curious to observe, interested in the happenings in the country and asking for the latest news. These were so keen on the latest news, why would they not work for the country, I wondered. "You know the definition of a sannyasin given in the Bhagavadgita," I said to them. "He who does the appointed task or the duty to be done without attachment to the fruit is a sannyasin and a yogi, but not he who ignites not the fire or does no action. (6:1) But here it is exactly those who ignite not the fire and do nothing who are regarded as sannyasins. How shall we make the country free?" Swami Shivanandji frankly agreed with me. He said the Gita definition was the right definition, but so long as thousands were sure of a square meal without working for it, it was not possible to do anything. He was good enough to promise to introduce the spinning wheel in his own ashram and do whatever he can to spread the gospel of the charkha.

But very much more work is needed. We need a number of sannyasins who will go about amongst these sadhus with the message of active work, and we have to disabuse people of their ideas of misplaced charity.

Seth Jugal Kishore Birla, with whom I went to Rikhikesh, had organised a yajna on a grand scale. Brahmanas from all parts of India and learned in the Vedas had been invited for the purpose, and he invited me to look in. Goswami Ganeshduttji, who was in charge of the ceremonies, said to me that he had already announced to the vast number of spectators there that I was coming. "It is very good of you," I said. "But I have not come for the yajna, and I do not want anyone to know that I am here. I have come for a little bit of peace and rest." He was all kindness, but he introduced me to the people in a long speech, and blessed me on behalf of those engaged in the yajna. The yajna was obviously, as I learnt, for the welfare of the Hindu community, and for the coming of peace. But the words 'Hindu kingdom', and 'Hindu sovereignty' were also freely mentioned. I was in a quandary when I was asked to say a few words to the people assembled there. But with God's name on my lips, I ventured to say only a few words to express what then possessed my breast.

I said: "I have come here seeking for mental and bodily rest, in order that I may be able to do my work more energetically. You have assembled here to perform and associate yourselves with a yajna. You are all Hindus, and so am I. Let me then tell you the Hindu prayer that has appealed to me most:

“ सर्वेऽत्र सुखिनः सन्तु सर्वे सन्तु निरामयाः ।

सर्वे भद्राणि पश्यन्तु न कश्चिद् दुःखमाग्न भवेत् ॥

“(May all here be happy; may all be free from disease; may all see things that are good; and may none have misery.)

“When after a hard day's work I lay my tired limbs to rest I humbly utter this prayer every day, and I do so now. Let us pray for the good and welfare of all. That is the glory of Hinduism, and that is its strength.

“Now to offer prayers is easy enough. But they are not heard unless they are offered from a pure and contrite heart. Let me tell you that yajna has a deeper meaning than the offering of ghee and other things in the sacrificial fire. Yajna is sacrifice of one's all for the good of humanity, and to me these offerings of ahutis have a symbolic meaning. We have to offer up our weaknesses, our passions, our narrownesses into the purifying Fire, so that we may be cleansed. Then and then only our prayers would be heard.

“Let me also place before you another aspect of prayer. You have assembled here for the fulfilment of your desires, and the yajna is performed to that purpose. Now desires may be good and bad, and not every one of us knows which of his desires is good and pure and which not. It is He who presides over our thoughts and acts who knows this, and so I always pray that God may grant only such of my desires as may be good and pure, and reject all my prayers if they partake of impurity or grossness. I invite you to join me in that kind of prayer today.

“One last thing. The prayer for peace is accepted on all hands as a pure prayer, and in these times of severe strife and cruel bloodshed it is well that we offer our prayers for peace. There is a great Vedic prayer which I should like to recite in this connection; and I am sure you will all join me when I do so:

यदिह घोरं यदिह क्रूरं यदिह पापं तच्छान्तं तच्छिवं सर्वमेव शमस्तु नः ।

“(Whatever there is heinous, and cruel and sinful — may all that be stilled, may everything be good and peaceful for us.)

“It is my prayer on this sacred ground where we should pray for the purification of Hinduism that Hinduism may be purged of all in it that may smack of heinousness, cruelty and sinfulness. Above all let cruelty and strife and bloodshed cease, and let Peace and Harmony reign everywhere. That should be the prayer of us all. Let us offer our sacrifices to that purpose, and I know that God grants all pure resolves — for Lord Krishna has said that ‘He who does good never comes to grief.’ I thank you.”

It is in that spirit that I associated myself with that yajna, and I am thankful to say that the organisers appreciated the spirit.

But as I look at the thing in the retrospect, I cannot excuse myself for having associated myself with that yajna, no matter in what spirit I did it. Whilst I indirectly criticised the motive and purpose of the yajna, I ought to have had the courage to dissociate myself from the yajna itself, even if it was for the most unexceptionable purpose on earth. For whatever may have been the conception of yajna in the past, I have no doubt that as it is performed today it is a wasteful anachronism. All the waste of precious cow's ghee and other materials, and the feeding of over two thousand people for over a month was a huge national waste and cannot conceivably be conducive to the welfare of the Hindus. Surely yajna of the Gita was not this. Selfless service of humanity was all it meant. Seth Jugal Kishore Birla has a heart of gold, but his charity and his lavish expenditure for the welfare of Hinduism and the Hindus need better direction. If he organised all the sadhus there for constructive work, if he assured them all a square meal and what little clothing they need for a few hours of daily constructive work, if he could persuade them to go out into the country to spread the gospel of liberal religion and to work for communal harmony, his money would be very well spent. But it is likely that he regards my views as grossly erroneous. Whatever, therefore, may be his duty, I am clear that it was my duty to speak out firmly and unequivocally that the organisers and the spectators were deceiving themselves under the cloak of religion. I failed in that duty.

‘Harijan’ in Urdu

Dr. Gopichand Bhargav is bringing out Harijan weekly in Urdu from Lahore. Articles from Harijan have for long been published in Hindustan of Lucknow. Arrangements are being made to publish an authentic edition at the Navajivan Press. The latter will be possible only when I can get an Urdu scholar who can throw in his lot with me. The two have their own individuality. And if the Navajivan Press succeeds in the venture, there will be a third with its own individuality. With the impetus that is being given to Urdu learning through the proposed Hindustani Prachar Sabha such a venture has become a possibility.

SCORCHED EARTH POLICY AGAIN

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Thus writes a correspondent:

"The controversy on the scorched earth policy has had reference to what the people have to do when their fields are touched by the 'enemy'. That may or may not happen. But what about the destruction that is going on of crops, wells, tanks, houses, boats, cycles, etc., in the name of preparation for war? The people are summarily driven out of their villages and houses in cities. If you will suffer this destruction, then how can you oppose destruction to prevent destruction?"

This is a very difficult question. The destruction that is going on is certain. The destruction that the enemy may work or which the receding portion of the population affected may have to do is problematical. And, in any case, such destruction will be nothing, even if it overtook us, compared to the crores already drained from the country for warding off a threatened danger. Money taken through taxation has not been felt so keenly as is the direct deprivation of thousands of homesteads as in Feni. No promise of compensation can be any comfort for the dispossession of the present tenements. To the poor people it is like taking away their bodies. The dispossession of the country boats is almost like that of the tenements. To deprive the people in East Bengal of their boats is like cutting off a vital limb. I wrote almost in defence of the procedure adopted by the authorities in Feni. I have polite but angry protests against my endorsement. The correspondents tell me that I know nothing of the conditions of life in East Bengal. I cannot plead guilty to the charge. Only I felt that people must be asked to resign themselves to the inevitable. Later information from Feni compels a revision of the attitude I had adopted. I had assumed considerate action by the authorities in the face of the impending danger. But I must defer final judgment. The authorities are reported to be carrying on an investigation. I hope it will be comprehensive.

Certain risks have to be taken even when danger overtakes us. Thus people cannot be asked or advised to starve or die of thirst for fear of the Japanese helping themselves to the people's provision or water. They may fight them to prevent their use, but they must risk their loss and not die before their death in order to prevent their use by the Japanese forces.

It is time I came to the last and the most vital part of the question. As an out and out war resister, is it my duty to ask the affected people to resist, non-violently of course, the deprivation of their holdings including boats? But my very non-violence has deterred me from offering opposition to the point of embarrassment. Whether embarrassment through opposition in Feni would have been avoidable or not is a question of fact on which I cannot yet pronounce opinion. I would hesitate up to the last moment. I can only hope that the authorities will find a way whereby they can avoid distress such as has been caused in Feni. Sevagram, 27-4-42

DRACONIAN ORDERS

The Central Press Advisory Committee has promptly and rightly passed a resolution viewing "with grave concern the action of the three Provincial Governments, namely those of Bombay, Bengal and the Punjab, against three daily papers, the Bombay Sentinel, the Yugantar and the Pratap respectively which has resulted in their suspension," and has described the action as "a violation of the spirit of the agreement" between the Government and the Press, and asked the President of the Standing Committee to summon an emergency meeting of the Committee.

It will be remembered that the action against the Bombay Sentinel arose out of the publication in the paper of a report of the firing by police on dock workers. The paper was ordered to suspend publication for a month. Mr. Horniman, to whom it was suggested that an expression of regret might influence the Government in reducing the period of suspension, rightly declined to express regret and thus vindicated the liberty of the press to publish, within its discretion, all news of public importance which was not directly or indirectly of assistance to the enemy. The action against the Yugantar arises out of a report published by it issued by no less a person than Dr. Prafulla Ghose, a responsible member of the Working Committee, who is known for his sobriety and restraint. The order directs the paper "to suspend further publication". The Pratap has had to suspend publication for no particular offence but because the Punjab authorities will not let it publish anything, "including headlines connected with the war, the internal situation, internal security or civil defence measures in India", without approval.

These Draconian orders were issued without previous reference to the provincial Press Advisory Committees and thus constitute a flagrant violation of the Press Agreement. But this violation has not happened for the first time. It has happened often enough in the past, and Government have taken no notice of the protests of the Standing Committee.

The situation will continue to be the same unless effective action is taken by the newspapers themselves.

The Press Regulations are of such a sweeping character that anything and everything can be brought under their operation. For to decide whether an item of news or comment is directly or indirectly of assistance to the enemy or calculated to undermine public confidence in the capacity or credit of Government depends on several factors including, among other things, the mentality of the Chief Press Advisers in various districts. And then there are panic-mongers among the press people also.

To give but one example. The Hindustan Standard commented very mildly, I should imagine, on the orders regarding the immobilisation of boats issued by the Government of Bengal. All it said was: "It will cause great hardship to the people. It is well known that in East Bengal country boats are the principal means of communication between one house and another in certain parts of these districts. The people's hardship will know no bounds if these boats are immobilised. We urge them to think out in time a modification of this order so that life in East Bengal may not entirely be paralysed for want of country boats." The Statesman in commenting upon this note went the length of attributing a base motive to the paper saying: "The motive is plain. It is to assist the enemy." It is worthy of note in this connection that the Orissa Government in a recent communique referred to an exactly similar public comment on an exactly similar immobilisation order and has even modified the order: "It has been represented to Government that the complete removal of all boats in certain parts of the deltaic areas will dislocate the life of the people residing in these localities and cause great hardship. It has therefore been decided that District Magistrates should allow the minimum number of boats, considered to be absolutely necessary for the life of the community, to remain in these areas." Thank God, there was no cry of "assisting the enemy".

Then there is the question of news of grave public importance. It is inconceivable how a paper can be silent over an incident involving the death of 2 persons and the wounding of 45 people in Bombay. We have before us reports of much more serious incidents which recently happened in the Feni Sub-Division of the Noakhali District in Bengal. The Additional Sub-Divisional Officer, Feni, himself says in a public notice about these happenings: "Our countymen have been upset over the death of two persons who were killed by the military's firing in the village Chanua. The highest military officer, the Brigadier and the S. D. O. are giving the assurance that an inquiry into this matter of firing by soldiers will be started at a very early date." Now this cryptic report is sure to alarm the public and to lead to all sorts of conjectures. Private reports about the same incident are indeed of a most alarming and revolting nature. Why should such news be banned? It is for Government promptly to issue notices correcting details of information, but to ban all reports of these happenings is an added outrage on the public.

The Standing Committee, when it meets — and it should meet without the slightest delay — should consider all these circumstances, and not rest content with registering protests and sending recommendations. It must take some strong action. Strong action was discussed in the past over certain happenings but was never taken. Cannot they refuse to publish all war news and decline to participate in all war propaganda unless redress is granted in cases like the ones I have noticed?

I have other remedies I can think of, but it is not that the Standing Committee cannot think of proper action. They have to make up their minds to take it.

Sevagram, 26-4-42

M. D.

[Since writing the above, the news has come that the orders against the Bombay Sentinel and Yugantar have been cancelled. The order against the Pratap should also go. But what I have said has reference to the larger question of publication of news, and the Standing Committee should take up a strong stand on the liberty of the press to disseminate news in a sober and as far as possible accurate manner.

TWO AUSTRALIAN VISITORS

Sir Bertram Stevens is a member of the Eastern Group Conference and was some time ago Prime Minister of the Province of New South Wales in Australia. During Gandhiji's stay in Delhi Sir Bertram took the opportunity of having a few minutes with Gandhiji. Sir Bertram agreed to have a brief chat as Gandhiji was having his morning stroll. He had no particular business but wanted to make Gandhiji's acquaintance. "I have heard a lot about you from Mr. Birla. You have been to England, to Europe, and you stayed long in South Africa. But you have never been to Australia?" said Sir Bertram.

"No, thanks to you," said Gandhiji smiling.

In a perfectly sporting spirit Sir Bertram said: "You have made a very good reply, Mr. Gandhi."

"Haven't I?" said Gandhiji. "You have vast living spaces, you can absorb millions and millions of human beings. But I know what you are doing. I have followed the history of your country for over 35 years. White Australia is your policy, and as a result you are without the wonderful accession of strength that would have been yours if you had followed a policy of brothering all."

"I agree," said Sir Bertram. "But our country is only 150 years old. Prejudices die hard, but they are dying."

"You might very well have absorbed our people. Wherever they have gone they have been able to show that they are businesslike, able, and quite competent to take care of themselves. Your country with its infinite resources would have been a different country with these Indian settlers."

"Yes, Australia is half as big again as India. But it is not quite so fertile as India. But I agree with what you say. There is nothing like developing vital contacts between the peoples of different countries. During my sojourn in India I have met many people. I have found them quite capable and industrious, and the more our business people could know and come together with your business people the better for both Australia and India. And, Sir, we must not forget that the old world is already passing, old ideas are fast changing, and we are getting ready for the coming of a new world."

"I am sure," said Gandhiji.

The other visitor from Australia was a war correspondent. What can a war correspondent have to do with one who is proclaiming his faith against all wars? But Gandhiji received him kindly. There was little talk between the two. Gandhiji simply unburdened himself for a little while as the young man walked with him during his evening stroll: "What I cannot understand is man hating brother man and thirsting for his blood. I can see no justification for the war that is going on and fast enveloping the earth. It is based on hate and vengeance and will leave a crop of hate and vengeance behind. The waste of human life and material that might be useful otherwise for the world is appalling and sickening. Why should your country and mine have to be involved in this war? You are a fine resourceful people. Rather than build up your country and make it useful to the rest of the world, why should you be asked to sacrifice your manhood? And what is more painful is that it is all to no purpose. I do not know why all this fighting is going on, for whose benefit, with what great end in view."

"I doubt if anyone knows," whispered the young man.

"There is this thing," added Gandhiji, "perhaps God wills peace to come as a lesson of this carnage."

For a few seconds they walked silently. Then the young man ventured to ask: "Could you possibly say something about what is going on at present?"

"For that," said Gandhiji, "you must go to the men in office. I can say nothing."

"But, Sir, you are with them."

"And, yet, it will surprise you when I tell you that those things do not interest me. I relinquished my membership of the Congress eight years ago. I go to the Congress, attend meetings of the Working Committee, even advise in a detached way when my advice is sought. You will be surprised to hear that I have never listened in to a radio, nor have I ever been to a cinema."

The young correspondent was really amazed. "Do you think," he asked, "these things are bad?"

"I will not say so. I may say that cinema films are often bad. About the radio I do not know. I can certainly say this that I do not care to have news from all quarters of the globe within the space of half an hour. It leaves one little time to think. And why must one have news from all quarters of the globe every half an hour or so? I should be content to react to my nearest surroundings and happenings therein."

But the youth whispered some question about the Working Committee. "I do not mind telling you," replied Gandhiji, "that there are differences between me and the Working Committee. The whole nation is not with me on the non-violence question. If the nation as a whole was absolutely peaceful, I am sure we should not be in the war, I am sure we should not have this foreign domination here. The alien rulers would not be dictating to us. We should have people here from foreign lands on terms of friendship, and we should gladly make use of their talents at our will. But I am not worrying over the nation not being with me. When I have failed to convert my nearest associates, the members of the Working Committee, I have no business to be impatient with my people. It must be my fault. It means that there is not sufficient non-violence in me to enable me to carry everyone with me. But my faith in non-violence is undimmed and unshaken. In fact it is growing every day."

"Yours is a wonderful nation," said the Australian friend and departed.

Yarn Currency in Action

The annual 'Khadi Yatra' was arranged this year at Nalwadi on 11th April. The central function was an inspiring address by Vinoba. There was too a tunai competition in which about forty persons took part. The special pandal was packed to overflowing. The novel feature was the opening of the Swaraj Bhandar where yarn currency will be used. Gandhiji was invited to open it. As against yarn of specified measure a customer will get from the bhandar either cash up to a point or provisions and other necessities stored in the bhandar, or chits for one pice, one anna, one rupee or five rupees. The latter will enable the holder, on presentation at the bhandar, to get what goods he or she may need. All the chits that were kept ready were taken up by the eager visitors. Many had to be disappointed as no more chits were available. In declaring the bhandar open Gandhiji said that up till now they had been using Government coinage for all business transactions. He had conceived the idea of using yarn as a measure of value. This should result in preventing the tremendous waste of yarn that goes on among the thousands of spinners who spin for the A. I. S. A. Most of his ideas, Gandhiji said, were given practical shape and scientifically carried out at Nalwadi under the inspiration and direction of Vinoba. The latter had decided that the scheme should be put into practice from that day. The bhandar was the result of his labours. The success of the scheme, however, would depend upon the cooperation of the people. At the bhandars conducted under the scheme there would be reliable articles sold at fixed rates. Even a child would be able to buy without fear of being deceived. The output and quality of yarn in the neighbourhood should show a marked increase. The bhandar was designedly called Swaraj Bhandar. The originators believed that Swaraj could not be had through negotiations with the British. It could only be had by hard labour and hard thinking. Hence the constructive programme.

Gandhiji concluded by saying that India should be a land of plenty though there might, for various reasons, be shortage of grain. But if all of them laboured, even grain could be grown for the people's requirements. If each one were to spin, there would be no dearth of cloth or even of money.

EXCHANGE and HUMAN VALUES( By J. C. Kumarappa )*

Money exchange is indispensable mainly for the extension of markets. Money in itself satisfies no want except that of a miser who delights in counting his coins. It is a temporary storage of purchasing power and a convenient standard of value. When a person wants to sell his cow and get a wireless set it may not be possible for him to find one and the same person who wants to buy a cow and sell his wireless set in exchange. Therefore money intervenes and enables the seller to dispose of his cow first to anyone who wants a cow, and store the purchasing power represented by the value of the cow in the form of money till he meets one who has wireless sets to sell, and then he exchanges that purchasing power for the radio set. This medium becomes all the more essential when great distances separate the market for the cow from the market for the radio sets. Under modern imperialism where one country is kept down to produce raw materials for another distant country which produces manufactured articles, money economy has become the life breath of commerce. Although international settlements may be in goods, customers cannot buy an American motor car against the delivery of stacks of straw.

Extension of markets in their turn call for the army, navy and the air force to control them in the interests of particular nations. Money and credit have their place in commerce and trade. Though theirs is an important role, yet they have to be reined in and bridled if their functioning is to bring the people nothing but good in their wake. A properly balanced exchange economy calculated to curb these tendencies must provide for an element of barter. Inflation of currency during war time by the use of postage stamps, matches and playing cards as money must not be mistaken for barter which alone can help to retard the evil effects of money.

Where the standard of living of a people is near the subsistence level their purchasing power is spent mostly on food and other necessities. At such a stage, if money is largely used, then it would divert that purchasing power to some extent into luxuries, which often come from distant countries, and thus lower the true wealth computed in terms of human values. When money is taken by Government from a petty farmer, to whom it may mean so many days' food, and is paid to a high-salaried official, to whom the same amount may mean the price of a cigar, money exchange is the means of obliterating human values in wealth, and causing an avoidable loss in national wealth. This is especially noticeable in governmental transactions, which under such circumstances become the means of impoverishing the people. A barter system would have helped to make it impossible for Government to perpetrate the injustice of using India's reserves to the tune of crores in the London money market while our industries were starving for funds.

On the other hand, the use of barter in collecting taxes from the poor and disbursing it in kind lessens the chances of national waste and to a large extent acts as a check on governmental waste. Such a system of tax collection and disbursement, of course, involves a great deal of administrative and organisational difficulties but none that is insurmountable. To avoid inconveniences modern centralised Governments have thrown overboard admirable financial systems like the ones advocated by the Islamic and Jewish Codes of payment of taxes in kind by way of tithes, i. e. one-tenth of whatever is produced.

Though these systems are rare today, we see them still functioning with great efficiency in some Islamic States as in the Pathan States of Swat, Dir and Chitral on the Frontier. The State employs contractors to collect the State share of the actual produce—not estimated values in terms of money prices as in British India. The State share is generally one-tenth of all produce. In the case of sheep etc. the due is one animal for every completed 40 in the flock, with the option of payment of an equivalent in ghee or other animal produce. For cattle the owner has to give one seer of ghee per annum for keeping the herd, and grazing fees are paid by contract to the landlords.

There are Government contractors who act as bankers for these payments in kind. They receive the share of produce due to the State, store them and disburse them as directed by the State. They carry on external trade in the surplus of the produce and pay into the treasury the cash realised. They also control a great proportion of the internal trade. This readily places at the disposal of the Government an effective instrument to control prices at definite and convenient points of focus. Government employees—military and civil—below the rank of gazetted officers are paid once every six months partly in kind and partly in cash, while the higher officers draw their pay in cash from the treasury.

This system will enable us to get over many a handicap from which the farmer in British India suffers. Under the present system of collecting taxes in money the farmer is forced to sell his crops, sometimes even before harvesting, to find the wherewithal to satisfy the Revenue Department. Apart from the evils already dealt with in the earlier paragraphs, the effect on the market of such forced premature sales is to depress prices and burden the farmers with further losses.

If the periodical payments in kind to Government servants were so scheduled as to synchronise with the harvesting of wheat, rice, jowar, bajri, maize, cotton, etc., the difficulties of storage would be minimised, and such payments, though they may affect the import of manufactured goods adversely which will be unpalatable to foreign interests, would ensure an adequate distribution of food grains within the country and save the middlemen's charges to some extent.

An efficient exchange should facilitate proper distribution among the people. The modern problem is not one of production but of distribution. People are in dire need. The producers can produce large supplies, but the people are not able to make their wants effective for lack of purchasing power. A boy stands before a sweetmeat shop with his mouth watering for the goods displayed in the window, but his pocket is empty. His demand for the sweets is ineffective. Under the money economy he should have a mint at his disposal to enable him to obtain what he wants, or he will have to beg, borrow or steal purchasing power.

The way to non-violent control of the market, to a distribution of wealth with the minimum of friction, and to a mint under the control of the people is pointed out by Gandhiji in his proposal that a warp length of a single thread of yarn be taken as the lowest measure of value by khadi lovers. If this mint comes into vogue, the boy standing in front of the sweetmeat shop need only go home, take up his takli and spin the required length of yarn to get his coveted sweetmeat. The people will have a mint at their disposal. This mint will neither debase the coin nor will it inflate the currency. It will neither need the army, navy and the air force for its control, nor will call in the police for its protection.

In our country which abounds in labour wealth and suffers from a lack of opportunities for profitable employment but has an unlimited internal market for necessities, this device is calculated to give a hallmark to things that are running waste today and bring them into the market as coveted commodities.

Metallic money is humanly speaking imperishable while most consumption goods lose their value by keeping. This disparity places the holder of money at an advantage in bargaining. He can afford to bide his time, while the vendor of fruits, for instance, has to sell out before his goods perish naturally. To some measure this is alleviated in an exchange system which combines money and barter. Thus a well-regulated system of exchange of goods must provide for a certain amount of barter in the exchange of consumption goods, as well as for the payment of taxes in kind, if we are anxious to preserve distributive justice and human value in exchange.

TRAVANCORE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

In spite of the high percentage of education among men and women in Travancore, there is no such thing as real liberty in that unhappy land. Shri Thanu Pillai, the President of the State Congress, and Shri Ramachandran, a member of the Executive of the Travancore State Congress, have been sentenced to six months rigorous imprisonment for defying the ban on meetings of the Congress. If bans are imposed on public meetings because they are held under the auspices of certain organisations which ask for responsible government, they have to be defied. The leaders of such movements cannot stultify themselves by entirely gagging themselves. It is too great a price to pay for nominal liberty. Shri T. Pillai and Shri Ramachandran will serve the cause better through their imprisonment than they will by submitting to gagging orders. Here is Shri Ramachandran's statement before the Magistrate:

"There was first of all a communique issued by the Chief Secretary to the Government of Travancore, in which he had said that the celebration of the All India States' Peoples' Day would not be permitted. This was followed by an order of the District Magistrate, Trivandrum, served on some of us prohibiting the celebration of the States' Peoples' Day. My offence relates to this order of the District Magistrate. In that order it was made out that, if such a meeting was held and speeches made, there was the likelihood of a breach of the peace in Trivandrum. It further stated that, if the meeting was held and speeches made, there would come about an estrangement between the people and the Government. Immediately on receipt of this prohibitory order Shri Pattom Thanu Pillai and myself wrote a letter to the District Magistrate, in which we made it clear that this meeting was to be held not for the purpose of initiating an agitation but that it was just in response to an all-India observance. The meeting was to be held not in a public place but inside the Congress House premises. We made it clear also that the apprehension of a breach of the peace was absolutely unfounded. We had said that, if in spite of this clarification the meeting was prohibited, we would be violating the order. This explanatory letter did not elicit any reply from the District Magistrate. So the meeting was held. After Shri Thanu Pillai's arrest I took charge of the meeting and spoke for an hour. I must observe here that I had never seen a quieter meeting in my life. The position we took, therefore, viz. that there would be absolutely no breach of the peace, was confirmed by the meeting itself. The second point in the District Magistrate's order was that the meeting would bring about estrangement between the Government and the people. In my view this certainly was not one of the results of the meeting. It was, therefore, proved beyond any shadow of doubt that the District Magistrate's apprehensions were absolutely unfounded. Therefore, though I am technically guilty — because I certainly did violate the District Magistrate's order — the District Magistrate and not I was in the wrong. I am entitled, therefore, to an honourable acquittal. This technical guilt I had to take upon myself for the simple reason that I was not going to be persuaded not to do a thing which I considered wholly right and which my self-respect dictated that I should do."

States and Their People

I have suggested in these columns that the people of the States should remain calm and so far as possible not precipitate a clash, as events are shaping themselves in spite of us. But there is a limit to every such proposal. In Travancore, Mysore and Jodhpur things seem to have gone beyond endurance.

I have already referred to Travancore where two of its best workers have been cast into prison for the simple reason that they are too public-spirited to submit to autocracy.

The same thing is happening in Mysore though in a slightly different manner. The cause is identical. The Mysore State Congress must not be tolerated. I know how the members have tried to placate authority. They have refrained from raising large issues save that they must keep the goal of liberty before the Mysoreans.

And now comes serious news from Jodhpur. There, as in the other States, the local Parishad people have tried to work in cooperation with authority. They have raised no awkward questions. But the Rajputana States, like many others, have many jagirdars who are co-sharers with the Princes and derive authority from them. They may be termed States within States. These have no law governing them. The British Power has no direct control over them. The Princes are ever afraid of them. They dare not interfere with the exercise of the jagirdars' authority over the people within their jurisdiction. The result is that the people within these jagirdaris are the worst off in the Indian hierarchy. There was a clash, as far as my information goes, between the people and one of the jagirdars. This incident promises to lead to a major issue. Associations favoured by authority as in British India are, it is said, being set up against the popular Parishad. If a deliberate attempt is being made to suppress the local associations, the latter must accept the challenge and risk the worst in the full faith that liberty and truth cannot be suppressed for ever. But I would fain hope that the Princes and their advisers will, for their own sakes and for the good of India, curb the tendency in many States which cannot be described by any other adjective than lawless.

Opium Addicts

A correspondent writes as follows:

"I do not know whether you are aware that in Rajputana (Marwar) the inhabitants are terrible opium addicts. A wedding or death or any ceremonial occasion necessitates the offering of opium to the visitors. It may even mean the pawning of goods or mortgaging of property, but the opium has to be offered. It is quite an ordinary matter for a person to take 1½ or 2 tolas of opium per day and sometimes even more. I know of some who can swallow as much as five. When my father died I went home. A Brahman friend came to condole. The first thing was to offer him opium which is generally kept in a special box. There were three tolas in it. The Brahman said he would help himself. To my astonishment he emptied the entire contents on the palm of his hand and swallowed them. Having done so he said he was not satisfied. When I asked him how much was sufficient he replied 'four tolas'! And of course, if opium-eaters do not get their dope at the proper time, they are no better than useless lumps of flesh. This drug habit is eating as a canker into our society."

Deenbandhu Andrews and Pearson laboured on behalf of these addicts. We have not cared for them half as much as we have for the drink addicts. The effects of opium are not so patent as of drink so far as society is concerned. But both the vices have nothing between them to choose. Slaves of opium have their reason atrophied. They become living automata, having no interest in anything but their opium. How to deal with them is a tremendous question. Not until we have an unlimited band of workers, well-trained and seasoned, will it be possible to produce an effect on these helpless members of society. The medical profession can render valuable assistance by carrying on researches and discovering remedies for dealing with this social disease.

Interesting Figures

The following figures re: the work of the Spinners' Association in the famine-stricken areas of Hissar are illuminating. They should banish all foolish doubt regarding the efficacy of spinning and weaving centres for relieving distress as also prove the selfless nature of the work done by the Association.

1. The number of centres in January, February and March were 8, 12, and 13 respectively.
2. The number of spinners in January, February and March were 2,042, 4,588 and 5,914, and the wages paid to them were Rs. 3,213, Rs. 6,913 and Rs. 12,919 respectively.
3. The number of carders were 148, 223 and 274. Their wages were Rs. 855, Rs. 1,657, and Rs. 2,593.
4. The number of weavers were 308, 360, and 563, and the wages earned by them Rs. 354, Rs. 723 and Rs. 889.

Total number of artisans 6,771.

Total amount of wages paid Rs. 29,628.

Total amount of yarn purchased Rs. 38,042 worth.

Because there are very few weavers in Hissar District the amount of khadi actually produced there is only Rs. 6,797 worth. The yarn will of course be woven elsewhere.

It is interesting to note that Rs. 1,818 only were spent on salaries of workers.

TRAINING IN COTTAGE INDUSTRIES

Powerful forces are driving us to realise the importance of resuscitating the village and its economic life. In the first place, our country is a land of villages; so if we would work for the country, we must work for the villages. In the second place, young men educated in schools and colleges are more and more left unemployed. Literacy education has left them helpless in the face of the economic struggle for existence. Even in their own interests such men have to turn to village and cottage industries to earn their living. In the third place, the present uncertain conditions prevailing in towns and cities prevent young men from going back to colleges, which may not even reopen. In the fourth place, with war at our door, and with the consequent difficulty of transport, it has become essential for people wherever they are to produce all that they require for themselves. With the scanty capital available to us, the only possibility is for each family to take to some home industry or other and thus become self-dependent. And when our people have become self-dependent we shall have won real national independence.

With the object of preparing young men and women for village work and of teaching them a village industry, the All India Village Industries Association has been conducting courses in its Gram Sevak Vidyalaya at Wardha.

1. The next session for the Gram Udyog Vinit (Elementary General Course) of the Gram Sevak Vidyalaya, A. I. V. I. A. Wardha, is from the 1st July 1942 to the 30th April 1943.

2. Applicants for admission should not be under 22 years of age, should be healthy and fit for hard manual work, and should in education have reached at least the matriculation standard.

3. Students will have the option of taking one of the following two groups: 1. Oil-pressing, 2. Paper-making. Instructions in Bee-keeping and Soap-making will be given to both groups of students.

4. Expenses including fees, board, lodging and incidentals will amount to about Rs. 20 a month.

5. Students will reside in the Vidyalaya Hostel and take their meals there. The food served will be vegetarian.

6. No one should come before receiving a letter of admission from the Superintendent of the Vidyalaya.

Detailed prospectus and application forms may be had from the Superintendent, Gram Sevak Vidyalaya, Maganwadi, Wardha, C. P., to whom all applications in the prescribed form must reach before the 31st May, 1942.

A RURAL ANTHOLOGY

I have been turning over the pages of The Open Air, an anthology of English country life by Adrian Bell (Faber and Faber), and I was delighted but not surprised to find that rural culture in Britain is or rather was very much the same as in India, for all mankind is one in essence.

Handicrafts played as important a part in the English countryside as in an Indian village. As Mr. Bell says in his introduction, "before the tension of competitive money-making, of the need to support a certain social standard of amenity, paralysed the individual life; before water and heat became commodities, and the machine departmentalised and insulated vocations one from another; before the grooves of specialisation became so deep that the mind was blinkered and ran in one track, the knowledge of a craft gave a man intuitively a power of judgment over all other branches of life. Because the basic arts of life were homogeneous. Broadcasting, swift communications, give an illusory appearance of unification; they mask the real dispersion of mind that is taking place, the insulation of man from man. The different social temperatures in a modern railway carriage and in a stagecoach might be compared. Even the old horse-bus driver was a conversational person, to sit beside whom was something of a privilege; the driver of the motor vehicle is necessarily insulated." (The italics are mine.)

Here is an idyllic picture of a Scottish family in the middle of the eighteenth century from the pen of William and Robert Chambers taken from their Memoir:

"The farm of Tedderfield, situated on the hillface above Neidpath Castle, . . . . . the property of the Earl of March, was occupied at a rent of eighteen pounds, by an honest man named David Grieve . . . . This family (of fourteen children) afforded an example of the virtuous frugal life of the rural people of Scotland previous to that extension of industry which brought wealth and many comforts into our country. The breakfast was oatmeal porridge . . . . . Strange as it may seem, a people of many fine qualities were reared in this plain style, and people of bone and muscle, mentally as well as physically. There was not a particle of luxury in that Sabine life; hardly a single article of the kinds sold in shops was used. The food was all obtained from the farms, and the clothing was wholly of homespun. I cannot be under any mistake about it, for I have often heard the household and its ways described by my maternal grandmother, who was David Grieve's eldest daughter. Even the education of the children was conducted at home, the mother giving them lessons while seated at her spinning-wheel.

Janet, the eldest girl, was wedded at eighteen by a middle-aged farmer who rented a farm called. . . . . The marriage took place in 1768. On the day preceding the event, Janet's 'providing' . . . . was despatched in a cart from Tedderfield to what was to be her new home; the load of various articles being conspicuously surmounted by a spinning-wheel decorated with ribbons of different colours . . . . . Although the (Newby) homestead consisted of only a cottage, containing a kitchen and parlour, with the appendages of a barn etc., it gave shelter every night to groups of vagrant people.

My grandmother and her maids were generally up at an early hour in the morning to attend to the ewes, and their time for going to rest must have consequently been an early one. There was always however a period called 'between gloaming and supper-time', during which another industry was practised. Then it was that the wheels were brought out for the spinning of the yarn which was to constitute the clothing of the family. And I often think that it must have been a pleasing sight in that humble hall — the handsome young mistress amidst her troop of maidens, all busy with foot and finger, while the shepherds and their master would be telling stories or cracking jokes for the general entertainment, or some one with a good voice would be singing the songs of Ramsay and Hamilton." (The italics are mine.)

It is a curious but happy coincidence that the spinning-wheel, the only article that Gandhiji 'provides' for the girls whom he gives away in marriage, should also have been provided for Janet Grieve, and the handsome young mistress amidst her troop of maidens, all busy with foot and finger in the humble hall, remind us of fair Nausicaa's description of her mother Arete in the Odyssey:

"My mother, she beside a column sits
In the hearth's blaze, twirling her fleecy threads
Tinged with sea-purple, bright, magnificent!
With all her maidens orderly behind."

MEDIUM OF INSTRUCTION

(By Shriman Narayan Agrawal)

Now that the problem of the medium of instruction has evoked fresh interest in the country, it will be useful to know the present position in the various Indian Universities. I wrote to the Registrars of the different Universities in this connection, and a gist of their replies is given below:

In the Universities of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Delhi, Punjab, Agra, Patna, Dacca, Mysore and Andhra, the medium of instruction after the Matriculation stage is English. No immediate change is contemplated.

In the Muslim University, Aligarh, the medium of instruction in High School classes is Urdu, and the question of introducing Urdu as the medium of instruction in the Intermediate classes is under consideration.

The Registrar of the Allahabad University writes that "the University is fully alive to the necessity of making Hindi or Urdu the medium of instruction, and it will surely take steps as occasion arises."

In the Benares Hindu University "the examinees up to the Intermediate examination are permitted to answer their optional papers in Hindi. Further there is no restriction imposed on teachers and professors to teach their classes in English only. In case they so desire, they can teach in Hindi."

The Academic Council of the Lucknow University has recommended that the medium of instruction and examination should be Hindustani. Final decision has yet to be taken by the Executive Council. The following is the detailed recommendation regarding the language and the script:

"(a) The language used for instruction and examination should be Hindustani, which signifies the language in our everyday use, supplemented when necessary by words drawn from Sanskrit, Persian, English and other languages. In special cases the Executive Council may exempt individual teachers and paper-setters from the application of this rule.

(b) The script used for all scientific work written or printed, including question papers and answers, should be Roman, supplemented by new letters or signs whenever necessary.

(c) The language of books should be left to the discretion of the authors."

It is a pity that the Lucknow University is thinking of introducing the Roman script. It is hoped that wiser counsels will prevail and in place of the Roman script both 'Devnagri' and 'Persian' scripts will be introduced.

The Nagpur University Court has accepted the principle of my resolution regarding the gradual introduction of the mother-tongue medium. The details have yet to be worked out by the Academic and Executive Councils.

The Registrar of the Travancore University writes thus:

"This University fully appreciates the need for reform in this direction, but practical difficulties, such as the lack of suitable text-books of the right standard in the various subjects, the problem of the migration of students to and from this University etc. have stood in the way of any scheme of an extensive reform being adopted. This University has, however, organised a Department of Publications, which is engaged in the preparation of glossaries of scientific and technical terms in Malayalam, which will remove the chief obstacle in the way of the production of scientific books. It is hoped that the activities of the Department will pave the way for the production of suitable text-books and thus ultimately make University teaching possible in Malayalam. It has also to be borne in mind in this connection that, unless a well-planned and uniform policy is adopted in this matter by all the Indian Universities, reform is difficult if not impracticable. This University will always be prepared to consider and to fall in line with any well-considered scheme in this respect which may be sponsored by a competent body."

The Registrar is right in pointing out the desirability of concerted action. I expect that the Inter-University Board will tackle the problem in all seriousness at an early date.

In the Annamalai University "instruction through the medium of an Indian language has not yet been attempted. But, as decided by the authorities, arrangements are being made to get ready suitable text-books in Tamil of the Intermediate standard on the various optional subjects of study for the Intermediate course. So far text-books in Logic, Economics, Physics, Chemistry have been published and text-books in other subjects — Mathematics, Botany, Zoology, History will be published shortly. As soon as text-books are got ready, the question of teaching them in the language will be considered."

ONE THING NEEDFUL

( By M. K. Gandhi )

"To those of us who love India and Indians and have tried to serve her people faithfully, the fact that in our hour of distress the hatred against us is growing is a matter of infinite sorrow. I admit we have not played and are still not playing fair by India; but can two wrongs make a right? When even the 'enemy' is in dire distress should he not be given some quarter? In asking us to withdraw are you not inviting your own people to bend the knee to Japan, knowing full well that you have not the non-violent strength as a country to resist any foreign aggression or domination? If you had had it, we could never have kept our hold on you. Will you not forgive past sins and rely on the goodwill of the new generation of Englishmen and women who can no longer think in terms of empire? Barring you, among the Congress leaders, is there anyone who believes whole-heartedly in non-violence? Yours is the only logical position, and you alone are a real friend of Britain."

This is an epitome of a pathetic English letter. I can but repeat what I felt and said in my letter to Lord Linlithgow recording my impressions of the first interview with him after the declaration of war. I have nothing to withdraw, nothing to repent of. I remain the same friend today of the British that I was then. I have not a trace of hatred in me towards them. But I have never been blind to their limitations as I have not been to their great virtues.

I do not deny the existence of hatred among the people at large, nor its increase with the march of events. But I claim that my national prescription has kept it under subjection and even sterilised it to an extent.

I am convinced, therefore, that the time has come during the war, not after it, for the British and the Indians to be reconciled to complete separation from each other. That way and that way alone lies the safety of both and, shall I say, the world. I see with the naked eye that the estrangement is growing. Every act of the British Government is being interpreted, and I think rightly, as being in its own interest and for its own safety. There is no such thing as joint common interest. To take the extreme case, a British victory over the Japanese will not mean a victory for India. But that is not a near event. Meanwhile the introduction of foreign soldiers, the admitted inequalities of treatment of Indian and European evacuees, and the manifestly overbearing behaviour of the troops are adding to the distrust of British intentions and declarations. I feel that they cannot all of a sudden change their traditional nature. Racial superiority is treated not as a vice but a virtue. This is true not only in India; it is equally true in Africa it is true in Burma and Ceylon. These countries could not be held otherwise than by assertion of race superiority.

This is a drastic disease requiring a drastic remedy. I have pointed the remedy—complete and immediate orderly withdrawal of the British from India at least, in reality and properly from all non-European possessions. It will be the bravest and the cleanest act of the British people. It will at once put the Allied cause on a completely moral basis and may even lead to a most honourable peace between the warring nations. And the clean end of Imperialism is likely to be the end of Fascism and Nazism. The suggested action will certainly blunt the edge of Fascism and Nazism which are an offshoot of Imperialism.

British distress cannot be relieved by nationalist India's aid in the manner suggested by the writer. It is ill-equipped for the purpose, even if it can be made enthusiastic about it. And what is there to enthuse nationalistic India? Just as a person cannot feel the glow of the sun's heat in its absence, even so India cannot feel the glow of freedom without the actual experience of it. Many of us simply cannot contemplate an utterly free India with calmness and equanimity. The first experience is likely to be a shock before the glow comes. That shock is a necessity. India is a mighty nation. No one can tell how she will act and with what effect when the shock is delivered.

I feel, therefore, that I must devote the whole of my energy to the realisation of the supreme act. The writer of the letter admits the wrong done to India by the British. I suggest to the writer that the first condition of British success is the present undoing of the wrong. It should precede, not follow, victory. The presence of the British in India is an invitation to Japan to invade India. Their withdrawal removes the bait. Assume, however, that it does not; free India will be better able to cope with the invasion. Unadulterated non-cooperation will then have full sway.

NEGATION OF DEMOCRACY

An American reader of Harijan writes:

"For many years my husband and I have been enthusiastic readers of Harijan. We have looked upon it as an indispensable aid to the understanding of essential Indian thought and leadership. And because it has meant so much to us personally, we have tried to encourage others to read it—especially those who come from the West.

On the front page of the recent issue of Harijan for March 22nd there appears another article continuing the theme of British and American Nazism. I believe firmly that in justice to truth and the ideal of human brotherhood all examples of race discrimination or disrespect for personality in any form should be ferreted out and corrected. As one looks over the face of the globe today one is sobered by the fact that no race, country or group is free from this disgraceful behaviour. This fact alone should be enough to foster deep, penitent humility on the part of all, and at the same time encourage cooperative endeavour among men and women of all groups and nationalities who are sensitive to the needs of this problem. Thus you render America a service when you call her attention to such forms of discrimination and challenge her in her supposed stand for democracy. It is extremely helpful for an individual, class, country or civilization to see itself as others see it. And no brief can be held for America's share in class distinction, whether it be toward the Negro, her own semi-literate poor, or people of other nationalities.

But I should also like to comment on a few statements or quotations from your articles which appear misleading. Going back to an earlier issue (Feb. 15, '42) I was surprised to find the statement that Dr. Carver, the great American scientist, 'remains in America the shunned Negro that he was nearly eighty years ago.' Judging from personal experience this is a misleading statement. The Readers' Digest has carried a number of excellent articles on the life and spirit of Dr. Carver, as well as accounts of his unique discoveries. During my stay in U. S. A., in '38-'39, I noted innumerable occasions on which he was quoted, admired, in New York and other parts of the East which singled him out as the important speaker on many special occasions. It is also interesting to recall that at federated meetings, Columbia University lectures, the Riverside pulpit and elsewhere he was the scientist most frequently referred to either because of his scientific achievements, or because of his spiritual leadership, or both. Neither Einstein nor the Compton brothers who were so frequently before the public in the early thirties received such ovations.

In another article you bring to the attention of the reader the painfully neglected truth that 'there is no doubt that there cannot be a peace to which Indians or the Negroes can give assent unless it has for its foundation democracy broad-based on the freedom and equal citizenship rights of all — white, black, yellow, etc.' But without in the least detracting from this matter of major concern may a few brief comments be made in regard to points (1) and (5).

To one who has attended a variety of schools and universities in the U. S. A., it is difficult to see how the statement that 'Negro students are not admitted to common educational institutions nor are separate equal facilities provided for them' is not misleading. At Ohio State, Union Seminary, Columbia University, and Northfield Seminary, to name just a few, Negro students have been admitted, and have achieved high positions of leadership.

The quotation under point (5) that 'Niggers must be made to know their place, with violence and terror if necessary,' America certainly needs to face and rectify. The question which interests me here is how we can reveal national or individual shortcomings in such a way as to arouse the least amount of self-defence and the most determined action for change. Knowing the human weakness of jumping to the defensive, which besets us all to a greater or less degree, I am afraid many Americans would miss the challenge behind point (5) and say here India—and perhaps the West have themselves to thank for this—is giving general significance to an attitude which large areas of American opinion itself condemns, and overlooking the growing endeavours that are being put forth to give the Negro his rightful inheritance.

My husband joins me in sending you our sincere greetings. India is much on our hearts, especially during these fateful days that lie just ahead."

I gladly publish the American friend's letter in full. As regards the two inaccuracies she has pointed out, I am thankful for the facts, but let me make one or two things clear. It is not that conditions have not improved or are not improving, but it is still true that even a person of the spiritual status of Dr. Carver does not enjoy the same citizen rights as a White American. That he is respected by some of the enlightened Americans is not to be disputed. To take an example of the unfortunate condition in India, Dr. Ambedkar is respected by most of the educated people in India, but even he suffers from the same disabilities as other Harijans, so far as temples, residential quarters etc. are concerned. The colour bar should be an offence in democratic America, even as untouchability should be an offence in a free and democratic India.

As regards students, segregation is not so bad in Northern States, but my remark is absolutely true in respect of most of the Southern States. "After 1938 U. S. Supreme Court Decision ordering the State of Missouri to admit Lloyd L. Gaines to the University of Missouri Law School or provide equal facilities within the State, a separate Law School for Negroes authorised by the Taylor Bill has been organised at St. Louis as an extension of the State-supported Lincoln University." (Enc. Brit. Book of the Year 1940) Even the Supreme Court decision could not secure to the Negroes entry into the common law-school.

Regarding the last remark, let me say that I had only summarised in two or three sentences a series of very unpleasant incidents. If the general attitude were sound and these incidents only exceptional, I should have nothing to say. The New Republic devotes a long article to the question, and points out that resentment had reached a white heat among Negro circles because of incidents of this character. I had deliberately refrained from mentioning another factor which is equally galling. As a rule Negroes are debarred from jobs in the defence industries. "Of 1400 boys," wrote Time (Nov. 41), "recently trained by the City's schools for defence work only 70 got jobs." And The New York Times wrote: "If the nation is engaged on the side of democracy, it must leave the doors of opportunity open to all, regardless of race." Again: "Discrimination against opportunities for the Negro to learn and practise skilled trades is not confined to the South, nor is it practised only by the employers . . . . This is a situation in which men and women are being held back not by lack of ability and trustworthiness but because of race . . . The issue is more than factional. It involves simple justice and loyalty to the democratic ideal."

It is this loyalty to the democratic ideal that is woefully lacking both in U. S. A. and the British Empire. Apart from the numerous instances that even the conduct of the war has disclosed, the Empire itself is a negation of democracy. These instances reduce the much-vaunted 'Atlantic Charter' to a mockery.

FOR "COMMON FOLK"

Two letters from readers of Harijan belonging to different parts of India, and describing themselves as common folk are worthy of notice for the benefit of those who come under that category — indeed, the vast mass of people do not belong to any other category. One is from an ordinary clerk in a small town in the District of 24 Parganas in Bengal. The sentiments in the letter are entirely his, the language is mine:

"I am a regular spinner. I have just finished another year of my spinning yajna. In spite of various difficulties and preoccupations this year, I spun 65 hanks (640 yards each) of 16 to 18 counts from cotton collected from the tree-cotton in my own yard and carded by my children. This was enough to give me 3 dhotis, and 5 yards of khadi for two shirts for my own use for a year. I am doing nothing extraordinary, but I should like to give you some details in order to show that the excuse of want of time is after all a lame one. After finishing the morning functions at 5 in the morning I start spinning which I do for a couple of hours. I believe with Shri Vinoba that 'spinning is a daily spiritual sacrifice with a view to identifying oneself with the poor and adding something to national wealth. It disciplines us and helps us to make our lives orderly.' I have to attend office from 11 a. m. to 7 p. m., and naturally I have to attend to my daily duties as householder — making purchases, domestic duties and so on. During the last year I have had to cook for myself and my children for several months. This year I have started the yajna with a couple of hours' spinning as I have said, and it begins with the first day of the National Week. Many of my friends, whom I ask to devote at least half an hour to spinning every day, say they have no time, when I know for a fact that they waste two or more hours every day in idle talk or worse. How I wish they could be persuaded to take a leaf from my book."

I too wish that the millions of our common folk could be persuaded to copy this humble man's example.

The other letter is of a different type. The writer is from Bangalore. He does not know English. He reads Harijansevak. He writes:

"I was addicted to intoxicating drugs like bhang, ganja, charas. I could not do without them for a single day. I knew that the thing was bad, I often disliked it myself, as indeed the members of my family did dislike me. But a bad habit is not easy to give up. I often made an attempt, but work became difficult without a puff at my chilam. Harijansevak opened my eyes. Often enough there would be something in the articles which would make me ashamed of myself and say: 'You must leave this hateful habit.' Once as I was reading your article I resolved to give up bhang, ganja, charas, and as an earnest of my determination I decided to inform you of my decision and send you Rs. 1-4-0. Well, I have kept the resolve. You have raised me from the state of a brute to man's estate, and I cannot adequately thank you. I made the resolve four years ago, and thanks to your grace I have never broken the resolve. But I should have written to you when I made the resolve and sent Rs. 1-4-0. I am sending you Rs. 5 now, as a penalty for my failure to do so for four years."

This is a very plain letter from an ordinary man, but it teaches every one of us that ordinary men can take extraordinary decisions and keep them. I do hope the writer has given up tobacco also along with the other drugs, for tobacco is as deadly in its effect as the rest. Tolstoy has said that smoking is worse in its criminal effects than drink, and now America's famous heavy-weight boxing champion—Gene Tunney—has written a vivid article to prove that nicotine knocks the bottom out of our physical, moral and spiritual strength. It is an article which, for want of space, I cannot reproduce. But some sentences in it deserve to be hung up as mottoes in every public place to warn smokers against what they are in for:

"With every puff heavy smokers shorten their own lives. . . . You do get a lift when you light a cigarette. But it is exactly like the lift you get from cocaine, heroin, marijuana. Under the nicotine whip the body burns up faster; heart-action, respiration and blood pressure are kept at a ding dong pitch. . . . Dr. Alexis Carrel states that even one puff from a cigarette contracts the tiniest capillaries in your legs and feet. . . . Too many people accept their craving for tobacco as a commonplace social habit. But I maintain that heavy smoking is a disease symptom. . . . While I was training for my second fight with Jack Dempsey, I was offered 15,000 dollars to endorse a certain brand of cigarettes. I didn't want to be rude, so in declining I merely said I didn't smoke. He came again with another offer—12,000 dollars if I would let my picture be used with the statement that 'stinkies must be good because all my friends smoke them'. That compelled me to say what I thought—that cigarettes were a foul pestilence, and that advertising which promoted their use was a national menace. . . . Ty Cobb, the famous Georgia Peach of baseball says: 'Cigarette smoking stupefies the brain, saps vitality, undermines health, and weakens moral fibre. No one who hopes to be successful in any line can afford to contract so detrimental a habit.' In face of such testimony I can only ask, with Tolstoy, 'Why do men stupefy themselves with tobacco?'"

The only thing is to realise that the smoking habit is a devastating scourge, and our friend whose letter I have cited above shows that even common folk can easily get rid of it.

HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Harijan Sevak Sangh met in Wardha on 28th and 29th April. Seth G. D. Birla was considerate and took very little of my time. I have developed a dislike for making speeches, but I consented to answer some of the questions the members had brought with them to Sevagram on the 29th morning. The answers to these will be of use to all Harijan workers. Most were in Hindustani, some in English, and one in Gujarati. I suggested that in future all questions should be in Hindustani. Those who do not know either Hindi or Urdu should make it a point to learn the national language, and until such time as they are unable to write in Hindustani themselves, they must get someone to do so for them.

Q. The Harijan Sevak Sangh is looked upon as a part of the Congress. But very few Congressmen are Harijan workers. Why?

A. The Sangh is not a part of the Congress. It was the outcome of the fast I undertook in 1932 when I was in jail. The meeting of Hindus drawn from every class, which was held under the presidentship of Pandit Malaviyaji and which gave birth to the Sangh, deliberately decided to keep the organisation separate from the Congress and non-political. It was this quality of the Sangh that enabled Seth G. D. Birla to become its President and Shri Thakkar Bapa its Secretary. Nevertheless there are and ought to be many Congressmen in the Sangh, because practically all reformers are drawn into the Congress fold. But it is true that there are plenty of non-Congress persons in the Sangh. It is also true that those Congressmen who are only interested in politics do not come into it. It is, therefore, sometimes wrongly thought that Congressmen do not take an interest in the Sangh. It is the duty of every Congressman to remove untouchability, root and branch, from his life.

Q. Harijan service has really developed into mere Harijan uplift. Practically no work is done among Caste Hindus for the removal of untouchability. What is the remedy for this?

A. Experience shows that propaganda among Caste Hindus can only be successfully carried out by influential persons whose word carries weight with the general public. Such persons are hard to find. But it is within the capacity of every Harijan worker to carry on mute propaganda. Our Caste Hindu workers are often satisfied with mere uplift work among the Harijans, which is not sufficient. Many workers, while they do not observe untouchability themselves, are unable even to convert their own families. How then can they influence the outside world? Moreover it is my confirmed opinion that every Harijan worker has to make it a point to beg for even one pice for Harijans from those Caste Hindus with whom he comes in contact. If all devoted themselves, heart and soul, to this task, very good results would ensue.

Q. Should not the Sangh take upon itself the service of those Harijans who have been converted to Christianity or Islam and are yet treated as untouchables? Are we not out to remove untouchability root and branch and therefore help all who come under its sway?

A. This question has already been answered in the columns of Harijan but must bear repetition so long as it is raised. The moment untouchability is utterly banished from Hindu society it will, ipso facto, disappear from elsewhere too. Whatever the merits or demerits of the case, it is clear that our interference with converts will be the cause of strife with Muslims and Christians. Such converts have either broken off all contacts with, or they have been in their turn boycotted by, Hindus. They have thrown in their lot with other sects whose leaders will not allow them to maintain their old contacts. Hence the H. S. S. quite rightly decided from its inception to confine its area of work to Harijans who had not left the Hindu fold. A convert, having left his original fold, is no longer guided or controlled by it.

Q. What should be the attitude of the Sangh, if Harijan boys wish to enlist in the army?

A. They should be allowed to do so. They may not be controlled by the Congress policy or ahimsa. They must be given absolute freedom of choice.

Q. Harijans are of opinion that Caste Hindus who are sympathetic to their cause should not use those temples where they are not allowed entry.

A. They are right. It is the bounden duty of Harijan workers not to go where Harijans are not allowed and likewise to dissuade Caste Hindus.

Q. Harijans are legally entitled to send their children to many educational institutions as also to draw water from public wells. But public sentiment still militates against this being put into practice. Should Harijans resort to the law courts for justice in these matters or wait patiently until the Caste Hindus are converted?

A. Where there is no danger of violence being done to them, the Harijans should exercise their legal right and where necessary resort to law courts. Harijan workers must continue agitation among Caste Hindus and not rest content with mere legal rights.

Q. Is it not essential to reform the insanitary methods employed by sweepers for cleaning latrines and scavenging?

A. It is most necessary. What is more, until this is done the condition of sweepers will remain pitiable. To this end it is the duty of Harijan workers and Caste Hindus to do sweepers' work themselves. No Caste Hindu will employ the methods used by sweepers. He will do the work scientifically. For example, he will never remove excreta in a basket or carry it on his head; he will cover excreta with dry earth and remove it in a metal vessel. He will avoid touching dirt with his hands as far as possible; he will clean the vessels with water and a rod; he will bathe immediately after doing the work; he will wear special clothes when scavenging. These reforms do not cost much. They require intelligence, hard work, and love of an ideal. We may not relegate sweepers' work to one particular class. Therefore all should learn it in the same way as cooking. Each person should be his own sweeper. If this ideal were to be put into practice in society, the miserable condition of sweepers would at once be rectified.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Barren Cows

Q. Why may not work such as ploughing or grinding corn be taken from barren cows? Would that not be one way of preventing their going to the slaughter house?

A. This question used to be much discussed at one time owing to the enthusiasm of a Punjabi who used to advocate the use even of milch cows for draft purposes. He used to claim that they would yield more and richer milk for the exercise given to them. Anyway my devotion to the cow does not preclude me from taking such labour as she can perform without the slightest detriment to her body. The fact is that our treatment of draft animals leaves much to be desired. I would welcome the use of barren cows for gentle labour, if only it would make people more considerate than they are towards the other animals.

From the Frying Pan?

Q. You advise evacuation of cities likely to be bombed and migration into the villages. Do you imagine the villages to be safe? As a matter of fact the villagers are more panic-stricken than the city-dwellers. There is inadequate police protection, and villagers live in hourly terror of dacoits and robbers. Is it not a matter of jumping from the frying pan into the fire?

A. I have not suggested migration to the villages for the soft life they will provide. Fright was no ingredient of my plan. It was and still is good even from a military point of view as has now been made abundantly clear. All the danger you present is undoubtedly bound up with the migration to the villages. But that to my mind is an additional reason for it. Who will put heart into the villagers and dispel panic, if it is not the right type of experienced city people? They will cover not only the aged and the infirm who may migrate to the villages, but they will also help and serve the villagers in the many ways I have pointed out in these columns. Courage is indispensable in these times for every true act.

Rotatory Government

Q. In order to solve the communal tangle, why not divide India into two sections as far as population goes, e. g. Mussalmans, Christians and Parsis in one, and Hindus, Sikhs and Depressed Classes in the other. Let the first section rule for a period of five years by means of elected representatives and the second section come in similarly later. Would this not allay the present mistrust? As for Princes' India, could a Committee of elected Princes be entrusted with the work of governing all the States?

A. Your question reads well on paper; but your suggestion, if acted upon, must break down in practice. The act of government is not the simple thing you seem to imagine. What you suggest may work as a toy when the strings are pulled by armed authority. It won't be our Government. The puller of the strings will govern. That is the old way. I have presented the better way—the non-violent method. In either case the first condition is that every trace of foreign authority should be removed from the land. Then and then only shall we know our real selves—our strength as well as our weaknesses. When we are untrammelled by foreign or other authority and free, we shall know how to deal with the day-to-day problems. We won't then be governed in the neat way mentioned by you. The arbiter then will be either the sword or reason.

Deceitful Nomenclature

Morley has somewhere protested against the misuse of words, as being one of the causes of loose thinking. The phrase 'National Government' is an illustration of loose thinking. Admittedly none of the political parties—including the Congress—expects that any 'National Government' that may be formed at present will have the right to put an end to the war irrespective of the wishes of Great Britain. It can only be the Indian branch of the British Government. It is self-deception to call such office-taking 'National Government'. The name has already entrapped some of our legislators, and many more of them are yet willing to be entrapped. If we think closely instead of loosely, we will find that we cannot form a 'National Government' in the existing state of things.

LIFE OR DEATH?

A correspondent writes:

"Gandhiji's article on Foreign Soldiers has been interpreted by various people in various ways. For instance, the sentence, 'The Nazi power had risen as a nemesis to punish Britain for her sins of exploitation and enslavement of the Asiatic and African races', is innocuous enough. But some of my friends here say: 'This is nothing short of a curse pronounced by Mahatmaji. He thinks what is happening is just punishment for Britain's sins, and if she is defeated she will have deserved it.' Some say: 'Mahatmaji wants Britain to be defeated and sees nothing but good for India in Britain's defeat. He would seem to favour a Japanese invasion.' On the contrary you have often said that we cannot wish for Britain's defeat, and Pandit Jawaharlal has said that the victory of Nazism and Fascism would mean impenetrable darkness on earth.

Now this theory of a just nemesis cuts both ways. We have been slaves all these years. Must Britain's coming in India be taken to be a just punishment for our sins? The well-to-do orthodox say that the untouchables are being punished for their sins. Even so the British may say we are being punished for our sins. The theory of a just nemesis can thus be easily used against us."

There is a lot of confusion in this letter. As the correspondent himself has admitted the sentence quoted is innocuous, though in the last paragraph of his letter he contradicts himself. The sentence quoted summarises in a nutshell the facts of history. Look at any history of the British Empire, and you will find that what Gandhiji has said is but a mild indictment. I need not make more than a passing reference here to the dark record of the East India Company, the horrors of the "Sepoy Mutiny" and the annexations that followed. Need I narrate the story of the West Indies where "the Negroes brought from Africa were exposed for sale under the British flag and sent to serve European masters all over the new world"? Nor need I narrate the story of the series of Kaffir Wars with Basutos, Zulus, Matabele. "The Kaffirs were defeated, but they proved much too virile a people to go under as the blacks of Australia or the redskins of North America did;" the blacks in Australia were exterminated, but the "primary problem of policy is now the desire to keep the yellow man out of the vast open spaces of Australia"; not until a whole series of wars did the Maoris of New Zealand, "these contumacious people learn their place in the British scheme of things"; and consolidation in the Pacific naturally led to the annexation of the Fiji Islands; the scramble for grubbing South Africa reached its height in 1885 when it was solemnly legalised by a conference of the European Powers which met at Berlin, where all bound themselves to go ahead with the partition of Africa in order "to further the moral and material well-being of the native population"; then come the "treaties" with the native chiefs and the story of Kenya and Rhodesia where "the natives were herded into 'reserves' and the fertile land handed over to white settlers." "In China it was for the moral benefit of the Chinese that Britain used armed force to compel China to buy opium and to open China to outside world trade. Some 300,000 square miles were added to the British Empire in the nineteenth century, and "much of this expansion had unfortunately to be achieved by the use of force against the original inhabitants — black, brown, or yellow — of the square miles in question." This led to rivalry and bickerings ultimately leading to the world war, in which Britain was victorious and Britain's share of the spoils was tremendous. There was unrest everywhere — among the vanquished; in India; in Egypt; in Ireland; in China; among the natives of various parts of Africa. "It was clear," sums up Horrabin, "that there would have to be more and more repression, more deals with the capitalist classes of the Dominions, more Pacts with allies, bigger and bigger armaments."

The building up of the Empire was the beginning of the end. The war of 1914-1918 was won, but peace was lost. Instead of humbling the victors it intoxicated them.

"Not the faintest attempt was made to be merciful or fair or even decently polite to the vanquished foe... Even so unexceptionable an English economist as Mr. Maynard Keynes pointed out the insanity of demands that might have put any businesslike robber to the blush... In intention and appearance the peace registered the defeat and downfall of the German Empire. But perhaps some historian of the future viewing these things in surer perspective may decide that in the context of civilisations, the defeat was not German, but British or Anglo-American... If ever it could have been said of a whole nation that it was not itself, that description would have applied to Britain in the time immediately following the Armistice... The wildest extravagances of sentiment and conduct were in vogue. In this shell-shocked atmosphere things were perpetrated which almost suggested that Britain herself had gone Prussian. Frightfulness in India, frightfulness in Ireland."

This is what a Liberal historian Esme Wingfield-Stratford has written. He is not an enemy of the Empire, he has even defended the benevolent intentions of Britain, but British behaviour after the war sickened even him, and in one sentence he has summed up his worst fears: "The dragon's teeth that had been sown did not sprout all in a moment." He refrains from discussing the complications and cross-currents of the daily changing situation, but grandiloquently sums up in the self-satisfied way of the benevolent British Imperialist: "Mankind has to choose between two ways, one of Empire, which is now that of the Totalitarian Powers, the other of Freedom, which is our British way, so long as Britain preserves that truth to herself which is the soul of her civilisation. The choice is in the deepest sense between life and death." (The Foundations of British Patriotism) One word of comment on this. It is absolute truth that the Empire way is the way of death, the Freedom way is the way of life. Britain is still going right ahead along the Empire way, and in asking Britain to withdraw from India and to disgorge her ill-gotten gains Gandhiji is asking her to choose even at this late hour Freedom's way or the way of Life.

The sentence that Gandhiji has written has almost a literal echo in another British writer, Middleton Murry, a fellow-pacifist:

"The moral debacle of the blockade and of Versailles plunged me into a condition of despair concerning human destiny out of which I struggled only after five long years, and then only by way of a mystical illumination. My faith such as it is is not primarily a faith in this world. Nevertheless the most transcendent faith must return to earth. It is here on the sweet and violated earth that we must struggle that the good may prevail. If the war of 1914-18 and the shameful peace which ended it appeared to me 20 years ago so nakedly evil, so beyond all possibility of justification, that it weighed like lead upon my soul for five long years, is it possible that the consequences of this crime against man, this sin against God, shall be expiated without a terrible humiliation for my country? I do not pretend to answer. But I ask myself the question again and again. There is repentance; and there is humiliation. I believe that the salvation of democracy lies in repentance." (Defence of Democracy)

I suppose that makes Gandhiji's meaning clear beyond the shadow of a doubt. Gandhiji does not wish for a Nazi or Japanese victory any more than do Esme Wingfield-Stratford and Middleton Murry. But he shares their wholesome fear, and he has, if I may say so, an intuition that, if Britain does not repent in the way he has suggested, she will be humiliated.

Remains the last question. Is the statement about a just nemesis double-edged? Is there any justice in the criticism that the statement sounds like that of the orthodox Hindus that the untouchables are suffering for their sins, or of Britain that India is suffering for her sins? The statement about a just nemesis lies ill in the mouth of those whom God uses as instruments of punishment. Nemesis would herself mock viciously at Hitler, if he said that he was being used by God to punish iniquitous Britain. The untouchables may have sinned; but we have been vastly deeper sinners and, if we do not atone for our sin, it is Dr

Ambedkar whom God will ultimately use to destroy Hinduism. When Gandhiji said that if untouchability remains Hinduism perishes, he did not pronounce a curse on Hinduism, any more than he has now done on Britain. Hinduism can still save itself from extinction by purging itself of untouchability, as Britain still can by wiping out the sin of Empire and retiring in an honourable and repentant manner from India and other territories. The dragon's teeth that had been sown are now sprouting, and the frightful crop may have to be reaped in a manner never reaped before. The atonement cannot be done after the war. It has to be done today. The way of Empire is death, the way of Freedom is Life. Which shall she choose?

MAGANWADI CONVOCATION

The A. I. V. I. A. held its convocation at Maganwadi, Wardha, on 29-4-42. Shri Vinoba Bhawe presided. The Secretary's report showed that

"Training given in Maganwadi is divided into two main groups: oil-pressing and paper-making. The A. I. V. I. A. has a three year plan for expanding the ghani industry in the country with a capital investment of about Rs. 20,000 to begin with. The centres are to undertake manufacturing and supply of ghanis, training of carpenters, and doing general propaganda work. The Board of Management of the Association has also allowed some latitude with regard to the process of making pulp for paper-making by the use of mechanical power under certain restrictions. The idea behind it is to make paper cheap, improve the quality, and make it available in large quantities.

In the session under report 32 students were admitted. Of these 26 were for Vinit courses and 6 for special courses in paper industry. Of the former 8 were deputed by the C. P. Government, 3 by the Bombay Government, 3 by the Sind Government, 8 by the Gwalior State, 2 (1 from Tamilnad and 1 from Bihar) were awarded A. I. V. I. A. scholarships, and 2 (one from the Punjab and one from Phaltan State) bore their own expenses. Of these 11 took oil-pressing and 15 took paper-making.

Subsequently one student from the Gwalior Government changed over from the regular to the special course, and two students in paper-making from the same Government went on leave and did not return. 21 students remained till the end of the session.

The result of the final examination was as given below: 1 was awarded a merit certificate, 4 obtained pass certificates, 1 failed, 14 qualified for industry certificates.

Two more students were admitted for the short courses in paper-making during the session. Besides training in the major industries of the group for which they were admitted, 14 students were trained in bee-keeping and soap-making out of sujji, and 7 were trained in soap-making and date palm gud making."

Shri Vinoba in addressing the students said that the certificates he had distributed were an indication of the preparation and training imparted for the life they had chosen to adopt. These were perilous times in which each one was going to be severely tested. We may not be fully prepared, but there were ample opportunities for service. When they went to the villages they would find standards of life very low, but the villagers' standards of service were high. So far only saints had served them. Otherwise everyone had exploited them. The villagers were shrewd and closely examined those who went and lived with them. It was not an easy thing to obtain their certificate. They must not be looked down on by us, their servants, as illiterate or ignorant in comparison with ourselves. They have their own methods of work in agriculture as in all matters pertaining to their requirements. Very often it has been found that those who try to impart book knowledge to them fail miserably when put to practical tests. They are hard-working, as a rule. No worker, therefore, with half-baked knowledge or one who is lazy will make good in a village. Above all he has to become one with the villagers in every respect. There can be no entrance for a worker into the hearts of the people unless he learns to be attracted by their qualities and disregards their shortcomings. "I always look upon the merits of a person as the window through which one can enter his heart and the weaknesses as the walls. It is no good battering one's head against a wall when an entrance is there for us. And if we are unable to see the good in others, there is something gravely lacking in us."

The next thought Shri Vinoba conveyed to the students was that they should be above all party strife in villages. Their only 'ism' in these days of 'isms' was service. And in that whole-hearted service there must be neither desire for reward nor looking for results.

Lastly he impressed on them that they would have to serve in various ways but they must never neglect the industrial side of their work. At least half the day should be devoted to whatever craft they had taken up. They had to continue to improve their knowledge and become experts. Their minds must be fresh and alert; quick to respond to local conditions. In Maganwadi they had been provided with every facility. In villages they would have to depend on their own ingenuity. It was the little things in everyday life which would be the big things for them. Therefore their practical knowledge of the crafts must penetrate down to the minutest detail. A man who can weave beautiful patterns is no good, if he cannot set up a loom and put it right if it gets out of order.

Village soil was not easy to cultivate. The career they had chosen for themselves would need infinite patience, keen intelligence and abounding love. Shri Vinoba hoped that those who had received certificates at Maganwadi would in due course obtain what he would call the real certificates of merit from the world in whose service they had decided to live.

A portrait of Seth Jamnalal Bajaj having been unveiled, the ceremony came to an end.

PURPOSEFUL POLITICS

The atmosphere today is surcharged with politics, but few stop to think what it is all about and to what end. Some are scared by the Japanese bombs and would fain hide themselves behind the skirts of Britannia and offer cooperation on any terms in her imperialistic war. Others there be who disdain Britain's offer but roll up their sleeves gallantly to rescue China, forgetting the clay feet on which we are standing. Being slaves ourselves we cannot help others before attaining our own freedom. Is the end of politics war? Or is it capturing a number of seats in the legislatures to let out hot air? Or is it to secure a few good posts and titles for our friends and members of our community and thus incidentally glorify ourselves?

Freedom

Some will rightly answer that our politics are calculated to secure independence and freedom. Yes, but freedom for what and from what? True freedom should be conducive to the growth of the people. As Tagore puts it freedom is

"Where the mind is without fear and the head is held high,

Where knowledge is free;

Where the world has not been broken up into fragments

by narrow domestic walls;

Where words come from the depth of truth,

Where tireless striving stretches its arms towards Perfection!

Mysore

Reference has already been made in these columns about the Mysore Government's repressive measures against the State Congress. Now comes the news of a worse tragedy in the shape of a police charge at Bhadravati resulting in three deaths, including a child three years old, from firing by the police on an unarmed crowd. I do not wish to enter into the details. According to the Congress version the whole tragedy arose out of a peaceful labour demonstration. There is a suggestion on the Government side that the firing had to be resorted to because the crowd had attacked the police station in Bhadravati. The President of the Congress denies the charge and demands an inquiry. It will be worthless unless it is admittedly impartial. If the crowd had attacked the police station, what was the cause? If the crowd was non-violent, was the firing a mere wanton awe-inspiring process? In either case the people must learn the art of being killed, and if they are non-violent, without any reason therefor save for their love of liberty. It is a duty then to face death as cheerfully as we face imprisonment. Indeed, I do not know that such a swift ending is not more welcome than the prolonged agony that jail life sometimes becomes. As the struggle becomes wider and more earnest and more real, imprisonment is bound to be, as past experience teaches, increasingly hard to bear. Death for a brave and strong-willed man will then be a welcome relief.

TO EVERY BRITON

(By M. K. Gandhi)

When I had just begun my public career in South Africa I wrote "An Open Letter to Every Briton in South Africa". It had its effect. I feel that I should repeat the example at this critical juncture in the history of the world. This time my appeal must be to every Briton in the world. He may be nobody in the counsels of his nation. But in the empire of non-violence every true thought counts, every true voice has its full value. Vox populi vox dei is not a copy-book maxim. It is an expression of the solid experience of mankind. But it has one qualification. Its truth is confined to the field of non-violence. Violence can for the moment completely frustrate a people's voice. But since I work on the field of non-violence only, every true thought expressed or unexpressed counts for me.

I ask every Briton to support me in my appeal to the British at this very hour to retire from every Asiatic and African possession and at least from India. That step is essential for the safety of the world and for the destruction of Nazism and Fascism. In this I include Japan's 'ism' also. It is a good copy of the two. Acceptance of my appeal will confound all the military plans of all the Axis Powers and even of the military advisers of Great Britain.

If my appeal goes home, I am sure the cost of British interests in India and Africa would be nothing compared to the present ever-growing cost of the war to Britain. And when one puts morals in the scales, there is nothing but gain to Britain, India and the world.

Though I ask for their withdrawal from Asia and Africa, let me confine myself for the moment to India. British statesmen talk glibly of India's participation in the war. Now India was never even formally consulted on the declaration of war. Why should it be? India does not belong to Indians. It belongs to the British. It has been even called a British possession. The British practically do with it as they like. They make me — an all-war resister — pay a war tax in a variety of ways. Thus I pay two pice as war tax on every letter I post, one pice on every postcard, and two annas on every wire I send. This is the lightest side of the dismal picture. But it shows British ingenuity. If I was a student of economics, I could produce startling figures as to what India has been made to pay towards the war apart from what are mis-called voluntary contributions. No contribution made to a conqueror can be truly described as voluntary. What a conqueror the Briton makes! He is well saddled in his seat. I do not exaggerate when I say that a whisper of his wish is promptly answered in India. Britain may, therefore, be said to be at perpetual war with India which she holds by right of conquest and through an army of occupation. How does India profit by this enforced participation in Britain's war? The bravery of Indian soldiers profits India nothing.

Before the Japanese menace overtakes India, India's homesteads are being occupied by British troops — Indian and non-Indian. The dwellers are summarily ejected and expected to shift for themselves. They are paid a paltry vacating expense which carries them nowhere. Their occupation is gone. They have to build their cottages and search for their livelihood. These people do not vacate out of a spirit of patriotism. When this incident was referred to me a few days ago, I wrote in these columns that the dispossessed people should be asked to bear their lot with resignation. But my co-workers protested and invited me to go to the evacuees and console them myself or send someone to perform the impossible task. They were right. These poor people should never have been treated as they were. They should have been lodged suitably at the same time that they were asked to vacate.

People in East Bengal may almost be regarded as amphibious. They live partly on land and partly on the waters of the rivers. They have light canoes which enable them to go from place to place. For fear of the Japanese using the canoes the people have been called upon to surrender them. For a Bengali to part with his canoe, is almost like parting with his life. So those who take away his canoe he regards as his enemy.

Great Britain has to win the war. Need she do so at India's expense? Should she do so?

But I have something more to add to this sad chapter. The falsity that envelopes Indian life is suffocating. Almost every Indian you meet is discontented. But he will not own it publicly. The Government employees high and low are no exception. I am not giving hearsay evidence. Many British officials know this. But they have evolved the art of taking work from such elements. This all-pervading distrust and falsity make life worthless unless one resists it with one's whole soul.

You may refuse to believe all I say. Of course I shall be contradicted. I shall survive the contradictions.

I have stated what I believe to be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

My people may or may not approve of this loud thinking. I have consulted nobody. This appeal is being written during my silence day. I am just now concerned with Britain's action. When slavery was abolished in America many slaves protested, some even wept. But protests and tears notwithstanding, slavery was abolished in law. But the abolition was the result of a bloody war between the South and the North; and so though the Negro's lot is considerably better than before, he still remains the outcaste of high society. I am asking for something much higher. I ask for a bloodless end of an unnatural domination and for a new era, even though there may be protests and wailings from some of us.

Bombay, 11-5-42

AN APPEAL

Gandhiji is visiting Bombay under somewhat unusual circumstances. The public are well aware of his preoccupations, especially during these days of stress and strain. Besides, he is none too strong these days. And it is well-known that he is loath to leave Sevagram. When Seth Ghanshyamdas Birla and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel were in Wardha some days ago, they discussed with him his appeal for the Deenbandhu Memorial Fund. They said that, if he could spare a few days and come to Bombay, they might be able to help in collecting the amount. They could not bear the thought of Gandhiji making a tour for collecting Rs. 5 lakhs for Santiniketan. His time and energy were, they knew, premortgaged for other purposes, and it would be a tragedy if he had to make a tour for the mere purpose of this collection.

This reminds me of a similar occasion when Gandhiji decided that Gurudev should not be permitted to tour the country giving performances of his plays for the sake of his institutions, when he had already passed 70. It was in the month of March 1936 when we happened to be in Delhi, and Gurudev too was there with the inmates of his Ashram to give a performance of his famous musical play Chandalika. He looked aged and worn, and his appearing on the stage in order to beg for his institutions was unbearable to Gandhiji. He spoke to Ghanshyamdasji who agreed that the Poet should be relieved of the burden. The following letter with a cheque was immediately addressed to the Poet:

Delhi, Harijan Colony,
27th March, 1936

Respected Sir,

Please find the enclosed draft for Rs. 60,000 which we believe is the deficit on the expenses on Santiniketan, to cover which you have been exhibiting your art from place to place. When we heard this, we felt humiliated. We believe that at your advanced age and in your weak state of health you ought not to have to undertake these arduous tours. We must confess that we know very little of the institution — except the name. But we have not been unaware of your great fame as the Poet of the age. You are not only the greatest Poet of India, you are the Poet of humanity. Your poems remind one of the hymns of the ancient rishis. You have by your unrivalled gifts raised the status of our country. And we feel that those whom God has blessed with means should relieve you of the burden of finding the funds required for the conduct of the institution. Our contribution is a humble effort in that direction. For reasons, which need not be stated, we prefer to remain anonymous. We hope that you will now cancel all the engagements taken for raising the sum above mentioned.

Praying for your long life to continue the service you are rendering to our country,

We remain,

Your humble countrymen

The Poet, to whom I took the letter, was immensely happy. He cancelled his tour and wrote to Gandhiji a letter of which the single sentence still reverberates in my memory: "Words fail me to express my gratefulness for your having come to my help and reminded me of my Swadharma from which I had fallen."

Well, now that Gurudev is no more and C. F. Andrews too is no more, our debt to both of them is all the greater and more imperative. The very fact that Gandhiji should have put aside his preoccupations for the purpose should indicate the importance and peremptory nature of his mission. I appeal to the generous-minded public of Bombay to fill Gandhiji's begging bowl within the next week that he has set apart for the purpose. These are days when nothing seems to be secure — certainly not money and property — but duty done and money given to a noble purpose were never insecure, and I appeal to everyone to respond to this call of duty.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

If 'Harijan' Is Prohibited

Q. You are going strong. You should know that, if the people follow you, it must hinder the present war effort. The Government cannot allow it. If they do, you will admit that only the British Government can show such generosity. And what will you do if they suppress it?

A. No Government can afford to be generous. A man is generous when he does something at his own expense. Governments can do nothing at their own expense. But they always succeed in making people believe that they are generous even when they are barely or less than just. Justice is like a debt which has to be discharged. Therefore, if the Government permit Harijan to continue its even course, they will do so because it is proper from their point of view. They will not hesitate to suppress it when they think it is improper not to do so. I stated at the time of the resumption of publication that it was no part of my plan to persist in publication in spite of prohibition. I will, therefore, again suspend publication when the Government desire it. If they do, it will be a loss to the public. For, apart from the three weeklies, its articles appear by special permission in Urdu Hindustan — Lucknow, Urdu Harijan — Lahore, Marathi Harijan — Wardha. It is also published in Telugu and Ooria. Articles are sent to them in advance. Numerous other newspapers copy or translate articles from it week by week. There is no generosity in tolerating the publication of such a popular weekly. And my writings will not hinder war effort, if it is voluntary. If they influence the people, surely there is something wrong somewhere. It is not Harijan that should be stopped, but the wrong it exposes should be undone. I look upon my writings as a solid contribution to war effort, for he serves a cause best who exposes its weaknesses or those of its representatives.

You ask what I would do if they suppress Harijan. I must frankly confess, I do not know. I have cultivated the habit of not anticipating evil. I am able to know the remedy instinctively when I am face to face with an evil. That is how a God-fearing man acts. The fear of God disposes of every other fear. But I can give you this assurance that suppression of Harijan can never mean suppression of me.

Intellectual Conviction

Q. Intellectually I am convinced that non-violence is the only solution of quarrels between man and man. But by nature I cannot but react violently to acts of hostility to my country or myself. So I am unable to be content with non-violent resistance only against the Japanese. I feel that, in addition to whatever I may be able to do by way of non-violent resistance, I should also do my utmost to help the war effort against them. They have no right to invade my country even though it is in British hands and not ours. But when I think of helping the war effort, my intellectual conviction of non-violence does not allow me to do so with peace of mind.

A. Your difficulty is a common difficulty. But if you have real intellectual conviction, it will overcome your nature which is nothing but habit. Your conviction should tell you that non-violence is a force infinitely superior to violence. Hence you do not need to rely upon violent assistance. Moreover you are labouring under a fallacy. Why do you say that the Japanese have no right to invade your country although it is in foreigners' hands? In the first place, the country is not yours while it is in others' hands. You cannot do what you like with it. The foreigners can and do. Secondly, if the Japanese have enmity against your master, they have every right to attack what your master possesses. We are not examining here the correctness of Japan's conduct in going to war against Great Britain. I am simply pointing out what seems to me to be your mental confusion. The proper course for you is to ask the wrongful possessor to vacate your country. When he has done it you will have the choice between violence and non-violence against the Japanese attack, if it comes. But the thing is not so simple as I have put it. Your difficulty is real. You feel that you cannot defend your country. You have lost it. The English can, if you help them. If the English vacate the country, the Japanese are much more likely to attack undefended India if only for strategic purposes, and you will be utterly helpless against the invading host. Therefore, seeing that the English are in India and they can defend, why not make common cause with them and answer the impending attack? After victory, have they not said, they would go away if they are not wanted? This, I expect, is your argument. In my opinion it is only plausible. The British do not want your help on your terms, as witness the failure of the Cripps mission. They want it on their terms. If, therefore, victory is achieved, the British hold will be ever so much stronger than before. If they will not trust you now, there is no warrant for supposing that they will after victory. They will then ask you with greater force than now to produce the unity which cannot be produced whilst they are here. You get out of all this tangle, if you adopt my method. If you have intellectual conviction, you can approach the problem with the utmost confidence. You are friend to all. You say to the British with the greatest goodwill that, if they leave India, she will take care of herself and will probably escape Japanese attention, and if she cannot, she will answer it with non-violence. Then by that simple act of justice they gain your eternal friendship. It may stand them in good stead even during the present war. For India will then of her own free will help China, Russia and others. If India sets her own house in order, as I have no doubt it will, India can work wonders.

Congress and League

Q. Maulana Saheb has made what I consider a very wise and patriotic suggestion that the Congress Working Committee will nominate five representatives to meet the representatives of the Muslim League when the latter so desire to do. I trust it will commend itself to you. If it does, I should like you publicly to support it. It will go a long way to bring the Hindus and the Muslims together.

A. I have no hesitation in endorsing Maulana Saheb's suggestion. No one would be more glad than I if, with or without my endorsement, the two can come together. I have always felt that there is something radically wrong with both that the most obvious thing, viz. the coming together of the wise men of both with a will to find a solution of the deadlock, has not happened.

Ingenious Method

Q. Your advocacy of the learning of Urdu as part of the national language which you have called Hindustani is all very well. What do you say to the propaganda that is being carried on in the Nizam's Dominions on behalf of Urdu? Here is the first question in a Telugu examination paper:

"If for the purposes of Federation a common language for India is indispensable and the case of Hindustani is strong enough, then it seems to me that as far as this University is concerned it should immediately make Urdu its medium of instruction especially when it happens to be the mother-tongue of this province. Those who would wait till it grows richer are sadly mistaken and argue in a circle. It will remain poor as long as the Universities make no use of it in teaching all branches of knowledge."

Remember that Telugu and not Urdu is the mother-tongue of the majority of the people in this part of the country. What do you say to the ingenious method adopted of carrying on pro-Urdu propaganda through examination papers?

A. I admit that the method adopted is both ingenious and strange. An examination paper is hardly a vehicle for propaganda on a question on which sharp division of opinion prevails. I agree that Urdu is not the mother-tongue of the people of H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions. What proportion of the population knows Telugu I do not know. My notion of an all-India speech does not involve the displacement of the great provincial languages, but its knowledge is meant to be an addition to that of the provincial speech. Nor do I expect that the millions will ever learn the all-India speech. It will be learnt by the politically-minded and those who have interprovincial connections. Indeed a correspondent suggests that in the place of an all-India speech I should advocate the learning of the languages of neighbouring provinces. Thus he says: "It is far more useful for the Assamese to know Bengali than Hindi or Urdu and now according to you Hindi and Urdu." If we had not the intolerable burden of learning English not merely as a second language but as a language through which all higher instruction is imparted to us, we should find it child's play to learn our neighbours' speech and certainly learn the all-India speech for all-India contacts. In my opinion a boy or girl lacks culture and accomplishment, if he or she does not know half a dozen languages of India. It is a sure sign of brain fag on the part of English-knowing Indians when they tremble at the very thought of learning a language other than English, not excluding even their mother's speech. For the majority of objectors are English-knowing Indians. I have found no difficulty about the Ashram inmates learning Urdu in addition to Hindi. And I know that in South Africa the Tamil labourers could speak Telugu and vice versa, and they had a working knowledge of Hindi. No one had told them that they should learn Hindi. Somehow or other they knew intuitively that they should know Hindi. Of course they were no scholars, but for mutual intercourse they picked up what was necessary. They picked up also the speech of their neighbours, the Zulus. They could not carry on their business, if they did not. Thus most Indians knew besides their mother-tongues two more Indian languages, Zulu, and a smattering of even English. Needless to say many of them wrote no language, and most could write only ungrammatically their own mother-tongues. The moral of this is obvious.

If you dispense with the script, you pick up your neighbour's language without effort and without difficulty, and if you are fresh and the brain is not wearied, you can learn as many scripts as you wish without any difficulty. The study is any day interesting and stimulating. The study of languages is an art and valuable at that.

IN RESURGENT CHINA

In the constructive effort of Nationalist China there are several features which should be of special interest to us. One of the most important items in that programme has been the rehabilitation of village life. In the retreat before the advancing Japanese hordes the Chinese had to abandon cities and fall back on villages. People had to depend on rural products and adapt themselves to rural surroundings. Madame Chiang Kai-shek wrote:

"Continuance of national resistance against aggression entails greater need for economy and self-sacrifice on the part of the whole country. Even before the hostilities began New Life laid emphasis upon rational living. Since the war began, this principle has become not only desirable but necessary. The need of it inspired New Life to celebrate its fifth anniversary last year (i. e. in 1939) by sponsoring exhibitions in all the main cities to show the people the most practical ways of utilising local products. Houses furnished with only native goods were exhibited. Bamboos were used as water pipes, and bed mattresses were made of palm bark—far cooler and almost as resilient as the foreign 'Beauty Rest' mattresses, and costing a fraction of the price of the latter. In every phase of life people were encouraged to take advantage of the material at hand." (China Shall Rise Again)

A "Grow More Food, Save More Food" movement was set afoot. It caught the farmers' imagination. The cultivation of potato, soya beans and Indian corn was recommended because they yield most food per unit. Non-food crops were to be reduced. People were asked to wear their old cotton clothes longer than they would in times of peace. New lands in the interior were put under cultivation and refugees were put on the work. The programme provided work to two farm hands where only one was employed before. The practice of growing wheat in rice fields in winter, when they used to be allowed to lie fallow, was adopted and increased. Agriculturists were encouraged to adopt better methods of cultivation, to strengthen the dykes against rivers, and to dig more irrigation ditches as a safeguard against draught. Irrigation and drainage projects were pushed forward, and forest lands began to be cleared.

In order to economise in the consumption of food, "people were asked to eat unpolished rice and coarse flour, as well as sweet potatoes, beans, squash, and other vegetables. Another way of conserving food is to abstain from drinking wine. Chinese wine is made of rice which today is more urgently needed as food." (Chen Ta-jen) The Government issued an order prohibiting the milling and sale of high-grade polished rice, and organised a campaign for promoting and popularising the use of miscellaneous food crops as substitutes for rice.

With a view to providing people "driven away from or bombed out of their homes" with nourishing food, the New Life movement started a network of cafeterias where cheap, clean and nutritive food could be had and where the customers served themselves. A new article of food, nourishing though cheap — 'vitacake' — has been invented. "It provides something portable and nutritive to eat during the long hours in dugouts. It is made of half wheat, and half soya-bean milk residue. Formerly the latter was used only for the feeding of chickens."

The revival of hand-spinning and hand-weaving is another important item. Though the Chinese performed the amazing feat of bodily removing the machinery of about 150 large factories (weighing over 15,000 tons) by small boats to Chungking and up the 300 steps of the city by coolies, the products of the textile mills could not suffice for the needs of the army and the people, and cloth became scarce. As Edgar Mowrer says in his book on China, "Shantung, the great silk-producing province, practically all of the cotton-growing and textile-manufacturing regions, were overrun by the enemy. Therefore, Madame Chaing Kai-shek obtained 70,000 hand looms for refugee women on which to weave cotton stuffs of the simplest kind . . . She summoned a great meeting of important women from all over China at Kuling, and extended their activity to the organisation of weaving and the stimulation of home industries." Describing the training given to students in hand-weaving and hand-spinning, she says:

"A three months' course of training in spinning and weaving is the order of the day. During the first month the pupils get their board and lodging free. During the second month they are able to bear half of the expenses. At the end of the third month they can support other members of their families. When they are graduated they return home, and six months later they generally have made enough money not only to support themselves and their families, but to pay for the wheel, or the looms, bought on the cooperative plan."

Experimental centres have been started in various places, and in one district which formerly did not grow cotton, over 1,500 cooperative members are engaged in producing cotton. The result is that in a place where people before were clothed in tatters for want of cloth, "now, two years later, the place presents an entirely different atmosphere and appearance. The people are all cleanly and well dressed; the old stores reopened; new stores, carrying a line of goods bordering on luxuries, have opened, and their stocks alone show how the standard of living has gone up."

Nor have other industries been neglected. The Madame goes on to say:

"The Production Department has also trained several hundred women as staff workers in hand-made embroidery. These women are now being sent out to various districts to train the local women to produce embroidered articles mostly from ramie (sometimes called grass linen, or China grass) which finds a steady market both at home and abroad . . . . . Wherever there are teams of our workers we have some form of production going on. In each district the type of work is decided by the raw materials produced. In one district where the clay makes good porcelain, we are specializing in the making of artistic dishes and bowls at low cost."

While Japan could destroy and has destroyed large mills and factories by bombing, no amount of bombing could possibly wipe out village industries, and even if destroyed, they could be started again without much difficulty.

Emphasising the paramount necessity of starting village industries and of restricting the development of large scale industries to the minimum unavoidable she said, as far back as in 1938:

"I should like to see village industry carefully developed wherever it is possible for raw materials to be produced and worked up to supply the daily needs of the people. There will have to be mechanical aid in cases; but I hope that machinery never will be brought to China to save labour as its first principle and requirement. Machinery should be used to make necessities which hands cannot make, but there it should stop. Nor should cut-throat competition in manufacture be permitted. In that the workmen suffer. . . . If we emerge safely from the calamities of this war, there is one brake that will be put upon us that should have a restraining influence upon development of too many large industries. That is the brake of exhausted finance. It will not be easy to plunge into great schemes of factory development, and that, to my mind, is a good thing. There is so much to be done by hand, so many hands to do it, that wisdom dictates energetic arrangement of opportunities and possibilities for manual work just as quickly as circumstances will allow." (China in Peace and War)

If China could put forth this tremendous mass effort at nation-building in spite of her preoccupation with a devastating war, it should be no less possible for us, provided we can summon up enough of will and resourcefulness. The constructive programme has long been before us. And now that adversity has thrown city-bred classes and village-bred masses together, it is up to the former to utilise the opportunity for rekindling the life of the villages which, though long neglected and derided, are proving our only resort of safety and refuge.

Deenabandhu Memorial

I am glad to be able to inform the readers of Harijan that the efforts of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Sheth Ghanashyamdas Birla, who had asked me to go to Bombay for eight days for the purpose of finishing the Deenabandhu Memorial collections, have been crowned with full success. Only over Rs. 60,000 were collected in response to the appeal through the papers. The whole of the balance of five lacs was collected during the eight days' strenuous labour. Bombay has never disappointed me whenever I have gone there for collections. I am most grateful to the donors for their generosity. They have taken a great load off my mind. I am quite clear that they have never given to a better cause. The Memorial to Deenabandhu started by and at the wish of Gurudev became on his death Memorial to Gurudev, in which the former merged. The object of both could only be identical. Subscriptions were required partly for the discharge of monies due by Shantiniketan and largely for the building etc. mentioned in the original appeal. I may mention that while the donations received included large sums from wealthy men they included also small sums from unknown persons from all over India. They were received from all communities, Parsis, Christians, Jews, Muslims and Hindus. I repeat the thanks on behalf of the fellow signatories and myself to the donors for their generous donations as also to the friends who organised the collection and laboured to make a success.

Harijan Collections

If the collections I make at railway stations and at evening prayer when I am out of Sevagram are any index to the progress of the removal of untouchability it must be very substantial, for I notice that the response is more liberal than before. Hardly a bystander at stations or a visitor to the prayer meeting refrains from giving his mite. Much need not be made of the response. But there can be no doubt that if the cause did not make any appeal, the response would be meagre, if any. Whereas it was hearty and willing. It gave me great joy as I studied the smiling faces of those who gave. The Bombay collection for the seven meetings was Rs. 4000. Each day's collection showed a substantial rise on the previous day. Thus the first day's collection was Rs. 205-5-6 and the last Rs. 1342-10-9.

Confusion

There is evidently confusion in some minds about my invitation to the British to withdraw. For a Britisher writes to say that he likes India and her people and would not like willingly to leave India. He likes too my method of non-violence. Evidently the writer has confused the individual as such with the individual as the holder of power. India has no quarrel with the British people. I have hundreds of British friends. Andrews' friendship was enough to tie me to the British people. But both he and I were fixed in our determination that British rule in India in any shape or form must end. Hitherto the rulers have said, "We would gladly retire if we know to whom we should hand over the reins." My answer now is, "Leave India to God. If that is too much, then leave her to anarchy." I invite every Britisher who loves Britain, India and the world to join me in the appeal to the British Power and, if it is rejected, to adopt such non-violent measures as would compel the Power to comply with the appeal.

What Could Have Been Done?

Some Pressmen asked me in Bombay what could Sir Stafford have done in the absence of an agreement between the Congress and the League. I gave the answer. I do not know whether it has appeared anywhere. Any way it is better for the public to know what answer I gave to the question. Sir Stafford could have asked either the Congress or the League to form the cabinet. If he had done so, probably the party they entrusted with responsibility would have succeeded in having the cooperation of the other party. In any event the Government would then have dealt with the real representatives of their party rather than having their own nominees. I do not know that they made any such offer either to the Congress or the League. So far as the public know the negotiations did not break over the want of agreement between the two organisations but over differences with Sir Stafford as to what powers the British Government wanted to part with during the war.

BOMBAY RESPONDS GENEROUSLY

Bombay has enabled Gandhiji to fulfil a debt that had weighed on him for over a year. Deenabandhu Andrews died on the 5th of April, 1940, and an appeal for a memorial to him was issued by among others the Gurudeva and Gandhiji. Before even a lakh of rupees could be collected, the Poet was removed from our midst, and ever since his death Gandhiji had been worrying over the poor response to the appeal. The circumstances in which he decided to visit Bombay are now well-known.

The response was naturally expected, when Gandhiji himself decided to devote a week to the purpose, but there is no gainsaying the fact that with most of the donors regard for Gandhiji was a greater consideration than the purpose. A friend who was talking with Gandhiji the other day frankly said to him: "Gandhiji, you are backing the wrong horse." It was in order to correct this wrong impression that Gandhiji explained to more than one donor that the cause was worthy of their generous support.

"I am not exaggerating," he said, "when I say that Shantiniketan is worthy of a greater support than the Bangalore Research Institute for which Tata gave Rs. 30 lakhs. I wonder if the Research Institute is known anywhere outside India. But the Shantiniketan is known wherever the Poet's name is known, and known as an institution that inspired the Poet's great poetry. The Poet used to call it his toy or plaything, but his poesy would have been barren without the plaything. The Shantiniketan whose school of art and culture attracts students from far and near has produced painters and poets and scholars. There are among those who humbly serve it—a scholar like Kshitibabu and an artist like Nandababu, who are both unrivalled in their respective domains. And no institution of this type in India is managed with so little finance."

"Our devotion to the Poet will remain as long as we live. But how can we have the same devotion for Shantiniketan? How long will it last?"

"The institution which inspired the Poet received in its turn inspiration from the Poet, and you may be sure that there are people there who will devote their lifetime to its service. Shantiniketan is a romance. It grew out of the Poet's father's idea to found a home of peace and culture. It is a tragedy that monied men, who have gained so much from Shantiniketan, do not appreciate its full worth. The Poet is an asset for India and for the world for all time, and it is the duty of monied men to put his institution on a sound basis."

If Gandhiji appreciates Shantiniketan so much as a home of art, why does he himself have ashrams of a different character? For the simple reason that art is the need of quite a fair number of our people and it must be fulfilled in a clean, wholesome and inexpensive way. Shantiniketan, with its branch at Shriniketan, does it. That was what attracted Deenabandhu Andrews to it, and he identified himself with it, and he became its champion collector.

"You can never give too much to Shantiniketan," said Gandhiji summing up his impassioned appeal.

"But," some one said, "we are in the midst of turmoil. These are not times for money collection. Can't we wait until we have won our freedom?"

"Rabindranath could not wait to come to the world until freedom was won," said Gandhiji in a neat retort.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Difference

Q. You have repeated in your interview to the Press in Bombay what you have said often that nothing can prevent the Muslims from having what they want unless the objectors would fight over the issue. What is the difference between you and Shri Rajgopalachari's attitude?

A. Though he has quoted me in his support I see the same difference between him and me that there is between chalk and cheese. He yields the right of secession now to buy unity in the hope of keeping away the Japanese. I consider the vivisection of India to be a sin. My statement amounts to the enunciation of the proposition that I cannot prevent my neighbour from committing a sin. Shri Rajgopalachari would be party in the sin, if the neighbour chooses to commit it. I cannot be party. What is more, I am firmly of opinion that there is no unity whilst the third party is there to prevent it. It created the artificial division and it keeps it up. In its presence both Hindus and Muslims and for that matter all seemingly conflicting or disgruntled interests and elements will look to it for support and will get it. Their interest is greater than the independence of their country. No one need throw my other statement in my face, viz., that there is no independence without unity. I do not withdraw a word of it. It is an obvious truth. From its contemplation I have discovered the formula of inviting the British power to withdraw. Their withdrawal does not by itself bring independence. It may induce unity or it may lead to chaos. There is also the risk of another power filling in the vacancy if it is there. If, however, the withdrawal is orderly and voluntary the British not only gain a moral height but secure the ungrudging friendship of a great nation. I wish all conflicting elements and interests will make a combined effort to rid India of foreign domination. If they do not, any understanding with them will be like a house built on sand. Fear of the Japanese occupation of India has blinded C. R. to the obvious truth. Independence sheds all fear—fear of the Japanese, of anarchy, and of the wrath of the British lion.

NEED OF SCIENTIFIC KNOWLEDGE

[The following is a free rendering of Shri Vinoba's address to a national school at Tumsar:]

The greatest need in our education today is science. India may be said to be primarily an agricultural country, but she cannot maintain herself wholly on farming. European countries are mainly industrial, and yet France can show  $3\frac{1}{2}$  acres of land per head; whereas we in India own land to the extent of only an acre and a quarter per head. In America, the wealthiest country in the world, both agriculture and industry go hand in hand on a large scale. She is spending 55 crores daily on the war. According to our standard of living it would cost 5 crores daily to feed our population of 40,00,00,000. America could, therefore, feed us for 11 days with what she is spending daily on destruction! Our income from land per capita is Rs. 50 to 60 per annum and from industry Rs. 12. There is no difference between our land income and that of England, but the average income from industry in England is Rs. 512 as against our Rs. 12 per head!

In order to change this piteous state of affairs all our teachers, students and the general mass of people must take to handicrafts and become experts therein. And one cannot become an expert without scientific knowledge in the subject concerned.

Our kitchens should, for example, be experimental laboratories. Those who work in them should have a knowledge of dietetics, and thereby know what type and what amount of food is required by different persons.

Everyone has to use a latrine, but few have proper knowledge of sanitation and hygiene which is essential for the health of society. What is now wasted could be turned into wealth, if only we had the requisite knowledge.

Why disease attacks one is a matter of research; likewise how it should be treated and what should be done in order to prevent recurrence. No adequate answers can be found without scientific knowledge.

We may spin and weave, and yet if we are unacquainted with all the processes of khadi production, we are not far removed from the factory automaton.

Shri Vinoba said he had been told that boys in the Tumsar School were not one whit behind those of other institutions in passing examinations in English, but he wondered what special pride could be taken in this. It would be far better if they had a good knowledge of hygiene, sanitation, physics and chemistry than English. And this knowledge could easily be assimilated in craft-work.

But while the greatest stress must be laid on scientific knowledge in regard to our daily lives and work, the spiritual side was on no account to be neglected. Language is the medium for instruction in both spheres, but it is a mere messenger in either case. For example, we will not sit down and cry if our spinning wheel goes out of order or a scorpion stings us. We will apply our scientific knowledge to remedy the wheel or decrease the pain. In the same way we ought to cultivate the realisation of the detachment of the soul (atma) from matter. This detachment must grow and become a habit with us.

A true school is that where work is scientifically done and the student understands the whys and wherefores of each action. Otherwise the institution is a mere factory. An ideal school may cost a little more to run, but the effort will be amply repaid in the mental and moral growth of the students and in the quality of their output. The minutest details will be attended to in every department of life. Nothing will be forgotten, there will be no cramming, and craft-work will be fascinating. If the teachers are able to make the students take a live interest in their work, nothing will be humdrum, nothing will be a burden. The teacher must be able to impart knowledge from the seemingly little things of everyday life. National schools should be made attractive, and it is the duty of parents to send their children there.

Children are a nation's wealth, but today they are underfed. The minimum requirements in diet should be made available to them in our national schools, or else how can we expect them to work?
(From Khadi Jagat)

PURPOSEFUL POLITICS

Government

Even granting that we obtain this freedom what shall we do with it? Government is the delegated permanent part of the people's self. Therefore a free people will strive to control the activities of this their better half. Politics is the lever with which this great instrument is switched off or on. This switch board must be operated under the will of the people. A Government properly conceived should be the largest partner in the business of the people, the senator of the people's education, the arbitrator to settle their disputes, the communities' social panchayat—in short, the head, arms, legs and heart of the nation. For any Government to so function it will have to be imbued with the spirit and culture of the people. The Britishers have consciously kept themselves apart from the people. Hence it is impossible for them to play this role. Only a free people can thus be at the helm of their own ship of State and direct her course towards national prosperity.

It is against human nature to expect Great Britain to govern India for India's good. Hence it is not fair even to Britain to let her continue in this impossible position. The purpose of our politics is to get control of these key positions in the country so as to serve the needs of the masses better and help them to develop themselves to the utmost capacity they have been endowed with.

LAWLESSNESS IN SINDH

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Prof. Ghanashyam assisted by Shri Assandas, a worker in Thar Parkar, has recently visited the area affected by the Hurs' rebellion. He has prepared an elaborate report of which he has sent me a copy. The following is a condensed summary of the report in the Professor's own language:

"Not many people in Sindh realise the grave situation that has arisen owing to the activities of the Hurs. Hurs are followers of the Pir of Pagaro who has been arrested by Government and is said to be under detention in Nagpur. All his followers are not Hurs. His following is said to run in lacs. The Hurs are mostly concentrated in Sanghar, Sinjhor and Shahdadpur Talukas. They are considered to be a criminal tribe and several of them were kept in criminal settlements. These were abolished some years ago. But they were still under orders to report themselves regularly to the police. The Hurs believe that their Pir has been arrested on the false reports of the police against him. They nurse the grievance that none of them is allowed to interview him. They are said to complain of police oppression in having to report themselves daily at police stations.

"After the arrest of the Pir of Pagaro, search of his house near Sanghar and destruction by fire of the huts attached to the bungalow where the Pir's followers used to gather, have so enraged the Hurs that they have started on a fierce campaign, as a challenge to Government, of murders, dacoities, attacks on railway stations, destruction of property in P. W. D. bungalows, cutting of telephone and telegraph wires, making breaches in canals etc. There is not a day when reports of these criminal activities are not received. They were in the beginning mostly confined to Sanghar, Sinjhor and Shahdadpur Talukas, but have now spread to other parts of Sindh also, specially the Khipro Taluka which adjoins Sanghar Taluka. The Hurs may be said to have risen in rebellion against the Government with a view to get the Pir of Pagaro released. They have such an intense faith in him that they are prepared to sacrifice their all and even their lives for his sake. It is now more than six months since the Pir of Pagaro was arrested. In the beginning of this period the frequency of the criminal activities of the Hurs was not as great as now. With the passage of time their activities have assumed not only greater frequency but have extended to other talukas than the original three. The Hurs have started their own Government. Not only have they appointed a leader whom they call their King but have appointed commanders, captains etc. They are said to have divided themselves into groups, and assigned separate jurisdiction to each group. Their activities were in the beginning directed against Government and those whom they considered as enemies of the Pir of Pagaro or who in any way aided Government against them. But it appears they have changed their tactics and are now attacking all and sundry. No one seems to be free from their attacks, whether he be a zamindar or a sethia, Hindu or Muslim, a high paid official or a petty kotar or beldar, rich or poor, innocent or guilty. Even women are not spared. There is a tradition that Hurs do not attack women or innocent persons. But it is said latterly young and mischievous elements among them have thrown the old traditions to the winds and spare no one. With a view to make their activities more effective, they have started a deliberate move for collecting rifles, guns, ammunitions, clothes and money. Latterly their attacks in many cases have been directed against those who are in possession of these things. In this way they are said to have collected many guns and a large amount of money-cash or ornaments. They organise their attacks in military fashion and are on occasions dressed in Khaki shirts and shorts. When the Khipro-Sanghar bus was attacked on the 16th April, the Commander of the groups was not only dressed in Khaki but wore a hat also. Those who attacked ex-military zamindar Beantsing near Shahpur Chakar were also clad in military dress. This put Khalsa Beantsing off guard. He approached to greet them thinking they were some military soldiers. They attack and shoot under orders. They are also said to be levying taxes from zamindars and merchants. Threats are given to them that their 'Kharas' of wheat would be burnt or they would be dealt with in some other way if they did not pay taxes to them, as they declare themselves to be the Government in those areas. It is said that many people do yield to their threats as otherwise not only their property but even their lives are at stake. There is a general belief in the affected areas that Government are powerless to protect those who render aid to the authorities or who refuse to submit to the dictates of the Hurs. Several persons who have acted thus have been murdered or been targets of other attacks. People are in a state of sheer helplessness. It must not be supposed that Hurs are responsible for all the crimes that are now being committed in Sindh or even in the above talukas. Taking advantage of the situation created by the Hurs several unsocial and criminal elements, of which there is an abundance in Sindh, have let themselves loose, thinking either that the suspicion of their crimes would fall on the Hurs or the police would not take effective steps against them being pre-occupied with the Hur menace. The two main streams of criminal activities: one of the Hurs and the other of non-Hur criminals, have combined into a mighty current which has now flooded the whole of Sindh in general and the above talukas in particular. The enormity of the situation can be realised from the fact that normal functioning of the Government machinery in this area has ceased. In the Sanghar Taluka all the police posts are said to have been abolished and only one police station has been retained in the Taluka Headquarter, for fear of their being attacked and overpowered by the Hurs and their rifles being taken away. The police parties that go out for investigation of crimes return to the headquarter before sunset. Being afraid of attack at night, they do not venture to do their normal work after sunset. The withdrawals of police posts and the return of police parties to Taluka Headquarter before sunset have so emboldened the Hurs and other elements that they think the British Government has ceased to exist for them. Like the police, the normal functioning of the Revenue Department has also to some extent ceased. The tapadars, I was informed, find it very hazardous to move out in 'Tapas' and so they are working in Taluka Headquarters. All revenue collection is done at the Taluka Headquarters and not at the tapadar's deras, as is normally done. One tapadar was robbed of his revenue collection; two kotars were killed. It was said that one mukhtiarkar had to go under police escort for remission work and had to change his dress for that of an ordinary rustic to escape detection as an official. Officials and subordinates are so terror-stricken that they do not function as they would normally do. Even the District Magistrate has to guard himself very strongly during his movements. It was said that trees have been cut off from near his bungalow lest dacoits under cover of these make an attack on him. Even when he goes to play tennis in the club near his bungalow, he has to go heavily protected. Armed police men are stationed near the tennis court and round about the club. Camel-men who carried the kit of Deputy Collector were threatened with dire consequences. They reported the matter and were given strong armed escort. Similar is the fate of the Public Works Department in the affected area. P. W. D. bungalows have been attacked. There is no safety even for zamindars who keep themselves protected with arms as they are being now selected for attacks with a view to rob them of their guns and ammunition.

"The Government have taken some measures to bring the situation under control. Special police has been stationed in hundreds in the affected areas. A special District Magistrate and a special District Superintendent of Police have been put on the duty to suppress the Hur menace, with jurisdiction over both the Thar Parkar and Nawabshah Districts, as the area affected forms part of both these districts. Military has been sent to aid the police. The Sindh Assembly passed a special Hur Menace Act in secret session to meet the situation, setting aside ordinary procedure of criminal law in the matter of security proceedings and trials for scheduled offences against Hurs and those who aid them. All these measures have so far proved ineffective in bringing the situation under control. The things are going from bad to worse. The police is concentrated in Taluka Headquarters and a large portion of it is used in guarding Government offices and officers. It was complained that it was not sufficient for the task before it. The offences are so many that it is not possible for it to trace each one. The military simply gives patrol rounds at times. These have ceased to create any awe among the Hurs and so have become ineffective in suppressing their rising. The public will be surprised to learn that up to this time, most of the arrests in connection with specific offences in the affected area are those of 'non-murids', that is those who do not follow the Pir of Pagaro. I have stated above that some unsocial and criminal elements other than Hurs have, taking advantage of the situation, started indulging in crime. Some of these elements have been arrested, but so far as the Hurs are concerned, who are directly connected with any specific offence, there has been almost no arrest, compared to the long list of the offences committed. It is true a large number of Hurs, which is estimated to be over fifteen hundred, have been roped in, but they have been arrested not as a result of pursuit in specific offences, but were rounded up with a set plan of which they were not aware, on the occasion of their reporting their presence to police as most of them are required to do.

"None, or almost none, of those who are absconding and who are said to be responsible for murders, dacoities, robberies etc. have been arrested."

The Government machinery has evidently broken down. The real remedy is for Congress members to withdraw from the Assembly and Khan Bahadur Allabux and his fellow-ministers to resign. These should form a peace-brigade and fearlessly settle down among the Hurs and risk their lives in persuading these erring countrymen to desist from the crimes. A deputation known to Pir Pagaro should visit him and induce him to issue unequivocal instructions to his followers to stop their murderous activities. This should not be on condition of release. If he is aggrieved he is entitled to an inquiry. The Government should take the public into their confidence. All this can be done without the resignation of Congressmen and the ministers, it may be urged. My answer would be that the resignations are necessary as proof of the earnestness of the members and the Khan Bahadur and his co-ministers. If they remain in the Assembly they cannot give undivided attention to their task. The decisive reason, however, for my recommendation is that there should be an admission of their helplessness to do anything effective through the Assembly to put a stop to these rebellious activities. That should be an earnest of their desire to make room for those who think they can deal with the grave situation with better effect. The resignations must produce a healthy effect among the people. The selflessness and courage of resigners is likely to prove infectious and induce others to join them. The murder of Seth Sitaldas, a member of the Assembly, regrettable though it is in every respect, pales into insignificance in face of Prof. Ghanashyam's gruesome report. Let the murder serve as a spur to the other members to go among the Hurs and court murder in the act of weaning them from their unlawful and inhuman activities.

[ P. S.

Since writing the above, I have heard about the terrible railway accident resulting in several deaths including that of Sir Gulam Hussain Hidayatulla's son. The shooting by the Hurs thereafter shows the state of desperation they have reached. This emphasises the recommendation I have made. Nothing short of such heroic action will bring the Hurs to their senses. Frightfulness will only make matters worse. I hope that all parties will join in the attempt to rid Sindh of the spreading rebellion.

IMPLICATIONS OF WITHDRAWAL

The following are the questions put by a representative of The News Chronicle (London) to Gandhiji, [Bombay, 14-5-42] and the latter's replies to them:

1. Q. You have recently asked the British to withdraw from India. Do you think it possible in the present circumstances for them to withdraw all at once? To whom are they to entrust the administration?

A. It has cost me much to come to the conclusion that the British should withdraw from India, and it is costing me still more to work out that conclusion. It is like asking loved ones to part, but it has become a paramount duty. And the beauty and the necessity for withdrawal lie in its being immediate. They and we are both in the midst of fire. If they go, there is a likelihood of both of us being safe. If they do not, Heaven only knows what will happen. I have said in the plainest terms that in my proposal there is no question of entrusting the administration to any person or party. That would be a necessary consideration, if the withdrawal was part of a settlement. Under my proposal, they have to leave India in God's hands—but in modern parlance to anarchy, and that anarchy may lead to internecine warfare for a time or to unrestrained dacoities. From these a true India will rise in the place of the false one we see.

2. Q. How is your policy of non-embarrassment reconcilable with this advice?

A. My policy of non-embarrassment remains intact in terms in which I have described it. If the British withdraw, surely there is no embarrassment; not only so, they become eased of a tremendous burden, if they would calmly consider the meaning of the enslavement of a whole people. But if they persist, well knowing that they are surrounded by hatred, they invite embarrassment. I do not produce it by stating the truth, however unpalatable it may appear for the moment.

3. Q. Already there are signs of civil insecurity; and would not life be even more insecure, were the present administration suddenly to withdraw?

A. Of course, there is civil insecurity, and I have already confessed that insecurity is likely to increase very much only to give place to real security. The present insecurity is chronic and therefore not so much felt. But a disease that is not felt is worse than one that is felt.

4. Q. Were the Japanese to invade India, what would your advice be to the Indian people?

A. I have already said in my articles that it is just likely that the Japanese will not want to invade India, their prey having gone. But it is equally likely that they will want to invade India in order to use her ports for strategic purposes. Then, I would advise the people to do the same thing that I have advised them to do now, viz. offer stubborn non-violent non-cooperation, and I make bold to say that, if the British withdraw and people here follow my advice, then non-cooperation will be infinitely more effective than it can be today, when it cannot be appreciated for the violent British action going on side by side.

THE BOMBAY INTERVIEW

After a lapse of nearly three years, Gandhiji gave the newspaper representatives in Bombay a political interview. He is so much possessed by his latest idea—the suggestion to the British to withdraw from India—that he readily agreed to meet the press, if only to be able to explain the implications of the suggestion. The whole of the Bombay press was represented, and it is gratifying to note that they confined themselves to strictly relevant and important questions. I must give for the readers of Harijan an authentic report.

Arbitration

"Would you review the situation created by the Allahabad A. I. C. C. meeting? What would you say regarding Rajaji's quoting your words regarding Pakistan in support of his latest move?"

"I would leave the Allahabad resolutions to themselves. C. R. has quoted me correctly, and I repeat that, if Muslims want anything—no matter what it is—no power on earth can prevent them from having it. For the condition of refusal will be to fight. Supposing Muslims ask for something which non-Muslims do not want to give or could not give, it means a fight. This applies to both the communities. If the Hindus want a thing and if they are all united in the demand, no non-Hindus can resist them, unless they want to fight. But my hope is that some day or other all parties will come to their senses and not insist on their demands being accepted, and consent to go to arbitration. It is an age-long method and a civilised method, and I hope it will be accepted.

"But it is from the frustration of every effort made to bring about unity by me among many others, that has arisen the, for me, logical step that not until British power is wholly withdrawn from India can there be any real unity, because all parties will be looking to the foreign power. For the time being it is British, but it may be French, Russian, Chinese, even then it would be the same thing. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that real heart-unity, genuine unity, is almost an impossibility unless and until British power is withdrawn and no other power takes its place, that is to say, when India not only feels but is actually independent without a master in any shape or form. Nevertheless I shall try and welcome every effort for peace, well knowing that it is likely to be fruitless."

Non-violent Non-cooperation

Q. "There is a report about some new scheme that you want to propound in one of your Harijan articles about non-violent non-cooperation if any invader came to India. Could you give us an idea?" was the next question.

A. "It is wrong. I have no plan in mind. If I had, I should give it to you. But I think nothing more need be added when I have said that there should be unadulterated non-violent non-cooperation, and if the whole of India responded and unanimously offered it, I should show that without shedding a single drop of blood Japanese arms—or any combination of arms—can be sterilised. That involves the determination of India not to give quarter on any point whatsoever and to be ready to risk loss of several million lives. But I would consider that cost very cheap and victory won at that cost glorious. That India may not be ready to pay that price may be true. I hope it is not true, but some such price must be paid by any country that wants to retain its independence. After all, the sacrifice made by the Russians and the Chinese is enormous, and they are ready to risk all. The same could be said of the other countries also, whether aggressors or defenders. The cost is enormous. Therefore, in the non-violent technique I am asking India to risk no more than other countries are risking and which India would have to risk even if she offered armed resistance."

"But," promptly came the question, "unadulterated non-violent non-cooperation has not been successful against Great Britain. How will it succeed against a new aggressor?"

"I combat the statement altogether. Nobody has yet told me that non-violent non-cooperation, unadulterated, has not succeeded. It has not been offered, it is true. Therefore, you can say that what has not been offered hitherto is not likely to be offered suddenly when India faces the Japanese arms. I can only hope that, in the face of danger, India would be readier to offer non-violent non-cooperation. Perhaps India is accustomed to British rule for so many years that the Indian mind or India's masses do not feel the pinch so much as the advent of a new power would be felt. But your question is well put. It is possible that India may not be able to offer non-violent non-cooperation. But a similar question may be put regarding armed resistance. Several attempts have been made and they have not succeeded. Therefore, it will not succeed against the Japanese. That leads us to the absurd conclusion; that India will never be ready for gaining independence, and seeing that I cannot subscribe to any such proposition, I must try again and again till India is ready to respond to the call of non-violent non-cooperation. But if India does not respond to that call, then India must respond to the call of some leader or some organisation, wedded to violence. For instance, the Hindu Mahasabha is trying to rouse the Hindu mind for an armed conflict. It remains to be seen whether that attempt succeeds. I for one do not believe it will succeed."

Scorched Earth Policy

Q. "Would you advise non-violent non-cooperation against scorched earth policy? Would you resist the attempt to destroy sources of food and water?"

A. "Yes. A time may come when I would certainly advise it, for I think it is ruinous, suicidal, and unnecessary—whether India believes in non-violent non-cooperation or in violence. And the Russian and Chinese examples make no appeal to me. If some other country resorts to methods which I consider to be inhuman, I may not follow them. If the enemy comes and helps himself to crops, I may be obliged to leave, because I cannot or care not to defend them. I must resign myself to it. And there is a good example for us. A passage was quoted to me from the Islamic literature. The Khaliphs issued definite instructions to the armies of Islam that they should not destroy the utility services, they should not harass the aged and women and children; and I do not know that the arms of Islam suffered any disaster because the armies obeyed those instructions."

Q. "But what about factories—especially factories for the manufacture of munitions?"

A. "Suppose there are factories for grinding wheat or pressing oilseeds. I should not destroy them. But munitions factories, yes; for I would not tolerate munitions factories in a free India if I had my way. Textile factories I would not destroy and I would resist all such destruction. However, it is a question of prudence." Gandhiji continued: "I have not suggested immediate enforcement of the whole programme in pursuance of the demand for British withdrawal. It is there of course. But I am trying, if I am allowed to continue to cultivate and educate public opinion, to show that behind this demand of mine there is no ill-will, no malice. It is the most logical thing that I have suggested. It is in the interests of all, and since it is an entirely friendly act, I am moving cautiously, watching myself at every step. I will do nothing in haste, but there is the fixed determination behind every act of mine that the British must withdraw."

"I have mentioned anarchy. I am convinced that we are living today in a state of ordered anarchy. It is a misnomer to call such rule as is established in India a rule which promotes the welfare of India. Therefore, this ordered disciplined anarchy should go, and if there is complete lawlessness in India, as a result, I would risk it, though I believe, and should like to believe, that 22 years of continuous effort at educating India along the lines of non-violence will not have gone in vain, and people will evolve real popular order out of chaos. Therefore, if I find that all the best effort fails, I would certainly invite people to resist destruction of their property."

No Moral Support to Britain or America

Q. "Can India give her moral sympathy or support to either of the parties to the war?" was the next question.

A. "My own personal view is well-known. And if I can convert India to my view, there would be no aid to either side; but my sympathies are undoubtedly in favour of China and Russia."

Q. "But what about Britain?"

With quiet determination Gandhiji said: "I used to say that my moral support was entirely with Britain. I am very sorry to have to confess that today my mind refuses to give that moral support. British behaviour towards India has filled me with great pain. I was not quite prepared for Mr. Amery's performances or Sir Stafford Cripps's Mission. These have, in my estimation, put Britain morally in the wrong. And, therefore, though I do not wish any humiliation to Britain—and therefore no defeat—my mind refuses to give her any moral support."

Q. "What about America?"

A. "I expressed my opinion some time ago that it was a wrong thing for America and unfortunate for the world peace that America, instead of working—as she could have worked—for world peace, identified herself with war."

Q. "But was there any alternative for her?"

A. "I am sure she would have, if she had intended, brought about peace. But it is my firm opinion that she did not use her opportunity. I know that I have no right to criticise such a big nation. I do not know all the facts that determined America to throw herself into the cauldron. But somehow or other, opinion has forced itself upon me that America could have remained out, and even now it can do so if she divests herself of the intoxication that her immense wealth has produced. And I would like to repeat what I have said about the withdrawal of British power from India. Both America and Britain lack the moral basis for engaging in this war, unless they put their own houses in order, while making a fixed determination to withdraw their influence and power both from Africa and Asia, and remove the colour-bar. They have no right to talk about protecting democracies and protecting civilisation and human freedom until the canker of white superiority is destroyed in its entirety."

Arbitration on Indo-British Question

An English correspondent, keen on finding a solution or a way out, put a most pertinent question at the end: "Would you advocate arbitration for the Indo-British problem? And if so, of what sort?"

A. "Any day. I suggested long ago that this question could be decided by arbitration. How to bring that arbitration about, I do not know. But if the British rulers will accept the principle, it should not be impossible to find impartial arbitrators, though I admit it is a tremendously difficult problem to find impartial arbitrators in this case."

Q. "But you may say the same thing about finding arbitrators on the domestic question too?"

A. "No. It is a comparatively simpler thing. Where British power is concerned it has such great influence and power—and rightly so—it would be difficult to get hold of arbitrators who would not be biased in favour of Great Britain, and deliver a fearless and just award."

Q. "Cannot there be any arbitration on the question of Independence?"

A. "No, not on the question of Independence. It is possible only on questions on which sides may be taken. The outstanding question of Independence should be treated as common cause. It is only then that I can conceive possibility of arbitration on the Indo-British question. But, as I have said, it is a most difficult question. If ever there is a real adjustment, it will come only when Britain feels that it is wrong to rule over another nation. But when that conviction goes home, they won't need arbitration—we in India won't. But if there is to be any arbitration—and I cannot logically say there should not, for if I did, it would be an arrogation of complete justice on my side—it can be done only if India's Independence is recognised."

Q. "Why did you not go to America in 1931, even though you were pressingly invited by Bishop Fisher?"

A. "Because I had no faith in myself. The invitation was very pressing indeed, and the offer was sincere, and I could easily have spared a fortnight, but I had no faith that I would be able to do any good to India. It would have been a nine days' wonder. I would be lionised and torn to pieces. The American people would listen to you, lionise you, but would go their own way. Gurudeva had been there, Vivekanand had been there, and his followers are still there. But the soul of America is untouched because of her worship of 'the golden calf'. As a people, they are, after all is said and done, worshippers of Mammon."

"Does not America send her troops to India for a personal and selfish motive?" was the last question which revealed the sentiment of the common man in the street.

Gandhiji, correcting the questioner, said: "I suggest a better way of putting the question: 'Is it not disastrous for foreign armies to come to India when India has sufficient man-power?' If you put the question like that, my answer is: 'Decidedly so.'"

Terrible If True

A terrible tale of ordered anarchy comes from Khurja. A correspondent writes to say that, for no cause he can understand, practically all normal activities have been stopped. Even the sale of bamboos and mats for biers was prohibited. Even building activities have been stopped causing the greatest inconvenience and damage. Money is taken from the people on the slightest pretext and a reign of terror prevails. I have given here the barest outline of the doings in Khurja in the hope that there will be full investigation and if the facts are true further damage will be prevented.

Sevagram, 25-5-42

Why The Difference ?

A Professor writes :

"You have advised the British to withdraw. About the Princes you say, 'But I would fain hope that the Princes and their advisers will, for their own sakes and for the good of India, curb the tendency in many States which cannot be described by any other adjective than lawless.' Why not ask the Princes whose tyranny is older and perhaps more deep-rooted than that of the British to abdicate immediately ?"

I am surprised that the Professor has failed to see the distinction between the Princes and the Paramount Power. The Princes (present) are a creation of the Paramount Power. They derive their authority from it. Their abdication will not end the princely rule. Another will immediately take the vacant place and in the absence of one the State will be under British administration. Thus, whichever way you look, you will find the British Power by its very nature blocking the way to Truth.

Khadi and Village Industry

Q. You have often said that khadi and village industry are supplementary to each other. But you have created separate organisations for them with the result that a khadi worker, when he goes to a village, is unable to spare time from his own particular work for either village industries or uplift. Recently you have asked for khadi and village industry bhandars to be run jointly. Times are such that transport of goods is becoming increasingly difficult. Should not khadi and village industry centres, therefore, be converted into one? Would it not be a good thing if khadi workers gave up all ideas of sending locally produced khadi to distant places and concentrated on both khadi and village industry production for local use? Khadi workers are asked to penetrate into the houses of artisans with charkha and train them, to rouse a love of village products in them, improve their ways of living, health, sanitation, etc. But if they have no time to spare, how can they do all that is expected of them?

A. I admit that, if a khadi worker's entire time is employed in khadi work, he cannot possibly attend to either village uplift or industry. Three persons would be required for the three tasks. My idea is that in a well-organised village one person should suffice. For example, one worker may devote two hours to taking in yarn, distributing slivers and spinning tools, and sales of khadi; village industry work might take even less, and the remainder of the time he could give to village uplift and general education. This has not till now been possible because the khadi worker's time has been devoted to teaching people how to spin etc. But now the time has come when khadi and village products, locally produced, must also be locally absorbed. In that case one person will be able to do all the work. Today it suffices to say that all this work is complementary — and must become one as far as possible. The amalgamation cannot be imposed; it must be a natural growth. I do not, I cannot, apportion any blame to anyone for the existing position. Our plans have progressed as far as our intelligence and experience could have taken them. The creation of khadi vidyalayas is meant to expand and improve the technique of work. We shall learn from them how all departments of village work can be amalgamated.

What Cost Violence?

Many who paid homage to non-violence from afar are disturbed about its practicability when the perspective is altered and when naked violence unashamed threatens to stalk the land. It is, therefore, necessary for us to consider the so-called effectiveness of violence. We shall not have space here to weigh the evils and benefits of violence and non-violence in the social, ethical and cultural spheres. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves purely to the economic field and that too more especially to armaments. Man differs from the brute in his creative propensities. Man's progress, therefore, is measured by his creativeness. Modern warfare, on the other hand, is a competition in destructive capacity. What with centralised methods of production and standardisation we are reaching a rate of destruction which bids fair to wipe out all civilisation. Instead of men being occupied in supplying one another's wants today they are engaged in destroying not only the productivity of the enemy but also their own, under the scorched earth policy.

In normal times we used to regard a crore of rupees as a colossal sum. A battleship of the type of the "Prince of Wales" costs about 15 crores, and it is sent to the bottom of the sea in a few minutes. During a whole year the Government spends hardly 12 crores on education throughout India — barely three-quarters of the cost of a single battleship. A submarine boat will cost about 50 lakhs. With barely half this amount as capital the A. I. S. A. has provided work for years on end to about 3 lakhs of workers in over 13 thousand villages, distributing in wages over 15 lakhs of rupees amongst them. A single 16 inch gun on a battleship costs about 6 lakhs. Two to three such guns will more than pay for all the famine relief given by Government in a year all over India, the expenditure on which score is about 15 lakhs per year. Two shells fired from such a gun will more than pay the expenses of running the central office of the A. I. V. I. A. for a whole year. When we hear that ten bombers have been shot down it is equivalent to the loss of the whole capital of the A. I. S. A. What Great Britain spends during a single day on this war will more than pay the expenses incurred by all the Provincial Governments and the Central Government for fifteen years in India on the promotion of industries.

NON-VIOLENCE IN EVOLUTION*

Scientific discoveries make books on the various sciences out of date within a short time of their publication. A student of medicine reading books on the aetiology of cancer, for instance, would go to the latest books on the subject, and reject one published two or even one decade ago. Books on surgery published fifty years ago, however valuable then, would not, at an old bookseller's, fetch even the cost of printing them. A monument of research and industry, Hume's History of England, is not read nowadays, as historical research since its publication has made many statements of fact inaccurate or untrue.

Not so however with books of spiritual science. Sage Patanjali gave his Yoga aphorisms centuries ago. Books about the date of Patanjali written fifty years ago would be displaced by later researches. But no commentary, provided it is written by one who has tried to carry out the aphorisms in actual practice, can be out of date, no matter when it was written. For each represents the result of the author's spiritual experience and growth, and every step towards the goal of self-realisation offers help and guidance to pilgrims on the path. Every such pilgrim is an experimenter in the laboratory of Truth which is Infinite. The discovery of Truth will never be complete and any honest record of earnest striving has its value. It is from that point of view that this book<sup>1</sup>, which reproduces chronologically all the most important writings of Gandhiji on the subject of Non-violence, is of the greatest value to those who will follow Truth at all costs and who recognise that Non-violence is the road to that pursuit. This is all the more so when one realises that Gandhiji's experiments in Truth and Non-violence are not only in pursuit of Truth but also in pursuit of aims which one describes as mundane. Prof. Toynbee, the celebrated Research Professor of International History, has in the monumental volumes of A Study of History drawn this distinction. "Gentleness" — which he says might equally well be called 'Non-violence' — looks a superficial negative label, but carefully examined it "covers more than one positive reality" and he reveals four distinct positive meanings of the term. Thus "at its lowest the practice of Non-violence may express nothing more noble or more constructive than a cynical disillusionment with the fruitlessness of a violence which has been previously practised ad nauseum without having produced the intended results. A notorious example of a Non-violence of this unedifying kind is the religious toleration which has been in vogue in the Western World from about the last quarter of the seventeenth century of the Christian era down to our own day. Alternatively, Non-violence may express a conviction that Man's divinely allotted role in the economy of the Universe is to adopt a patiently passive attitude towards a mundane scene on which it is God's exclusive prerogative to execute His divine will through His own action — which would be hampered and not assisted, if Man were to presume to intervene in what is wholly God's business. Such is, for example, the conviction that underlies the Non-violence of Agudath Israel. This second philosophy of Non-violence is as pious and as scrupulous as our first is unprincipled and cynical; but at the same time it resembles the Non-violence of disillusionment in being unconstructive. Non-violence may, however, also be practised as a means to some constructive end; and such an end, again, may be either mundane or 'other worldly'. A classic example of the practice of Non-violence for a mundane end is presented in Mahatma Gandhi's political tactics of Non-violent Non-cooperation. The aim of Mr. Gandhi and his followers is to obtain for the people of India the political boon of complete self-government; and the pursuit of this aim by these tactics is evidence of a high degree of intellectual and moral originality; for the aim in view has been valued at its present enormously current price in a Western Vanity Fair; and our Western nationalists have seldom or never abstained from resorting to violence — of heart, if not of hand — in their endeavours to gain possession of this coveted pearl. Mr. Gandhi's tactical recourse of Non-violence is therefore a noteworthy new departure in the political technique of a Westernized 'Great Society'; but it is not, of course, so great a departure as a practice of Non-violence for reasons which are not just tactical but are strategic. While Mr. Gandhi practises Non-violence because he considers this to be the most efficacious means of pursuing an aim that is mundane, the Non-violence of Jesus and Johann ben Zakkai is a reflection on the mundane plane, of a transference of the field of action from that mundane plane to another."

But Prof. Arnold Toynbee does not quite see the reason why Gandhiji has dared to experiment the method of Non-violence on the mundane plane. It is precisely because Gandhiji refuses to make any distinction between the mundane and the 'other-worldly' plane so far as the moral and physical laws which govern them are concerned. For him the outside universe is but a reflection of the inside universe, and he repeats time and again that "the universe is compressed in the atom. There is not one law for the atom and another for the universe." It is not only the eye of the poet that enables him

To see a world in a grain of sand
And a heaven in a wild flower,
Hold Infinity in the palm of your hand,
And Eternity in an hour

but an actual spiritual experience that gives the conviction that moral principles have no meaning unless they can be made to serve as guides of conduct in the daily affairs of men. It is therefore as a steady growth and evolution of the meaning and implications of Non-violence that this volume deserves to be studied by all who aspire to practise it for mundane or ultra-mundane ends. There is no royal road to train individuals or communities in the difficult art of Non-violence, except, as he says, "through living the creed in your life which must be a living sermon. The expression in one's own life presupposes great study, tremendous perseverance and thorough cleansing of one's self of all the impurities." And then he reveals the tremendous superiority of the spiritual force over physical force: "If for mastering of the physical sciences you have to devote a whole lifetime, how many lifetimes may be needed for mastering the greatest spiritual force that mankind has known? But why worry even if it means several lifetimes? For, if this is the only thing in life, if this is the only thing that counts, then whatever effort you bestow on mastering is well spent. Seek ye first the Kingdom of Heaven and everything else shall be added unto you. The Kingdom of Heaven is Ahimsa."

To outward seeming quite a number of contradictions will be found in this book—as, for instance, were pointed out by that great Pacifist B. De Ligt who, strongly criticised Gandhiji's participation in the Boer War and the First World War of 1914-18, which apparently is irreconcilable with his stubborn opposition to the present war and all wars. Thus there was a time when he felt it necessary to say: "I would not hesitate to advise those who would bear arms to do so and fight for the country." Not that he visualised a Swaraj won by violence. "Under Swaraj of my dream there is no necessity for arms at all," he said, but added: "But I do not expect that dream to materialise in its fulness as a result of the present effort,"—he meant the Khilafat Struggle of 1921—"because I do not consider myself advanced enough to be able to prescribe a detailed course of conduct to the nation for such preparation." Again and again he used to say in those days: "I have not yet the attainments for preaching universal non-violence with effect." In one sentence he summed up the reason why even as a votary of non-violence he did not preach non-participation in 1914-18: "I had no status to resist participation"—by status meaning the status that service of the country and active practice of the principle for 29 years have given him now. By sufficient service he hoped then to attain some day "the power and confidence to resist the Empire's wars and its war-like preparations." There was a time when he thought in terms of his duty as a unit, however humble, of the Empire, and said that so long as he enjoyed the peace and security that "Pax Britannica" gave, it was his duty to serve the Empire. Today he continues to enjoy that "peace and security", but the peace is the peace of the grave and the security is the security of abject slaves. His soul therefore rebels against the Empire which now to him is a synonym for iniquity and he has vowed incessant opposition to that Empire and its war. Even twenty years ago, he knew that India's impotence affects and corrupts the whole of mankind, but he realises now as never before the implications of that knowledge. These are no contradictions. There is no more contradiction between them than there is between the root and the stem and the bark of a tree and its leaves and its flowers and its fruits. The same sap runs through all as the same passionate pursuit of non-violence runs through Gandhiji's life as through all that he has thought and done, said and written. Let the student read, study, chew and inwardly digest all that is included in this volume, and he will find that there is revealed in it the organic growth of a vital rule of life as of a soul aspiring not only towards Self-realisation, but also towards the emancipation of mankind from strife and bloodshed until, to use the words of Prof. Toynbee, "Violence annihilates itself and leaves Gentleness alone in the Field."

FRIENDLY ADVICE

( By M. K. Gandhi )

Thus reasons a friend :

"Most people will agree with you that Britain's inability to play fair by India deprives them of the right to expect even our moral support. Ideologically also most people will agree with you that their only honourable course would be to withdraw from India. But inevitably the withdrawal will confront us with immense difficulties which you yourself have admitted. You say you are willing to take all risks. Every brave man is. At the same time is it not your duty to prepare the ground up to a point so as to minimise the risks as far as possible? The people must, for instance, be made to shed cowardice and feel that it is possible for us to stand on our own legs. They must not desire, as so many do, Japanese help or even submit to Japanese domination as they would have to, if that help were taken. They must be weaned, as far as possible, from hatred of the British. And then every effort must be made to secure Muslim support. This is your last and supreme effort to bring freedom to India. Let no step be taken in haste or without due preparation. The time is too critical to bear failure."

As these columns show, with the overwhelming sense of the truth as it appears to me, I am taking every care humanly possible to prepare the ground. I know that the novelty of the idea and that too at this juncture has caused a shock to many people. But I could not help myself. Even at the risk of being called mad, I had to tell the truth if I was to be true to myself. I regard it as my solid contribution to the War and to India's deliverance from the peril that is and the peril that is threatening. It is too my real contribution to communal unity. No one can visualise what it will be like. Only it will not be the sham we have had up to now. It has touched only the few politically minded people. The masses have remained unaffected by it.

Whilst therefore I will take every imaginable care consistent with the urgency, I cannot guarantee freedom from cowardice, before taking any forward step. The cowardice will probably not be shed without much travail. Nor is waiting possible, till hatred abates. Withdrawal of the hated power is the only way to rid the land of the debasing hatred. The cause gone, hatred must cease.

Of course the people must not, on any account, lean on the Japanese to get rid of the British power. That were a remedy worse than the disease. But as I have already said, in this struggle every risk has to be run in order to cure ourselves of the biggest disease — a disease which has sapped our manhood and almost made us feel as if we must for ever be slaves. It is an insufferable thing. The cost of the cure, I know, will be heavy. No price is too heavy to pay for the deliverance. Sevagram, 23-5-42

FOR RAJAJI

( By M. K. Gandhi )

There is no doubt that Rajaji is handling a cause which has isolated him from his colleagues. But his worst enemy will not accuse him of any selfish motive behind the extraordinary energy with which he has thrown himself into the controversy of which he is the author. It reflects the greatest credit on him. He is entitled to a respectful hearing. His motive is lofty. It is a noble thing to strive for Hindu Muslim Unity, equally noble to strive to ward off the Japanese intrusion. In his opinion the two are intertwined.

Hooliganism is no answer to his argument. The disturbances at his meetings are a sign of great intolerance. Evolution of democracy is not possible if we are not prepared to hear the other side. We shut the doors of reason when we refuse to listen to our opponents or having listened make fun of them. If intolerance becomes a habit, we run the risk of missing the truth. Whilst with the limits that nature has put upon our understanding, we must act fearlessly according to the light vouchsafed to us, we must always keep an open mind and be ever ready to find that what we believed to be truth was, after all, untruth. This openness of mind strengthens the truth in us and removes the dross from it, if there is any. I plead therefore with all who are disturbing Rajaji's meetings not to do so but to give him a patient and respectful hearing to which he is entitled.

The reader knows that I hold Rajaji to be in the wrong. He is creating a false atmosphere. He does not believe in Pakistan nor do the nationalist Muslims and others who concede the right of separation or secession. They and Rajaji say that that is the way to wean the Muslim League from the demand for separation. I am surprised that many Muslims rejoice over a concession of doubtful value. I see nothing but seeds of further quarrel in it. It should be enough to state the proposition that nothing can prevent the Muslim League from having it if the Muslims really want it. They will take it by the vote or the sword unless they will submit to arbitration. But all this can only happen when the British Power is entirely withdrawn and the Japanese menace has abated. Till then there is neither Pakistan nor Hindustan or any other 'stan'. It is today Englistan and may be tomorrow Japanistan, if we do not take care. If all who consider India to be their home now and for ever will pull their full weight to deliver it from the present and the impending peril, and when both the perils are finally removed, it will be time to talk of Pakistan and other 'stan's and to come to an amicable decision or fight. No third party will or should decide our fate. It should be reason or the sword. Rajaji's method leads us to the blind alley unless his admirable and patriotic persistence opens a way unknown to him or any of us. Whatever the fate of different opinions, my plea is for mutual toleration and respect. Sevagram, 24-5-42

INDIAN SOLDIERS RUN AMUCK?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I take the following from the report of the Secretary, B. P. C. C., on the shooting alleged to have taken place by soldiers of Indian Signal Corps on 17th and 18th instant at Nivodhai near Dutta-parkar in Barasat subdivision, Bengal:

"A batch of Indian troops about 7 or 8, while engaged in sinking telephone posts entered the garden of Rabindranath Bose at about 1 P. M. on the 17th May, plucked fruits and willfully damaged green mangoes and jack fruits etc, whereupon, Rabindra and Shashindra protested against their conduct. The soldiers thereupon assaulted them and kicked Sashindra when he fell down. Sashindra was attended by Dr. Tulsidas Sarkar, a local medical man. The soldiers also raided the house of Hari Charan Das and Sashanka Das and damaged the cooking and other utensils and threatened the local people with dire consequences.

... "Pachu Gopal Mookherjee, President, Union Board, Suresh Chandra Dey (Honorary Magistrate) and Dr. Tulsidas Sarkar lodged the first information at Barasat Thana at about 5-30 P. M. and reported the matter to the S. D. O. Barasat and sought his protection. The S. D. O., thereupon, directed the Thana officer to post four constables at Nibodhai village in the morning of the 18th and 19th May. The complainants carried written instructions from the S. D. O. to the Thana officer, but unfortunately no police constable was found in the village on the 18th morning, when that unfortunate firing took place. ... Next day on the 18th May, the soldiers numbering about 25 came to the scene of occurrence with arms at about 7 A. M. Out of these men about 12 or 13 entered the Nibodhai village at 8-30 A. M. and started patrolling the streets using abusive language to the villagers and womenfolk and threatened them with their rifles and bullets. They, then, entered the tailoring shop of Ratan Das and assaulted him. After assaulting Ratan Das they again entered the garden of Robin Bose, knocked at the door and threatened to assault the female members of the house. The panic-stricken inmates having raised a hue and cry, a large number of villagers (40/50) assembled there to rescue them. Thereupon, the troops gave a signal to the other members of the corps who were waiting in the neighbourhood, when they also ran to the place of occurrence.

"Four or five local young men, namely, Sushil Kanjilal, Bejoy Kumar Mukherjee, Sambhu Nath Dutta and Santosh Nath approached the soldiers and requested them not to intimidate the innocent people and asked them to leave the place, whereupon they got enraged and assaulted Sushil Kanjilal on the head with the butt end of a gun, (who has since been removed to Calcutta Medical School Hospital for treatment). At this the villagers got frightened and tried to run away when Bejoy Mukherji was pushed down by the soldier and a tussle ensued between them, then he fell into the adjacent tank and the soldiers got hold of him and ducked him in water. The villagers, thereupon, being exasperated ran to his rescue and some of them pelted stones at the soldiers. They then left Bejoy in the tank and opened six rounds of shot as a result of which Bejoy was wounded and fell down. Santosh Nath and Sambhu Dutta also received gun-shot wounds and have subsequently been removed to Calcutta Medical School for treatment. The condition of Santosh Nath is reported to be very serious. Immediately after firing the signallers left the place dragging the body of Bejoy towards the place where the military lorry was standing. After the soldiers had gone away, villagers began to search for the victim when Sudarshan Mukherji, Sripada Mukherji, Bojomohan Bose and others found Bejoy in a dying condition with intestine ripped open and groaning under the bush, near the railway home signal in a ditch close to Rabindra's garden. He was carried to the nearest Kalibari where he died saying that he was dragged in and trampled upon by the booted-soldiers on his chest and other parts of the body and was also bayoneted. He could say no more and he succumbed immediately.

"It was a deliberate and cold-blooded murder. The whole village seems to be exceedingly panic-stricken. The police did not arrive on the 18th morning although the S. D. O., Barasat, apprehending some trouble directed them to post constables at Nibodhai from the 18th morning. If the police authorities had been a bit more vigilant the catastrophe could have been averted.

"Santosh Nath who had since been lying in a precarious condition died on the 20th morning at Calcutta Medical School Hospital."

No comment is necessary on this wantonness on the part of the so-called defenders of India, assuming the truth of the statement.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The six questions that follow are from workers who endorse my plan for the withdrawal of the British Power. The answers have to be read in the light of the plan. The workers should know that no plan, however wise it may be, can produce the intended effect if it does not commend itself to those for whose benefit it is presented, or if they are too weak to follow it out. Now for my answers:

Not Right

Q. Are we right in believing that you wish the Congress and the people to become capable as soon as possible of taking over the administration and to do so on the first opportunity?

A. You are not right. I cannot speak for the Congress. But I want no organisation or individual to become capable of taking over the administration. In non-violent technique, it is unthinkable. You do not take over power. It may descend to you being given by the people. In an anarchical state, all turbulent elements will make a bid for power. Those who will serve the people and will evolve order out of chaos will spend themselves in removing chaos. If they survive, the popular will may put them in as administrators. This is wholly different from what you have imagined. People who make a bid for power generally fail to achieve it.

Q. In resisting unjust military or civil orders, is the primary motive, (a) protest against the Government action? (b) alleviation of the peoples' sufferings? or (c) a preliminary step towards the capture of power?

A. The central point of my conception is non-violence. In trying to educate the people to be without the British or any power, the chief thing is to resist all injustice, no matter how or by whom it is perpetrated. Here resistance is not by way of protest, certainly not a preliminary step towards gaining power. I want thousands of people to resist injustice. If they all were to do so to seize power, they will never succeed. It is surely enough for them to resist the injustice they feel. It is in itself a duty.

Q. Do you expect individual Congressmen to offer resistance in cases where the villagers or general public are not prepared to come forward?

A. If I can speak for Congressmen I would say most emphatically "yes". People who are terror-struck have no gumption. Those who have, have to intercede even at the cost of their lives.

Self-Protection

Q. Shall we go to reason with the officials who refuse to allow the organisation of self-protective units? And if they do not listen, shall we still go on?

A. People have to protect themselves against officials, against dacoits and possibly Japanese. If they do not, they are doomed. Therefore they may not brook any interference with their preparation. But they may not bear arms without licence. What I have in mind is gymnastics, drill, lathi play and the like. The authorities are not likely to interfere with these practices. But if they do, the people affected may disregard prohibition and take the consequence.

Salt

Q. Villagers here are much troubled for want of salt which they used to get largely from Calcutta. If they defy the Salt Laws they can easily make sufficient stocks for the needs of the Province. Cattle in these parts are given no salt. If salt became free this serious defect could also be removed. May we advise the people to make all the salt they need for the Province? After the rains begin they will not be able to make salt.

A. Manufacture of salt for home consumption is covered by the Irwin-Gandhi Pact. The ten mile radius at present is unworkable. I do think that in these hard times the restriction should be relaxed and as far as possible the people should be left to help themselves. The main revenue from salt is not likely to be affected by the laxity of administration in favour of the poor people. I would advise local adjustment with the authorities.

The idea underlying my plan, however visionary or even mischievous it may appear to be, is that if the setting given is non-violent and the workers understand and carry it out, the withdrawal of British authority can take place without much disturbance and certainly without the Japanese replacing that authority unless, as has been suggested, the popular mind is in favour of the Japanese.

While I was preparing this note, I received a letter from Rajen Babu who writes as follows about salt:

"During my tour I have made it a point to meet representatives of merchants and traders at every place I visit, with a view to ascertaining the position of stock of food-stuffs, kerosine oil and salt and other necessary articles of daily consumption. At every place it has been impressed on me, both by merchants and members of public, that a most serious situation is developing with regard to supply of salt. A big shortage in salt is apprehended at almost every place that I have visited and unless immediate steps are taken it may cause great hardships and sufferings to the people, particularly to the poor who very often have to depend only on salt to enable them to gulp the coarse food they can somehow manage to get. The steps to control the price of salt are ineffective. It is worse than useless to control the price of an article of vital necessity, without ensuring a regular supply of it. The price fixed remains only on paper and cannot be enforced unless there is arrangement to ensure a supply of the commodity. Despite the price fixed by the Government, salt sells at higher prices at many places particularly in mofussil. But what is feared is much more serious than mere high prices, viz., more or less total disappearance of salt from the market and grocers' shops. I am told that orders placed by the merchants are not executed by the people at the centres like Khewra and Shambhar. There is nothing like price control there and a lot more than the apparent price has to be paid by the merchants if they want to get a supply. It is said that this extra cost comes to something like Rs. 300/- to Rs. 400/- or even more per waggon in addition to the standard price of Rs. 1075/- for 550 maunds. At Calcutta although the price control has fixed Rs. 170 for 100 maunds the actual price paid by the buyers is Rs. 270/- This is the state of price control. The difficulty in securing a waggon is not the least of the difficulties that has to be encountered. With increasing difficulty in supply of waggons the prospect is dismal. The Government should take immediate steps to ensure a regular supply of salt: (a) by securing a regular supply of waggons, (b) by ensuring a just and fair distribution of the available stock among dealers, (c) by opening new sources of supply of salt, and (d) by removing all restrictions on the manufacture of salt from sea-water at sea-coast and from earth in the interior. It must be realised that dislocation of transport may make it impossible for salt to be carried from long distances and efforts should be made to make it available within manageable distances so that ordinary means of country transport like bullock carts, boats, pack bullocks, horses and mules may be employed for transporting it. With the monsoon already in sight it is already very late and any further delay in taking effective steps may mean untold sufferings."

I wish the authorities will listen to Rajen Babu and relax the restrictions, before it is too late and people suffer before actual war overtakes the land.

In Case of Requisition

Q. Land is being requisitioned for military aerodromes and villagers are being ordered to vacate. If no reasonable arrangements are being made for the villagers should the orders be resisted? or should we resist in any case as we do not want the aerodromes which are in themselves a danger not a protection, and no arrangements can ever adequately compensate a peasant for his house and fields?

A. No resistance on the ground of all war resistance is contemplated in the present plan. Resistance is permissible [only if villagers do not get equal facilities elsewhere in the shape of land and cottages. No monetary compensation can give evacuated people the land they will need. High-handedness should be resisted.

Out of Touch

Q. Do you know, being confined in Sevagram, how much you are out of touch with the public? If you were not you would not talk of resisting the Japanese as you do. For the dislike of the British is so great that the man in the street is ready to welcome the Japanese.

A. I cannot endorse your proposition that I am out of touch with the public. Though I am confined in Sevagram I see all sorts of people and receive correspondence from every nook and corner of India. Probably, therefore, I am more in touch with the people than you can be though living in a big town. You have not the opportunity that I have of gauging the public mind. But let us grant that what you say is right, (I believe you are partially right,) my suppressing the true remedy will not alter the public mind. On the contrary, I am showing the futility of hatred. I am showing that hatred injures the hater never the hated. An Imperial Power cannot act otherwise than it has been doing. If we are strong the British becomes powerless. I am therefore trying to wean the people from their hatred by asking them to develop the strength of mind to invite the British to withdraw and at the same time to resist the Japanese. With the British withdrawal the incentive to welcome the Japanese goes and the strength felt in securing British withdrawal will be used for stemming the Japanese inroad. I endorse C. R. 's proposition that the millions of India can resist the Japanese even without the possession of arms, modern and ancient, if they are properly organised. I differ from him when he says that this can be done even when the British arms are operating without coordination when you force yourself on the British Power. Experience teaches us that hearty coordination and cooperation is impossible where mutual trust and respect are wanting. British presence invites the Japanese, it promotes communal disunion and other discords, and what is perhaps the worst of all, deepens the hatred born of impotence. Orderly British withdrawal will turn the hatred into affection and will automatically remove communal distemper. So far as I can see the two communities are unable to think or see things in their proper perspective as long as they are under the influence of the third power.

LABOURERS AS CO-PARTNERS

Gandhiji has for years been saying that in industrial enterprises "workmen should be regarded as equal owners with the shareholders" and that "labour should have the same status and dignity as capital". In the midst of an acute industrial crisis he once seriously asked mill-owners to give to the workmen every year a fixed percentage of the mill's profit after all reasonable charges had been met. The suggestion, if adopted, would have ushered in an era of abiding peace between capital and labour. But that was not to be. That the suggestion, however, far from being either utopian or chimerical, was eminently practicable (provided the millowners' outlook underwent a little change,) is now proved by the following report from America published in the New York weekly Time dated 5th January, 1942:

"The plushiest employee profit-sharing plan in big corporation history last week was announced by Beech Aircraft Corp. (The biggest U. S. mass producer of heavy, twin-engined bomber trainers.) The scheme which was okayed with a whoop and a holler by Beech's 6,000 employers gives them one-half of all company profits. Distributions (50% cash, 50% U. S. Defence Savings Bonds) will be made every three months on the basis of the preceding quarter's earnings. Beech thereby expects to generate enough worker co-operation and efficiency at least to offset the cost of the stockholders."

This is no eyewash, for the Beech's is a prospering concern and is going through a boom period. "In the year ended September 30, Beech sales rose 240% to $ 8,063,000, profits 600% to $ 472,000. Both were all-time records." Again, "October and November sales almost equalled all those made last year; by next September sales will cross $ 75,000,000." The labourers will thus be getting substantial sums. But whether the sums are substantial or otherwise, the underlying principle is sound, and will make the workers look upon the concern as their own.

The same issue of Time also contains the following news item of a somewhat similar nature:

"Another munitions-maker, Jack & Heintly, Inc. of Cleveland, also paid a remarkable bonus last week: $ 650,000 to 800 employees. All employees are called 'associates'. They punch no time clocks, get monthly bonuses averaging $ 30, free coffee, jazz music four hours daily, free hamburgers every Wednesday, will soon get free grub from a company cafeteria."

As regards Britain, a well-known British economist, Geoffrey Crowther (editor of The Economist) says in a book of his (Economics for Democrats) that "there is a profit-sharing arrangement in the mining industry by which the workers share immediately in any greater prosperity of the employers."

Why should something of the kind not be feasible of adoption in India? C. S.

FACE THE FACTS

Some time ago commenting on a frank speech by Major General Molesworth I tried to show that even if we could be armed the game was not worth the candle at this very late stage. But some of us continue to cry for arms, and when there is no response we bravely say, "Well, we will fight without arms." So far as Government are concerned more frankness from them cannot be expected. In answering the remark: "We are unarmed. What can we do? Let the Government put arms in our hands and we will spring to the defence of India like one man", the Viceroy frankly said: "Were the people of Great Britain armed in June 1940? Were the people of Russia armed in June 1941? During the long agony of China had ordinary men arms in their hands? The answer is 'no'. The mass of the people have never carried arms in any country or in any modern campaign." He ignored the fact that in Great Britain, Russia and China, the mass of the people who were not armed in 1940 or 1941 are armed today, but his answer should leave one in no doubt that it is impossible for him to arm the mass of the people of India. A suicidal military and political policy makes it impossible for the British to do so, no matter what the cost and the consequences. In Malay the same policy was followed. Sir Richard Winstedt, formerly General Adviser to the Johore State, in a letter to the Daily Telegraph scouts the suggestion that the Malays were "soft" or unpatriotic, asks how the Malays could be expected to defend their country when there were only two regiments led by officers with poor knowledge of Malays and their language, and says: "It is for the Imperial Defence Committee to explain the omission to raise more troops and provide a permanent nucleus of officers with a thorough knowledge of the Malay terrain, language and peoples. What must Malays think of that omission now? British prestige has had a staggering blow and quite the least we can do now is to refrain from criticism of those whom we were pledged to protect and whom we could not save and not to dream of reprisals against a country which, left by us in the lurch, may have to pretend collaboration with Japan."

Nothing can be more patent than this that they were either unable or unwilling to arm the mass of people in Malay and they are in the same predicament here. Then why not face the facts? The demand for withdrawal of the British power far from being intended to embarrass them is meant to indicate an honourable and dignified way to extricate themselves from the miserable mess they have made. If they depart they will have had the credit of having done the right thing. The Indians will then be free from one complication.

As for those of us who cry for more arms, we should realise that it is a cry for the moon, and it is best for us to educate and organise our people for non-violent non-cooperation. A writer in the

New York Nation, who is supposed to be a military expert, has made out a case for providing the people of Hitler-occupied Europe with arms, which should be rained on them from aeroplanes from America. "The weapons supplied must be simple enough," he says, "for untrained persons to operate and effective enough when employed with surprise and stealth to give the men temporary equality with German soldiers. The rifle does not possess the shock power required. The ideal weapons for counter-revolution are the submachine gun and the high power fragmentation grenade. Both are relatively simple to manufacture, easy to operate and deadly at close range." Whatever be the military knowledge of the writer, those in charge of the war in America certainly know better and they would not think of launching on the quixotic plan put forth in the article. It is impossible both selfishly and practically. America cannot afford, for naturally selfish reasons, to proceed on that wild goose chase. It would be easier for America to follow the plan with regard to India, but America and England know their business better. As for the poor people of vanquished Europe, if they tried to rise up in arms against Hitler, there would be far more death and destruction in the wake of their armed rebellion than there is today. But it is open to them to follow the way of non-violent non-cooperation. Nearly two million Poles are in Germany as agricultural labourers and the same number are in Russia which is fighting the war for democracy. And people from other countries are being drawn as combatants and non-combatants by Hitler. Would it not be easier for them, provided they had the will, to refuse all cooperation rather than rise up in revolt with the help of arms which may be supplied to them from America?

But whatever may or may not be possible for them, there is no doubt that that is the only way that is open to us, and also possible to us having in view the fact that we have received training, however imperfect, in the technique for several years. Both the authorities and we have to face the facts.

A Triple Tragedy

The National Herald is an institution. It has a directorate which has no personal or financial interest in it. It is founded by Jawaharlal Nehru. It is only in India that the security of such a paper can be forfeited. In fact why any security at all from it? And they need the greatest assistance possible from him in the war effort. They have exploited his stray sayings torn from their context. In any case, what do the Government expect from their repressive policy? Consider this forfeiture of security in conjunction with the arrest and detention of Rafi Ahmed Kidwai, ex-Minister, the organiser of the Congress in U. P. and a Director of the National Herald. Put these two acts side by side with the wanton and almost indecent search of the A. I. C. C. Office. And the tragedy is complete. This triple act is in my opinion a great hindrance to national war effort. It is so mad as to amount to an invitation to the Japanese to walk into India. It is a justification for my friendly invitation to the foreign Government to abdicate in favour of the nation whatever it may be. It is bold, it is hazardous. The British are capable of taking risks such as very few are. Let them take the risk I have suggested and it will be their greatest war effort. It alone can save the situation, if anything can, so far as India is concerned. As a first step let them revoke the forfeiture order, discharge Rafi Saheb, and return the papers seized from the A. I. C. C.

Jodhpur

From Jodhpur comes the news that Shri Jainarayan Vyas has been arrested for daring to seek an interview with the Maharaja and for proposing to carry on the movement for responsible government in Jodhpur.

Evidently Shri Jainarayan Vyas had no other choice. I wish the Jodhpur workers all success. But I hope they have realised that they have to plough the lonely furrow. They will have abundant sympathy from all over India, but dry sympathy will give them no help. Help must come from their own resolute will and unflinching courage.

Sardar Prithvisingh

I am sorry that after association with me since his discovering himself and allowing himself to be arrested, Sardar Prithvisingh has parted company with me, having lost all faith in me all of a sudden and as a result of a single talk with me. This naturally led him to tender his resignation from the Ahimsaka Vyayam Sangh. As a natural corollary to this step, the trustees of the Sangh have decided to wind up the Sangh and close the Vyayam Shala, which was established by the Sangh, purely to let him make experiment and find out, under my guidance, the scope and quality of non-violent Vyayam. I am hoping that, though he has lost faith in me, he has not lost it in ahimsa to which he was led after close and careful self-examination during years of secrecy.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Q. "Is it a fact that your present attitude towards England and Japan is influenced by the belief that you think the British and the allies are going to be defeated in this War? It is necessary that you clear the position in this respect. A very important leader in the Congress thinks like that and he says that he is sure because he has this knowledge from his personal talks with you."

A. I wish you could have given the name of the leader. Whoever he is, I have no hesitation in saying that it is not true. On the contrary I said only the other day in Harijan that the Britisher was hard to beat. He has not known what it is to be defeated. Of the Americans in this very issue, you will see my answer to The Sunday Despatch. It contradicts the "leader's" statements. He has therefore either misunderstood me or you have misunderstood him. But I have said in my talk for the past twelve months and more that this war is not likely to end in a decisive victory for any party. There will be peace when the exhaustion point is reached. This is mere speculation. Britain may be favoured by nature. She has nothing to lose by waiting. And with America as her ally she has inexhaustible material resources and scientific skill. This advantage is not available to any of the Axis powers. Thus I have no decisive opinion about the result of the War. But what is decisive with me is that I am made by nature to side with weak parties. My policy of non-embarrassment is based upon that nature and it persists. My proposal for British withdrawal is as much in the Britain's interest as India's. Your difficulty arises from your disinclination to believe that Britain can ever do justice voluntarily. My belief in the capacity of non-violence rejects the theory of permanent inelasticity of human nature.

A REMINISCENCE OF C. F. A.

The five lakhs for the Deenabandhu Memorial could not have been made up in a week but for the generous response of some of the wealthy friends in Bombay. But it must not be forgotten that these include the meagre contributions of the poor—some of whom cherish the memory of the Deenabandhu who worked for them in Fiji, New Zealand and South Africa. A number of people from a village—Karadi Matwad—in Surat District have sent a sum of Rs. 131-4-0 by M. O., made up of small contributions. Some of these, I am told actually knew C. F. A. in New Zealand, and in gladly giving their contributions they said that was the least they could do. Very little is known of C. F. A.'s arduous work in these distant lands. "His activities on behalf of suffering humanity were so extraordinarily varied," says Mr. Hoyland in his memoir, that "the details of them have been forgotten even by himself." But a friend who worked with him in Fiji has a vivid memory of the trips and sends a record which is worth preserving. The system of indenture was a kind of extension of the slavery system for over eighty years after slavery had been nominally abolished, and C. F. A. was one of those whose souls rebelled against the iniquity, immorality and inhumanity of that tyranny. Just as C. F. A. made up his mind as early as 1928 that the British rule in India must be ended and India should be made independent, even so he decided that the indenture system admitted of no improvement, and it must be abolished root and branch. With this end in view he made several pilgrimages to Fiji, incurred the wrath of the owners of sugar companies and the authorities, both of whom worked in an unholy alliance of exploitation and oppression of the poor labourers who went there not knowing what awaited them. All that the sugar companies were concerned about was cheap labour. Before the curse was abolished it was necessary that there should be some education among them. The Deenabandhu's first visit was on a commission of inquiry. The second visit he made on his own, determined that some proper arrangement should be made for the education of the children of the labourers, if Government or the Sugar Company would do nothing in that behalf. His visit was misunderstood and misrepresented. Some tried to make out that he had come to organise a strike and revolt of labour against the Company. He arrived at Lautoka, visited Indians in their cottages and various settlements, and within a week selected three centres—Nadi, Sabeto and Karavi—all on the northern side of the Island where only Christian Mission Schools under the supervision of Europeans existed. He decided that the schools should be in charge of Indians, and education to be given them should be such as would enable them to maintain contact with the land of their birth and their culture. He had to select for this teachers from ex-government interpreters who were then the only educated Indians available as teachers. Shri N. G. Mukerji was appointed in charge of Sabeto School and Shri S. C. Mitter in charge of Nadi School. Both these men, our correspondent says, had come to Fiji under contract to serve as clerks and interpreters but both resigned. The third school could not be organised. Before any thing could be done, he received a confidential message that if he did not leave Fiji in dignity he would be expelled. An Indian merchant helped him in booking a passage for Sydney and he sailed without a word to the public. His visit was not appreciated by the Australian overseers in the employ of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, a district commissioner had asked his own Indian clerks to spy the Deenabandhu's movements, and an urgent meeting of the Legislative Assembly was called to bring into force a law for deporting undesirable persons from the colony. A warrant had been issued deporting him from Fiji as he was an agitator interfering with labour, but before the warrant could be served on him he had sailed for Sydney. On arrival in Australia he delivered his famous lectures. If he really wanted to make trouble and add to the discontent there he would have stayed in spite of the warrant and disobeyed it. But he was moderate to a degree, and he carried his ministry of conciliation to the extreme limit.

HARIJANS AND SAVARNAS

As usual there are good and bad items to note in connection with Harijan work. There has been plenty of agitation regarding temple-entry for Harijans in Maharashtra. The Kala Rama Temple in Nasik which was the centre of this agitation is not yet open to the Harijans, nor even the famous temple at Pandharpur where thousands of Harijans go from everywhere and have 'darshan' from a distance. But slowly and silently reform is progressing, and on the 7th of May, 1942, Her Highness the Dowager Maharani Saheba of Kolhapur threw open a newly built temple to the Harijans at Khatgun, a village in Satara District. The village has only a population of 1500, and may be thus regarded as insignificant. But the importance of the event lies in the fact that the inhabitants themselves collected about Rs. 10,000, built the Shri Ram Temple, and in the teeth of the opposition of a few sanatanists had this opened by the Maharani. The Chief of Aundh with his son Appasaheb, Shri Satvalekar, Kakasaheb Barwe, Shri Pandurang Patil and others interested in Harijan welfare and in the uplift and purification of Hindusim were present at the ceremony. The village people made all the arrangements for the reception of the guests and for the huge meeting which was attended by about 10000 people including Harijans from neighbouring villages, and for a bhajan party in the sabha-mandapa of the temple, in which also Harijans took part.

There was, as I have mentioned above, a certain amount of opposition and those who sponsored it tried to scare away the Harijans without much success. But it is now the duty of the reformers who outnumber the orthodox to disarm their opposition, and to win them over by patient persuasion, service, and work among the Harijans.

There is some glad news from Gujarat too. In the Kaira district the District Board has had to close some schools because Harijan children would not be admitted to the schools, and it has been a regular tussle between the orthodox and the workers. News now comes of a village Govindpura — where the Harijan Sevak Sangh has opened a school because there was none, and where the Baraiyas who are generally illiterate and superstitious gladly cooperated by sending their children to the school. The teacher is a Harijan, and the Baraiya children and Harijan children now learn sitting side by side in the school. The school has no building of its own. The inhabitants agreed to build one themselves, the Harijans undertaking to build the mud walls and the Savarna Hindus undertaking to build the rest. Foundation of the school was laid on the 20th of May. Harijans were invited to take part in the ceremony, and prasad was distributed to all including the Harijans and the Harijan priest was garlanded by the Savarnas.

Both the incidents are quite commendable. But when one thinks of the work still to be done one is filled with despair. No major State has yet followed the example of Travancore. Mysore which had in the late Maharaja a ruler noted for his piety and devotional temperament will not yet open its temples to the Harijans. Some of the best known of our shrines are still notorious for their having kept their gods untouchable and unseeable for the Harijans. The orthodox Patidars in some of the villages in Kaira district will not listen to reason and would rather let their children go without education than let them sit side by side with Harijan children in schools. Harijans in the Garhwal district and in parts of Rajputana are not suffered to celebrate their marriages and have marriage processions as any other Hindus can do.

As I am writing this comes a tale of woe from Gujarat.

"On the morning of May 13," says a newspaper report, "a Harijan went to take tea at a Muslim hotel, but as no one was in the hotel, he went to another hotel. When the owner of the first hotel learnt about this, it is alleged, he beat the Harijan mercilessly. Then at about 8 A. M. some Muslims went to the locality of the Harijans and, it is alleged, beat them mercilessly." This if true is a case of Muslims following the Hindus slavishly in their superstitions, and we have none but ourselves to blame for it. Only the other day in a public hotel situated in the compound of a police court in Nagpur district, an educated young man, the son of an ex-M. L. C., who had gone to the court on government work was belaboured by the men in the hotel. He reported the matter to the police, but the owner of the hotel, a government licensee, reported the matter to the Tahsildar who ordered the young man to pay Rs. 5 to the hotel-keeper by way of compensation as he had polluted the hotel!

And may I mention here the scandal of the crematorium at Vile Parle? To exclude dead

Harijans from a crematorium is a much worse sin than to exclude living ones from a hotel. Death ends all hates and should obviously end the hate that there is at the bottom of untouchability. When one thinks of these very dark spots, it becomes difficult to enthuse over the bright ones I have mentioned in this note.

ANTI-BRITISH FEELING

When a man like Kunwar Sir Jagadish Prasad asserts that there is plenty of anti-British feeling among the Indian public, he would not say so lightly, and without good reasons. A correspondent has sent a number of cuttings containing statements by responsible people about racial discrimination against the Indian evacuees from the Malay Peninsula, Singapore and Burma, and the Marwari Relief Society's report has just been published in the newspapers. The correspondent, a highly educated person, asks:

"Apart from non-violence, why talk of cooperation on any terms, in face of insults such as these? Why have to choose the first robber instead of the second who is trying to rob the first? Why choose at all? I am inclined to believe that so long as England is here, there shall be racial discrimination in all its worst forms. Such things bring out the worst in one. Hate is the predominant feeling."

Another correspondent who happened to interview a high placed Indian official with regard to the behaviour of the soldiers sends a report of the talk he had with this official:

"With regard to the question of compensation, he told me that the government were not responsible for the deeds and misdeeds of their servants when off duty, and therefore the question of compensating the victims of the assaults did not arise. I asked him to let me have his answer in writing, particularly his views with regard to compensation and action that the government were taking to check such ugly happenings. But he refused to give me anything in writing and told me that he was not obliged to answer my letter. He even went the length of telling me that agitators were making capital out of such incidents and he tried to compare conditions in this country with conditions in Great Britain where all these tommies were befriended by the people and specially young girls in the streets and cafes in towns and villages of England. He even regretted that the ungrateful people of this country were not providing all the fun and facilities for the soldiers who have come all the way from England to defend and protect our country."

It is things like these that sink and spread the anti-British feeling. If the British withdraw voluntarily, and withdrew their soldiers too who suffer from want of fun and frolic here, this anti-British feeling would vanish and give place to a genuine feeling of friendliness.

DIFFERENCES VERY REAL

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"Your latest advice to the British to withdraw from all Asiatic possessions or at least India is in accord with a general but undefined wish of a good section of the Indian public. Rightly or wrongly that wish is based upon the feeling that but for the Britisher making India the arsenal of his fight against the Axis, Japan may not have good cause for attacking India and will not do so. Even supposing Britain were to accede to this position, you do not suppose that Japan will on no account attack us. Very probably they may, and I am sure they will if only to get control of the vast material resources we have and use the same against their enemy. In which event you have advised non-violent resistance by us, but the Britisher will still carry the war against his enemy into our country (as is now done over the air in Burma, Siam, Indo-China, and occupied Europe) dictated, so they will say, solely by military considerations. None of these troubles may arise if the belligerents accept your method of settling disputes. But I see no near prospect of it nor do you. Meanwhile we may still have war in our midst each side saying that it is absolutely necessary to prevent the other from getting support for his operations. The resultant suffering will be ours and even if we hold on non-violently against the invader, it will not prevent the erstwhile possessor, from showering death and destruction on account of the enemy but all in our land and exactly over our heads. Perhaps Rajaji's attempt to organise a nation-wide resistance to the invader even at the cost of cooperating with the British arms is aimed at avoiding this futility of suffering. Even his method involves suffering, but is it not likely to be accepted more readily and with enthusiasm as being connected with the sole desire for preserving freedom and independence from aggression? It may also be that he feels that during and by that actual operation of mutual cooperation there may arise on our side a greater strength to achieve our independence and on their side a real appreciation of that strength and induce a feeling that it would serve no purpose to refuse the Indian demand any longer. . . . I should entreat you to let me know if I am correct in the above analysis and if so it does not reveal a fundamental difference between you and Rajaji in this critical hour of our history. In which event, you alone can show us the good and real way out, without futile suffering."

This is a very cogent letter from a friend who is most anxious to bridge the political gulf between Rajaji and me. But it cannot be by any make-believé. On the contrary any make-believe will mislead the country and serve neither his immediate purpose nor mine. We love the country with an equal passion. But our modes of service for the time being are diametrically opposite. He believes in resisting the threatened Japanese attack with the British aid. I regard this as impossible in the long end. India is not the home of the British people. If they are overwhelmed they will retire from India every man and woman and child, if they have facilities enough to carry them, even as they retired from Singapore, Malaya and Rangoon. This is no reflection on them or their bravery. Every army would have done likewise. But most probably from India they will not take with them the Indian army. They will perhaps expect them to carry on the battle by themselves. No doubt they would try to harrass the Japanese army if they can from outside. So there would be no difference in the position imagined by my correspondent and what I have adumbrated. Only under my plan what is contemplated is an orderly withdrawal by the British as if it was a premeditated military movement which will, let us assume, please millions of Indians. Then the hated British will become esteemed friends and allies. They will operate in concert with their allies the Indians even as they would, say, with the Chinese. The whole thing becomes natural and a mighty force is voluntarily available to the British and to us. Add to this the moral height which Britain will occupy.

As for communal unity, the third party being removed unity will follow as day follows night. Unity will not precede but will succeed freedom. Today we do not even know that the goal of the Congress and the League is one. And you cannot bribe the League to cooperate for independence. Either the League believes that India is as much the home of Muslims as of non-Muslims, or it does not. If it does, it must first free the home from bondage before partitioning it. To-day there is nothing to partition. After ridding the home of the foreign occupant, it can demand partition if it wishes and get it by negotiation or force. However, if it does not believe in India being the home of the Muslims, there is no question of negotiations for freeing India from bondage.

Rajaji's plan is, in my opinion, wholly unnatural. He wants to thrust himself on the British power which does not want him, for as the possessor by right of conquest it gets all it wants. In order to thrust himself on the British he gives the League the right of self-determination which every single individual has whether the others recognise it or not. Rajaji does not like partition and hugs the belief that his superfluous recognition of the inherent right will enable him to avoid partition.

I advise my correspondent not to worry over our differences. We know and love each other enough to let time correct the error, whether it lies on my side or his. Meanwhile a frank and bold admission of differences and their exact nature makes for healthy education of public opinion. What is needed is avoidance of anger and intolerance, the twin enemies of correct understanding.

UNFAIR TO AMERICA?

Proceeding evidently on Reuters' summary of Gandhiji's statement about America during the interview he gave to the Bombay press, The Sunday Despatch of London sent Gandhiji the following cable:

"You are reported as saying that America could have kept out of the war if she had wished. How can you justify such a statement in view of the fact that while at peace America was attacked by the Japanese who simultaneously declared war on her."

To this Gandhiji sent the following reply:

"Cable just received. Evidently you have not my full statement. Part relating to America runs thus: 'I know that I have no right to criticise such a big nation. I don't know all the facts which have determined America to throw herself into the cauldron. But somehow or other opinion has forced itself on me that America could have remained out and even now she can do so if she divests herself of intoxication that her immense wealth has produced. And here I would like to repeat what I have said about the withdrawal of the British power from India. Both America and Britain lack the moral basis for engaging in this war unless they put their own houses in order by making it their fixed determination to withdraw their influence and power both from Africa and Asia and removed the colour bar. They have no right to talk of protecting democracy and protecting civilisation and human freedom until the canker of white superiority is destroyed in its entirety.' I adhere to that statement. How America could have avoided war I cannot answer except by recommending non-violent method. My American friendships had led me to build high hope on American contribution to peace. America is too big financially, intellectually, and in scientific skill, to be subdued by any nation or even combination. Hence my tears over her throwing herself in cauldron."

In war it is not always the first act of aggression that determines the causes of the war. That act becomes the occasion, but it is always the result of a series of events preceding it. The murder of the Austrian Crown Prince at Serajevo was but the matchstick that exploded the powder magazine in 1914, but the powder magazine had been getting ready for years before the war. The first act of aggression in America's war with Japan was certainly Japan's, but was that the cause? Rev. John Haynes Holmes who tendered his resignation as pastor of the community church in New York in December last, because he could not use his ministry "to bless, sanction, or support war", said in the course of his last sermon announcing his resignation: "The American people were not guiltless in a war which was the final outrage to the will of God... We have our share of guilt in this disaster. Ours is a war world, to which we have consented and in which we have participated, and this is what happens in such a world."

Evidently Rev. Holmes had better data before him than Gandhiji and so he had no hesitation in proclaiming to the world America's guilt.

ALCHEMY OF PRODUCING FOOD

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Below will be found an extract from a letter of the Hon. Secretary of Maiwari Relief Society Social Service Department:

"We are on the threshold of an acute food shortage crisis today. A good deal is being heard of the "grow more food" campaign, and it is no doubt a move in the right direction. But in my humble opinion, our leaders have not given due consideration to one considerable potential source of food supply in our country, which if successfully tapped, would feed at least 50 lakhs of our starving fellow-men. I refer the tremendous waste of food that every one of us in this country indulges in, when taking our meals morning and evening and also the disgraceful waste that is usually seen on festive occasions. The aggregate amount thus thrown into the dustbins could easily keep 5 millions of our countrymen from a perpetual state of semi-starvation. While passing along the streets of Calcutta, I have been shocked to find my own brothers and sisters picking up rotten food from the dustbins and eating it. The thought of such a ghastly scene which can be described as nothing short of a national disgrace has haunted me day and night and I have felt ashamed to take my food at home."

The Secretary further asks me to suggest ways and means of organising a campaign popularising the plan suggested in the letter. The plan I can heartily recommend. All the belligerent countries have been forced to cut off food supplies all round. There is naturally therefore not much scope for wastage in these countries. In our country seemingly we are not reduced to the straits to which the belligerent countries are reduced. In reality, however, the wastage which is truly enormous is confined to the few within the cities. The millions are living in a state of perpetual semi-starvation. For them it is like living in a chronic state of war. Day in and day out they know not what a square meal is. For them who have no margin the pressure of the present war can better be imagined than described.

What the Secretary suggests is worthy of consideration. A campaign against waste can be easily organised in all the cities. No householder should be without the knowledge of how he or she can avoid waste. There is here no question of denial. The question is only one of consideration for the poor. All saving thus made will be equal to so much food production without effort. There will have to be literature on the subject. It should not be elaborate. Leaflets should suffice. They must not be argumentative. By facts and figures they should tell the citizens how much waste they are responsible for and how they can avoid it. The horrible superstition that the dishes of the rich should always be over-full so as to leave an ample margin for leavings should be banished forthwith. It should be considered a sign of bad breeding to leave one's plate with a heap of uneaten things, whether at home or in a hotel. One should regulate the helpings with strict regard to wants. If all who are given to the evil habit of having plates piled up and merely sampling the courses served out were to follow the healthy rule here recommended much food can be saved for distribution among those who are in daily want. I think the Marwari Relief Society which has had rich and varied experience in social service is perhaps the fittest body to take the initiative in organising the work. Though the problem will be much the same in all the cities, with every city there will be variations according to people's habits. I suggest, therefore, that the work is begun in Calcutta. The experience gained there could be utilised in extending the scope of service. It ought not to take more than a week to organise the work in Calcutta. Naturally great concentration of energy and a large body of willing workers will be required for this essential and urgent service.

TOWARDS DESTRUCTION

An innocuous little note on how common folk can do uncommon things has brought to me a sheaf of letters. A correspondent—a student—is profusely thankful that I wrote that note for it has helped him in giving up tobacco. Others have written angrily citing instances of leaders who set a bad example to the public. They forget that I was primarily concerned with citing an instance of an ordinary man having overcome a harmful habit, and not with instances of those who had tried and failed. I would now like to drive the lesson further home by citing two or three instances of well-known men who gave up the habit in the twinkling of an eye. The late Deenabandhu Andrews was one; Mr. Hermann Kallenbach, of Johannesburg, is another; and nearer home is the shining example of Sardar Vallabhbhai. He was once a chain smoker, and used to consume a tin of 50 every day. He began reducing the number until he refrained from smoking in public or in the presence of people. One fine morning in March 1930 he was arrested at Kaira, and was being taken by the police chief to Sabarmati Jail. The Chief was friendly and offered him a cigarette. The Sardar politely declined and said: "Of course you offer it as you know I smoke. But I smoke no more." Boxes of cigars and cigarettes sent by friends through the Superintendent of the Jail were returned. And he has not touched tobacco since.

All that is needed is the knowledge that it is a destructive habit and the will to give it up. If any more evidence is needed on the destructive quality of the drug, here is the testimony of Havelock Ellis, the scientist, sent me by a correspondent:

"Another such ambivalent test is the consumption of luxuries of which alcohol and tobacco are the types. There is held to be no surer test of civilisation than the increase per head of the consumption of alcohol and tobacco. Yet alcohol and tobacco are recognisably poisons, so that their consumption has only to be carried far enough to destroy civilisation altogether."

II

At Tedderfield and Newby we were hardly 40 miles from the Anglo-Scottish border. But we must now proceed farther afield and observe the rural scene in the extreme north of Scotland. Here, as we are informed by Mr. Russell Montague Garnier in the Annals of the British Peasantry, the labourer had no necessity to spend his money on clothes as long as he possessed a wife and a few sheep.

"He did not even require money for procuring the machinery for manufacturing his clothing. Any fellow with moderate dexterity could cut what he wanted out of the nearest wood. In Eden's days the ancient beart or loom was still used for the weaving of broad gaiters and belts... The cuigel or distaff... could be worked from an elbow chair or low stool, by mere children... He had encountered old women in his walks abroad, spindle in hand, distaff in girdle, proving to his delight that 'Still froe the russet lap the spindle plays.'

"Many a shepherd and cotter, with wife and children, appeared at kirk 'neat, tidy and even fine', in clothes which, from the time the stuff of which they were made was sown in the flax ground, shorn from the sheep or cut from the cow's hide, had been touched by no hand but their own.

".....A seaped shirt was washed with soap home made, generally of hog's dung; other garments with chamber ley. I doubt if in many parts where wages were still paid in kind, a coin was ever exchanged the whole year through for any necessary of life.

"Every Highland peasant made out of his home-tanned leather, shoes of astonishing elegance and strength, sewn by himself with thongs of calf skin.

"I will end it [this chapter] by showing how easily the Highland housewife dispensed with most of these so-called resources of civilization. Except the awl, needle, thimble, dyeing cauldron and a few bits of iron work for the weaving shed, all implements and materials were manufactured on the spot. Trees, shrubs and herbs furnished the various ingredients of the dye pot and every want in life was supplied with those hands and feet which the English statute book some three centuries earlier had preferred to all the cunning contrivances of machinery. Truly there was a modicum of method in the madness of that machinery destroyer, Ned Ludd and his poor deluded followers after all—only they, unlike most reformers, had come into the world a few centuries too late.

"Even at the present time we can, if we journey up into the Highlands, see the cottage factory still in its perfection. Only the other day I asked my boatman in the Cromarty firth if anything he wore was of home manufacture, and he astonished me when he replied that his blue tweed suit, cap, shirt, stockings and boots were all made during the silent night watches by himself and his dexterous spouse." ## FREE INDIA CAN HELP BEST

Answering to the question of a press correspondent whether his present policy as revealed by his writings did not vitiate his own declaration that he was a friend of China, Gandhiji said: "My answer is an emphatic 'no'."

"I remain the passionate friend of China that I have always claimed to be. I know what loss of freedom means. Therefore, I could not but be in sympathy with China which is my next-door neighbour in distress. And, if I believed in violence and if I could influence India, I would put in motion every force at my command on behalf of China to save her liberty. In making, therefore, the suggestion which I have made about withdrawal of British power, I have not lost sight of China. But because I have China in mind, I feel that the only effective way for India to help China is to persuade Great Britain to free India and let a free India make her full contribution to the war effort. Instead of being sullen and discontented, India free will be a mighty force for the good of mankind in general. It is true that the solution I have presented is a heroic solution beyond the ken of Englishmen. But being a true friend of Britain and China and Russia, I must not suppress the solution which I believe to be eminently practical and probably the only one in order to save the situation and in order to convert the war into a power for good instead of being what it is, a peril to humanity."

"I am Not Pro-Japanese"

"Pandit Nehru told me yesterday that he heard people in Lahore and Delhi saying that I have turned pro-Japanese. I could only laugh at the suggestion, for, if I am sincere in my passion for freedom, I could not consciously or unconsciously take a step which will involve India in the position of merely changing masters. If, in spite of my resistance to the Japanese menace with my whole soul, the mishap occurs, of which I have never denied the possibility, then the blame would rest wholly on British shoulders. I have no shadow of doubt about it. I have made no suggestion which, even from the military standpoint, is fraught with the slightest danger to British power or to Chinese. It is obvious that India is not allowed to pull her weight in favour of China. If British power is withdrawn from India in an orderly manner, Britain will be relieved of the burden of keeping the peace in India and at the same time gain in a free India an ally not in the cause of Empire—because she would have renounced in toto all her imperial designs, but in a defence, not pretended but wholly real, of human freedom. That I assert and that only is the burden of my recent writings and I shall continue to do so so long as I am allowed by the British power."

No Secrecy

"Now what about your plan; you are reported to have matured plans for launching some big offensive?" was the next question. Gandhiji replied: "Well, I have never believed in secrecy nor do I do so now. There are certainly many plans floating in my brain. But just now I merely allow them to float in my brain. My first task is to educate the public mind in India and world opinion, in so far as I am allowed to do so. And when I have finished that process to my satisfaction, I may have to do something. That something may be very big, if the Congress is with me and the people are with me. But British authority will have a full knowledge of anything I may wish to do before I enforce it. Remember I have yet to see the Maulana Sahib. My talks with Pandit Nehru are yet unfinished. I may say that they were wholly of a friendly nature and we have come nearer to each other even with the unfinished talk of yesterday. Naturally I want to carry the whole of the Congress with me if I can, as I want to carry the whole of India with me. For my conception of freedom is no narrow conception. It is co-extensive with the freedom of man in all his majesty. I shall, therefore, take no step without the fullest deliberation."

TO RESIST SLAVE DRIVERS

The Rashtriya Yuvak Sangha of the C. P. Province have been having their annual in Wardha for some time. They are to finish it on 30th. They were anxious to have Gandhiji in their midst, even if it was for a few minutes. He therefore invited them to come to Sevagram. And a hundred of them walked four miles to have a talk with him at 6-15 in the morning. Gandhiji gave them a little over half an hour. The talk was in Hindustani. The following is the substance of the talk. It was in the nature of questions and answers.

"How are we to help in driving away the British from here?" was the first question that was asked.

"We don't want to drive away the British people from here. It is the British rulers whom we are asking quietly to withdraw. It is the British domination that we want to vanish from our land. We have no quarrel with the Englishmen, many of whom are my friends, but we want the rule to end altogether, for that is the poison that corrupts all it touches, that is the obstacle that stops all progress."

"And what is needed for this are two things—the knowledge that the domination is a greater evil than any other evil that we can think of, and that we have to get rid of it no matter what it may cost. The knowledge is so necessary because the British exercise their power and domination in all kinds of subtle and insidious ways that it is sometimes difficult to know that we are bound hand and foot. Next is the will to throw off the chains. We have simply to cultivate the will not to do the rulers' bidding. Is it very difficult? How can one be compelled to accept slavery? I simply refuse to do the master's bidding. He may torture me, break my bones to atoms, and even kill me. He will then have my dead body, not my obedience. Ultimately, therefore, it is I who am the victor and not he, for he has failed in getting me to do what he wanted done."

"That is what I am trying to impress both on those whom I want to retire and those who are bound in their chains. I am going to use all my powers to do so, but not violence—simply because I have no faith in it.

"Two forces of the same type are ranged against each other in the present war. We do not know what will be the upshot. At the present moment, the upshot is mutual destruction of life and property, and destruction not alone of the combatants but of innocent non-combatants. I do not want for our country this power of destruction that we find having full play. I do not want the power of a Hitler, I want the power of a free peasant. I have been trying to identify myself with the peasants all these years, but have not yet succeeded in doing so. What however differentiates me from the kisan today is that he is a kisan and a labourer not by choice but by force of circumstances. I want to be a kisan and a labourer by choice and when I can make him also a kisan and a labourer by choice, I can also enable him to throw off the shackles that keep him bound today and that compel him to do the master's bidding.

"For you to achieve identification with them, you have of course got to be able-bodied—not athletes like Sandow, but able to do all the body-labour that comes the peasant's way during his day's work. A Sandow may have a beautiful physique, but may not be able to carry a headload from here to Wardha in the heat of the sun—which a peasant here can do. We want a physical frame that can endure the sun and the rain and can stand any amount of labour. We want also the will to resist. We want to build up the muscles of the body, but we also want to build up the muscles of the will and the intellect.

"For that will enable us to do our part in the fight that is in front of us. But I am going to be patient, I am not going to hurry or hustle you. I am busy preparing the atmosphere, and whatever I will do I shall do having in view the limitations of our people. I know that neither the rulers nor public opinion understand the implications of my proposal."

"But", asked a friend, "have we not to see that the remedy may not be worse than the disease? There will be, in the course of the resistance, in spite of all our will to prevent them, clashes and resultant anarchy. May not that anarchy be worse than the present anarchy which you have called ordered anarchy?"

"That is a very proper question. That is the consideration that has weighed with me all these 22 years. I waited and waited until the country should develop the non-violent strength necessary to throw off the foreign yoke. But my attitude has now undergone a change. I feel that I cannot afford to wait. If I continue to wait I might have to wait till doomsday. For the preparation that I have prayed for and worked for may never come, and in the meantime I may be enveloped and overwhelmed by the flames that threaten all of us. That is why I have decided that even at certain risks which are obviously involved I must ask the people to resist the slavery. But even that readiness, let me assure you, depends on the non-violent man's unflinching faith. All I am conscious of is that there is not a trace of violence in the remotest corner of my being, and my conscious pursuit of ahimsa for the last 50 years cannot possibly fail me at this crisis. The people have not my ahimsa, but mine should help them. There is ordered anarchy around and about us. I am sure that the anarchy that may result because of the British withdrawal or their refusal to listen to us and our decision to defy their authority will in no way be worse than the present anarchy. After all, those who are unarmed cannot produce a frightful amount of violence or anarchy, and I have a faith that out of that anarchy may arise pure non-violence. But to be passive witness of the terrible violence that is going on, of the terrible anarchy that is going on in the name of resisting a possible foreign aggression, is a thing I cannot stand. It is a thing that would make me ashamed of my ahimsa. It is made of sterner stuff.

"I know that what I am saying today is not easy to understand. Language is but a poor vehicle of one's thoughts. What I have said is bound to suffer from the limitations of that vehicle. But I want you to ponder coolly over what I have been saying and writing, and perhaps you will be able to understand me. I am also sure that those who cannot or will not understand me will do so in the light of experience, i. e. if they survive the present catastrophe."

AN IMPORTANT INTERVIEW

The heat here this year has been uncommonly oppressive, and even those who may be said to be inured to it have felt it. But Gandhiji would not listen to any suggestion of moving to a cooler place—so possessed he is of his new idea, so disinclined he is to go to any other place but the environment that has now become part of himself. And though this serious preoccupation leaves him little time to meet people, he has willingly met press correspondents and opened his heart out to them. They too in their turn have come in this sweltering heat, but that is a pressman's job—to defy wind and weather and wrest facts out of events. So one hot afternoon two American journalists came—Mr. Chaplin of the International News Service, America, and Mr. Belldon representing the Life and Time. The latter is fresh from China and Burma. Both had heard rumours in New Delhi that Gandhiji might soon be arrested, and they naturally did not want to be forestalled. So they came post-haste, without even waiting for a reply giving them an appointment.

It was no joke jogging along in a rickety tonga through the treeless road that runs between Wardha and Sevagram. Gandhiji immediately put them in a good humour. "You came in an air-conditioned coach?" "No," they said, "but we had armed ourselves with some ice." Mr. Chaplin said he was a great friend of the late Jim Mills and that revived our memories of that genial American who, Gandhiji said, after the manner of American journalists, often embellished truth to make it look nicer. Mr. Chaplin demurred to the generalisation, and said they were quite careful about truth. Gandhiji did not mean to suggest that they deliberately mixed untruth with truth; they loved to give truth an attractive, if imaginative, background, as, for instance, Jim Mills described Gandhiji sharing his goat's milk with a tame cat, when there was no cat in the picture. "The native genius" of Americans, John Buchan has said, "is for overstatement, a high-coloured, imaginative, paradoxical extravagance. The British gift is for understatement. Both are legitimate figures of speech. They serve the same purpose, for they call attention to a fact by startling the hearer, for manifestly they are not the plain truth." There, I think, is a just estimate of American journalists.

Gandhiji had just emerged from an intensive talk with another American when these friends came, and so he said greeting them, "one American has been vivisectioning me. I am now at your disposal."

Why Non-violent Non-Cooperation?

They had read all kinds of things about Gandhiji's latest move—his own words wrenched from their context, and words written about him. "It is your worst side that is known in New Delhi, and not your best," another journalist had said to Gandhiji, and they were therefore anxious to straighten out wrong notions if they had any. Why non-violent non-cooperation, rather than honest straightforward resistance against the Japanese? Far from preventing the Japanese, non-violent non-cooperation, they feared, might prove an invitation to them, and would not that be flying from the frying pan into the fire?

Gandhiji put a counter-question in reply:

"Supposing England retires from India for strategic purposes, and apart from my proposal,—as they had to do in Burma—what would happen? What would India do?"

"That is exactly what we have come to learn from you. We would certainly like to know that."

"Well, therein comes my non-violence. For we have no weapons. Mind you, we have assumed that the Commander-in-Chief of the united American and British Armies has decided that India is no good as a base, and that they should withdraw to some other base and concentrate the allied forces there. We can't help it. We have then to depend on what strength we have. We have no army, no military resources, no military skill either, worth the name, and non-violence is the only thing we can fall back upon. Now in theory I can prove to you that our non-violent resistance can be wholly successful. We need not kill a single Japanese, we simply give them no quarter."

"But that non-violence can't prevent an invasion?"

"In non-violent technique, of course, there can be nothing like preventing an invasion. They will land, but they will land on an inhospitable shore. They may be ruthless and wipe out all the 400 millions. That would be complete victory. I know you will laugh at it, saying 'all this is superhuman, if not absurd'. I would say you are right, we may not be able to stand that terror and we may have to go through a course of subjection worse than our present state. But we are discussing the theory."

"But if the British don't withdraw?"

"I do not want them to withdraw under Indian pressure, nor driven by force of circumstances. I want them to withdraw in their own interest, for their own good name."

"But what happens to your movement, if you are arrested, as we heard you might be? Or if Mr. Nehru is arrested? Would not the movement go to pieces?"

"No, not if we have worked among the people. Our arrests would work up the movement, they would stir every one in India to do his little bit."

"Supposing Britain decides to fight to the last man in India, would not your non-violent non-cooperation help the Japanese?" asked Mr. Chaplin reverting to the first question he had asked.

"If you mean non-cooperation with the British, you would be right. We have not come to that stage. I do not want to help the Japanese—not even for freeing India. India during the past fifty or more years of her struggle for freedom has learnt the lesson of patriotism and of not bowing to any foreign power. But when the British are offering violent battle, our non-violent battle—our non-violent activity—would be neutralised. Those who believe in armed resistance and in helping the British militarily are and will be helping them. Mr. Amery says he is getting all the men and money they need, and he is right. For the Congress—a poor organisation representing the millions of the poor of India—has not been able to collect in years what they have collected in a day by way of what I would say 'so-called' voluntary subscription. This Congress can only render non-violent assistance. But let me tell you, if you do not know it, that the British do not want it, they don't set any store by it. But whether they do it or not, violent and non-violent resistance cannot go together. So India's non-violence can at best take the form of silence—not obstructing the British forces, certainly not helping the Japanese."

"But not helping the British?"

"Don't you see non-violence cannot give any other aid?"

"But the railways, I hope, you won't stop; the services, too, will be, I hope, allowed to function."

"They will be allowed to function, as they are being allowed today."

"Aren't you then helping the British by leaving the services and the railways alone?" asked Mr. Belldon.

"We are indeed. That is our non-embarrassment policy."

A Bad Job

"But what about the presence of American troops here? Every American feels that we should help India to win her freedom."

"It's a bad job."

"Because it is said we are here really to help Britain and not India?"

"I say it is a bad job, because it is an imposition on India. It is not at India's request or with India's consent that they are here. It is enough irritation that we were not consulted before being dragged into this war—I am not sure that the Viceroy even consulted his Executive Council. That is our original complaint. To have brought the American forces is, in my opinion, to have made the stranglehold on us all the tighter."

"You do not know what is happening in India—it is naturally not your business to go into those things. But let me give you some facts. Thousands of villagers are being summarily asked to vacate their homes and go elsewhere, for the site of their homesteads is needed by the military. Now I ask, where are they to go? Thousands of poor labourers in a certain place, I have heard today, have been asked to evacuate. Paltry compensations are offered them, and they are not even given sufficient notice. This kind of thing will not happen in an independent country. The Sappers and Miners there would first build homes for these people, transport would be provided for them, they would be given at least six months' maintenance allowance before they would be uprooted from their surroundings. Are these things to happen, even before the Japanese have come here? There is no other way, but saying to them, 'you must go', and if British rule ends, that moral act will save America and Britain. If they choose to remain here, they should remain as friends, not as proprietors of India. The American and British soldiers may remain here, if at all, by virtue of a compact with Free India."

"Don't you think Indian people and leaders have some duty to help accelerate the process?"

"You mean by dotting India with rebellions everywhere? No, my invitation to the British to withdraw is not an idle one. It has to be made good by the sacrifice of the inviters. Public opinion has got to act, and it can act only non-violently."

"Is the possibility of strikes precluded?" wondered Mr. Belldon.

"No", said Gandhiji, "strikes can be and have been non-violent. If railways are worked only to strengthen the British hold on India, they need not be assisted. But before I decide to take any energetic measures I must endeavour to show the reasonableness of my demand. The moment it is complied with, India instead of being sullen becomes an ally. Remember I am more interested than the British in keeping the Japanese out. For Britain's defeat in Indian waters may mean only the loss of India, but if Japan wins India loses everything."

The Crucial Test

"If you regard the American troops as an imposition, would you regard the American Technical Mission also in the same light?" was the next question.

"A tree is judged by its fruit", said Gandhiji succinctly. "I have met Dr. Grady, we have had cordial talks. I have no prejudice against Americans. I have hundreds, if not thousands of friends, in America. The Technical Mission may have nothing but good will for India. But my point is that all the things that are happening are not happening at the invitation or wish of India. Therefore they are all suspect. We cannot look upon them with philosophic calmness, for the simple reason that we cannot close our eyes, as I have said, to the things that are daily happening in front of our eyes. Areas are being vacated and turned into military camps, people being thrown on their own resources. Hundreds, if not thousands, on their way from Burma perished without food and drink, and the wretched discrimination stared even these miserable people in the face. One route for the whites, another for the blacks. Provision of food and shelter for the whites, none for the blacks! And discrimination even on their arrival in India! India is being ground down to dust and humiliated, even before the Japanese advent, not for India's defence—and no one knows for whose defence. And so one fine morning I came to the decision to make this honest demand: 'For Heaven's sake leave India alone. Let us breathe the air of freedom. It may choke us, suffocate us, as it did the slaves on their emancipation. But I want the present sham to end.'

"But it is the British troops you have in mind, not the American?"

"It does not make for me the slightest difference, the whole policy is one and indivisible."

"Is there any hope of Britain listening?"

"I will not die without that hope. And if there is a long lease of life for me, I may even see it fulfilled. For there is nothing unpractical in the proposal, no insuperable difficulties about it. Let me add that if Britain is not willing to do so wholeheartedly Britain does not deserve to win."

What Would Free India Do?

Gandhiji had over and over again said that an orderly withdrawal would result in a sullen India becoming a friend and ally. These American friends now explored the implications of that possible friendship: "Would a Free India declare war against Japan?"

"Free India need not do so. It simply becomes the ally of the Allied Powers, simply out of gratefulness for the payment of a debt, however overdue. Human nature thanks the debtor when he discharges the debt."

"How then would this alliance fit in with India's non-violence?"

"It is a good question. The whole of India is not non-violent. If the whole of India had been non-violent, there would have been no need for my appeal to Britain, nor would there be any fear of a Japanese invasion. But my non-violence is represented possibly by a hopeless minority, or perhaps by India's dumb millions who are temperamentally non-violent. But there too the question may be asked: 'What have they done?' They have done nothing, I agree; but they may act when the supreme test comes, and they may not. I have no non-violence of millions to present to Britain, and what we have has been discounted by the British as non-violence of the weak. And so all I have done is to make this appeal on the strength of bare inherent justice, so that it might find an echo in the British heart. It is made from a moral plane, and even as they do not hesitate to act desperately in the physical field and take grave risks, let them for once act desperately on the moral field and declare that India is independent today, irrespective of India's demand."

What about Muslims?

"But what does a free India mean, if, as Mr. Jinnah said, Muslims will not accept Hindu rule?"

"I have not asked the British to hand over India to the Congress or to the Hindus. Let them entrust India to God or in modern parlance to anarchy. Then all the parties will fight one another like dogs, or will, when real responsibility faces them, come to a reasonable agreement. I shall expect non-violence to arise out of that chaos."

"But whom are the British to say—'India is free'?" asked the friends with a certain degree of exasperation.

"To the world", said Gandhiji without a moment's hesitation. "Automatically the Indian army is disbanded from that moment, and they decide to pack up as soon as they can. Or they may declare they would pack up only after the war is over, but that they would expect no help from India, impose no taxes, raise no recruits—beyond what help India chooses to give voluntarily. British rule will cease from that moment, no matter what happens to India afterwards. Today it is all a hypocrisy, unreality. I want that to end. The new order will come only when that falsity ends."

"It is an unwarranted claim Britain and America are making", said Gandhiji concluding the talk, "the claim of saving democracy and freedom. It is a wrong thing to make that claim, when there is this terrible tragedy of holding a whole nation in bondage."

Q. What can America do to have your demand implemented?

A. If my demand is admitted to be just beyond cavil, America can insist on the implementing of the Indian demand as a condition of her financing Britain and supplying her with her matchless skill in making war machines. He who pays the piper has the right to call the tune. Since America has become the predominant partner in the allied cause she is partner also in Britain's guilt. The Allies have no right to call their cause to be morally superior to the Nazi cause so long as they hold in custody the fairest part and one of the most ancient nations of the earth.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A friend was discussing with me the implications of the new proposal. As the discussion was naturally desultory, I asked him to frame his questions which I would answer through Harijan. He agreed and gave me the following:

1. Q. You ask the British Government to withdraw immediately from India. Would Indians thereupon form a national Government, and what groups or parties would participate in such an Indian Government?

A. My proposal is one-sided, i. e. for the British Government to act upon, wholly irrespective of what Indians would do or would not do. I have even assumed temporary chaos on their withdrawal. But if the withdrawal takes place in an orderly manner, it is likely that on their withdrawal a provisional Government will be set up by and from among the present leaders. But another thing may also happen. All those who have no thought of the nation but only of themselves may make a bid for power and get together the turbulent forces with which they would seek to gain control somewhere and somehow. I should hope that with the complete, final and honest withdrawal of the British power, the wise leaders will realise their responsibility, forget their differences for the moment and set up a provisional Government out of the material left by the British power. As there would be no power regulating the admission or rejection of parties or persons to or from the council board, restraint alone will be the guide. If that happens probably the Congress, the League and the States representatives will be allowed to function and they will come to a loose understanding on the formation of a provisional national Government. All this is necessarily guesswork and nothing more.

2. Q. Would that Indian national Government permit the United Nations to use Indian territory as a base of military operations against Japan and other Axis powers?

A. Assuming that the national Government is formed and if it answers my expectations, its first act would be to enter into a treaty with the United Nations for defensive operations against aggressive powers, it being common cause that India will have nothing to do with any of the Fascist powers and India would be morally bound to help the United Nations.

3. Q. What further assistance would this Indian national Government be ready to render the United Nations in the course of the present war against the Fascist aggressors?

A. If I have any hand in guiding the imagined national Government, there would be no further assistance save the toleration of the United Nations on the Indian soil under well-defined conditions. Naturally there will be no prohibition against any Indian giving his own personal help by way of being a recruit <sup>or</sup> <sub>and</sub> of giving financial aid. It should be understood that the Indian army has been disbanded with the withdrawal of British power. Again if I have any say in the councils of the national Government, all its power, prestige and resources would be used towards bringing about world peace. But of course after the formation of the national Government my voice may be a voice in the wilderness and nationalist India may go war-mad.

4. Q. Do you believe this collaboration between India and the Allied powers might or should be formulated in a treaty of alliance or an agreement for mutual aid?

A. I think the question is altogether premature and in any case it will not much matter whether the relations are regulated by treaty or agreement. I do not even see any difference.

Let me sum up my attitude. One thing and only one thing for me is solid and certain. This unnatural prostration of a great nation—it is neither 'nations' nor 'peoples'—must cease if the victory of the Allies is to be ensured. They lack the moral basis. I see no difference between the Fascist or Nazi powers and the Allies. All are exploiters, all resort to ruthlessness to the extent required to compass their end. America and Britain are very great nations, but their greatness will count as dust before the bar of dumb humanity, whether African or Asiatic. They and they alone have the power to undo the wrong. They have no right to talk of human liberty and all else unless they have washed their hands clean of the pollution. That necessary wash will be their surest insurance of success, for they will have the good wishes—unexpressed but no less certain—of millions of dumb Asiatics and Africans. Then, but not till then, will they be fighting for a new order. This is the reality. All else is speculation. I have allowed myself, however, to indulge in it as a test of my bona fides and for the sake of explaining in a concrete manner what I mean by my proposal.

No Salvation without Sacrifice

Accounts pour in upon me from all quarters about the action of the authorities demanding evacuation without notice. Sometimes it is a zamindar who is to surrender his bungalow and sometimes it is a middle class man who has to surrender his house with fans and furniture for the use of the military. More often it is villagers or labourers who are called upon under promise of compensation to vacate their quarters. The condition of these people is piteous. They do not know where to go. To these I can only say, 'Do not move and take the consequence.' They cannot be forcibly ejected. Even if they are, their cry will be heard whereas newspaper articles will be of little avail.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Princes' Determination

Q. The Princes seem to be determined to maintain their privileges even after the departure of the British. Therefore there is need for a plain declaration that they would have no place in a Free India. My feeling is that you have so far shown them more consideration than they deserve.

A. If you are right in your judgment, the privileges themselves will destroy the Princes. Privileges that service of the people bestows will always persist. But most of the paraphernalia that 'pomp and circumstance' account for will most certainly go.

But I cannot make the declaration you will have me to make. It is contrary to the spirit of non-violence which seeks not to destroy but to purify. That which is beyond purification dies without any outside effort even as a body which has become wholly diseased dies.

If after the total withdrawal of the British power, there is found to be no awakening among the masses India will be split up into so many feudal strongholds each striving to swallow the small fry and some bidding for overlordship. What I am hoping and striving for is an irresistible mass urge on the part of the people and an intelligent response on the part of all privileged classes to the popular demand. But because I know that this picture is for the time being imaginary, I am quite prepared for the worst. Hence my statement that I would end the present state of things even at the risk of anarchy reigning supreme in the land.

Sevagram, 5-6-42

If They Come

Q. (1) If the Japs come, how are we to resist them non-violently?

(2) What are we to do if we fall into their hands?

A. (1) These questions come from Andhradesh where the people rightly or wrongly feel that the attack is imminent. My answer has already been given in these columns. Neither food nor shelter is to be given nor are any dealings to be established with them. They should be made to feel that they are not wanted. But of course things are not going to happen quite so smoothly as the question implies. It is a superstition to think that they will come as friendlies. No attacking party has ever done so. It spreads fire and brimstone among the populace. It forces things from people. If the people cannot resist fierce attack and are afraid of death, they should evacuate the infested place in order to deny compulsory service to the enemy.

(2) If unfortunately some people are captured or fall into the enemy's hands, they are likely to be shot if they do not obey orders, e. g. render forced labour. If the captives face death cheerfully, their task is done. They have saved their own and their country's honour. They could have done nothing more if they had offered violent resistance, save perhaps taking a few Japanese lives and inviting terrible reprisals.

The thing becomes complicated when you are captured alive and subjected to unthinkable tortures to compel submission. You will neither submit to torture nor to the orders of the enemy. In the act of resistance you will probably die and escape humiliation. But it is said that death is prevented to let the victim go through the agony of tortures and to serve as an example to others. I however think that a person who would die rather than go through inhuman tortures would find honourable means of dying.

CASUAL NOTES

Falsehood in War-time

At the end of this war some one like Mr. Ponsonby will have to write the second volume of Falsehood in War-time. Many of the discoveries of the falsehoods will be after the termination of the war, but some can be found out even during the war—they are so painfully patent. Thus, for instance, the Governor of Burma who is now having a "well-earned" rest in Simla made a pompous statement on arrival in India. He declared that there was no "considerable disloyalty among Burmans", that "the Japanese are unable to get a single Burman of any weight to join their side", and that "there is not a single Burman Quisling and I am proud of it."

One wonders who then were the people described as "Burman traitors" in despatches from Burma. General Wavell did admit that there was a certain amount of Burman betrayal, and now General Alexander has given the lie direct to Sir Dorman-Smith. The Japanese, he said, were helped "by pro-Japanese Burmans", that though they were not more than ten per cent of the population, their number was the same as those who were pro-British, and they were better "organised and active agents" than the latter.

Regarding "Quislings" one would like to know from Sir Dorman-Smith the whereabouts and the present occupation of his Ministers—how many came with him from Burma, how many remained there and why, and whether any one has gone over to the enemy.

Disastrous Admissions

But we are not so much concerned about proving the falsehood of the Burma Governor's statements as to draw pointed attention to some of the obvious admissions made by General Alexander. Having accounted for the 20 per cent of the active part of the Burmese people, General Alexander says: "The remaining 80 per cent loathed the idea of war and only wanted to be left alone." He does not tell us why, but the reason is not far to seek: It was the suicidal policy of the British Government not to arm the citizens and not to train them. That was the story in Malay and that is the story in India. And so far as fighting is concerned, the discovery is now being made that "the last thing you wanted in Burma was mechanization", and unfortunately that was the first and only thing they took in Burma "The Japanese were specially trained to live and operate" in a foreign country, whereas those who claimed the country as their own were foreigners there, too lazy or too proud to learn the condition of things in the land of their occupation!

And Singapore

And now look at the story from Singapore. Cecil Brown, who was in Singapore a few hours before the fall, was banned from broadcasting through Singapore, because British authorities believed his stinging criticism of official complacency "too bad for morale". But when he went to Sydney, the Australian censors allowed him to broadcast from there. Here are some sentences from that broadcast: "The British were heavily outnumbered and unable to stop the Japanese infiltration attacks. The troops were not adequately trained for jungle fighting and could not adapt themselves in a few weeks." . . .

. . . "Every American and British correspondent affirmed that censorship in Singapore did everything possible to hide the situation from those civilians expected to fight the battle for Singapore. The tragic story of Singapore is not all one of Japanese numerical superiority, fanatical courage and brilliant military scheming. The Japanese are at Singapore also because of what the British failed to foresee, prepare for, and meet." (Italics ours)

The Only Way

The Time in a long article tries to summarise the Indian case and the British case, and concludes: "Whatever the experts and officials" (men on the spot in India) "and vested interests were saying last week, the British people were calling for Indian self-government, calling for it in such words as these: 'We treat them like dirt and then expect them to fight.' Only time could fairly judge the complex Indian cases. But neither Japan nor the British people had time to waste. Unless every possible iota of Indian strength and spirit were called on, a day might soon come when Britain's Captains and Kings would depart from India, and the fire of Britain's power and glory would sink, perhaps for ever, from India's dunes and headlands."

"We treat them like dirt." How tragically true it is today!

The Philadelphia Record puts the matter in the most unequivocal manner:

"India is not ready for war. The cause is deeper than the lack of guns and tanks. The nationalist spirit is necessary for modern war, and the British have spent centuries trying to stamp out any movement toward nationalism in India.

"There are now moves to give India a measure of independence. The British Government is reported ready to send a Cabinet Minister out there to bolster morale.

"Such steps might be worse than none at all.

"Small doses of independence and recognition would not satisfy India and might give the Axis something to crow about.

"It is almost a certainty that the day it is freed, India will be willing and anxious to enter the British Commonwealth as a dominion and that it would declare war on the Axis Powers. Under those conditions even a poorly equipped India might show the same amazing human resources that an ill-equipped China has shown.

"Ganeralissimo Chiang-Kai-Shek, who understands the military capabilities of India, 'hopes and expects' that Britain will grant India freedom as a war measure.

"Such a hope is shared by most of the people in the United Nations including Britain."

But the dose that the British Cabinet Minister brought was not only an inadequate dose of Independence, it was a dose which poisoned Independence, and which made India more than ever determined to have no patience with the Empire and the British Commonwealth. A "poorly equipped India" might indeed show "the same amazing resources that an ill-equipped China has shown," but that can happen only if she was free. The Government has not even the common-sense to consult one like Rajaji who is crying himself hoarse for unity and national Government and for resisting Japanese aggression. With them not only the masses whom they have never armed are suspect, Rajaji also is suspect.

The Only Alternative

And since the opportunity of calling on "every possible iota of Indian strength and spirit" is now gone — never to return — because of the obtuseness of the British, and since haphazard, unprepared and unforeseen warfare may be fraught with disaster, Gandhiji has placed an honourable alternative before them, viz., not to ask for American help (men and munitions), not to antagonise the populace by stupid methods of harassing evacuation, but to listen to the voice of justice, make an orderly withdrawal and leave India to fight her own battle. #### A RURAL ANTHOLOGY

III

The elevating influence of these handicrafts is thus dwelt upon by Miss Gertrude Jekyll in Old West Surrey:

"The sight of these simple pieces of mechanism — mechanism that supplemented but did not supplant hand labour — makes one think how much fuller and more interesting was the rural home life of the older days, when nearly everything for daily use and daily food was made and produced on the farm or in the immediate district: when people found their joy in life at home, instead of frittering away half their time in looking for it somewhere else; when they honoured their own state of life by making the best of it within its own good limits, instead of tormenting themselves with a restless striving to be, or at any rate to appear to be, something that they are not. Surely that older life was better and happier and more fruitful, and even, I venture to assume, much fuller of sane and wholesome daily interests. Surely it is more interesting, and the thing when made of a more vital value when it is made at home from the very beginning, than when it is bought at a shop." (The italics are mine.)

The same theme moves Mr. George Sturt to eloquence in his The Wheelwright's Shop:

"But no higher wage, no income, will buy for men the satisfaction which of old — until machinery made drudges of them — streamed into their muscles all day long from close contact with iron, timber, clay, wind and wave, horse-strength. It tingled up in the niceties of touch, sight, scent. The very ears unawares received it, as when the plane went singing over the wood, or the exact chisel went tapping in (under the mallet) to the hard ash with gentle sound. But these intimacies are over. Although they have so much more leisure, men can now taste little solace in life, of the sort that skilled handwork used to yield to them. Just as the seaman today has to face the stoke-hole rather than the gale and knows more of heat-waves than of sea waves, so throughout. In what was once the wheelwright's shop, where Englishmen grew friendly with the grain of timber and with sharp tool, nowadays untrained youths wait upon machines, hardly knowing oak from ash or caring for the qualities of either. And this is but one tiny item in the immensity of changes which have overtaken labour throughout the civilised world."

DR. TARACHAND AND HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The following was sent for the question box by Shri Murlidhar Sivastava M. A.:

"When prejudices come in, one is led to distort history. Dr. Tarachand is an ardent advocate of Hindustani as you are. He has every right to hold his view as you or I have to hold my own, but in his zeal he has grossly misrepresented the history of Brajhasha by declaring that no writing in Braj is known to have appeared before the 16th century, in an attempt to prove that Hindustani ('Khari Boli') has older literature than Brajhasha. According to him Surdas was the first poet to write in Braj in the 16th century. As the learned Doctor has been quoted by you in the Harijan dated 29-3-42, which commands wide publicity and authority, the mistake must be pointed out. For literature prior to Surdas, you have only to read the poems of Kabir, not to speak of Amir Khusru, some of whose verses are also in Brajhasha. Several small pieces of poems are attributed to several Santas and Bhaktas prior to Surdas and they can be looked into any standard history of Hindi literature."

I have removed the portion that had no bearing on the question at issue. I sent the letter to Kaka Saheb Kalelkar who made it over to Dr. Tarachand who has now sent the following reply which speaks for itself:

"My view that the literature of Brajhasha is not older than the sixteenth century is based on the following considerations:

1. Brajhasha is a modern language which belongs to the group named tertiary Prakrits or New Indo-Aryan. This group developed from the secondary Prakrits or Middle Indo-Aryan. Unfortunately the stages between the secondary and tertiary cannot be traced with absolute certainty. But most scholars are agreed that secondary Prakrit stage lasted from 600 B. C. to 1000 A. D.

2. The secondary Prakrits which were spoken dialects received the impetus towards literary development from the religious movements inaugurated by Mahavira and Buddha. Of these Prakrits, Pali became the most important, as it was adopted as the medium of sacred texts of the Buddhists. Ardhamagadhi, which served a similar purpose in regard to the Jainas, came next in importance. There were other Prakrits also in use, for instance, Maharashtri which was the medium of song and poetry, Saurseni which was employed in dramas as the language of the ladies etc.

3. By the sixth century A. D. the Prakrits had become fixed and dead languages. Literature continued to be produced in them, but their development had ceased. In this century the languages of common speech, from which literary Prakrits had diverged, began to be used for literary purposes. This phase of literary growths of the Prakrits is given the name Apabhramsha. It lasted from 600 to 1000 A. D. Among the Apabhramshas one acquired a position of eminence, namely, Nagara. The varieties of Nagara were used as vehicles of literary expression in the greater part of northern India. But besides Nagara and its varieties, there had developed Apabhramshas of the other Prakrits, like Saurseni, also.

4. The modern Indian languages or the tertiary Prakrits developed from these Apabhramshas. Nagara became the parent of Rajasthani and Gujarati languages, through a variety to which Tessitori gave the name old Western Rajasthani.

Saurseni Apabhramsha is represented in the Prakrit grammar of Hemchandra (d. 1172 A. D.). But it is difficult to determine the relationship of Saurseni Apabhramsha with Nagara. It seems that the Saurseni Apabhramsha underwent a further change, which has been variously called old Western Hindi, Avahattha, Kavyabhasha.

5. With the arrival upon the scene of this language the stage of secondary Prakrits comes to an end, and the stage of new Indo-Aryan speech begins. The old Western Hindi which is the earliest form of the new midland speech appears to have become established in the eleventh century. From the old Western Hindi branched out Hindustani ('Khari') of the North midland, Braj of the middle region and Bundeli of the southern parts. In the twelfth century they were all spoken dialects. In the course of the following centuries they assumed literary form.

6. From a study of the development of these languages I have arrived at the conclusion that Hindustani ('Khari') was the first to develop into a literary language. We have a continuous history of Hindustani (Deccani Urdu) from the last quarter of the 14th century onwards. On the other hand the history of Braj literature before the 16th century is very doubtful.

7. Let me consider the so-called Braj literature of the pre-16th century.

(a) The first poet who is supposed to have employed Braj (Pingala) is Chand Bardai, the author of Prithviraj Raso, who is said to have been the contemporary of Prithviraj (12th century). Regarding the Raso the weight of opinion is that it is a spurious poem. Buhler, Gaurishanker Hirachand Ojha, Grierson and other scholars doubt its genuineness. Its language is a curious mixture of the archaic and the modern, its subject matter contravenes history and its authorship is dubious.

On these grounds Pt. Ram Chandra Shukla came to the conclusion that 'the book is of no use either to the student of language or of history.'

(b) The next author who is claimed as a writer of Braj is Amir Khusru. He died in 1325 A. D. Of his verses, acrostics, double entendre poems in Hindi no authentic manuscript has ever been found. Professor Mahmud Sherani of Lahore has conclusively proved that Khaliq Bari — a dictionary of Hindi and Persian words in verse, attributed to him — cannot possibly be his. The language of his Hindi poems is so modern that even a tiro in philology ought not fail to notice that it cannot belong to the 13th or 14th century. Much of it is simply modern Hindustani or Khari, some bears an impress of Braj. Dr. Hidayat Husain compiled a list of genuine works of Khusru and has not found room for his Hindi poems in it. Some Hindi writers have read an extract from his poem Khizra Khan and Dewal Rani, in which occurs a praise of Hindi. They have concluded from this that Khusru was an admirer and poet of Hindi. But a perusal of the passage leaves no doubt on the mind that he was not referring to Braj or Hindustani. On the basis of such slender evidence to trace the history of Braj to Khusru is not at all scientific.

(c) Then, mention is made of the saints and Bhaktas as writers of Braj poetry, like Namdeva, Raidasa, Dhana, Pipa, Sen, Kabir etc. The Banis and Padas of these are given in the Guru Granth. How far they can be considered genuine is an unsolved problem. Namdev was a Maratha who lived in the 13th century, and whether he wrote in Hindi or not cannot be ascertained, for Guru Granth was compiled in the beginning of the 17th century, nor any authentic manuscripts of the works of others are forthcoming.

Among them Kabir who lived in the 15th century is best known. A large number of his verses are found in the Guru Granth. Their language has a very strong impress of Punjabi. The Nagari Pracharini Sabha has published, under the editorship of Rai Bahadur Shyam Sunder Das, the works of Kabir. They are said to be based on a manuscript of 1504 A. D., but grave doubts have been cast upon the genuineness of this date (vide Dr. P. D. Barathwal's Nirgun school of Hindi poetry). In any case even the language of this edition is like the language of the extracts in Guru Granth, highly Punjabiified. Now Kabir himself has stated that he used the Purbi tongue, and there are Kabir's works which show great Rajasthani influence on the language. In these circumstances it is difficult to be certain of the language of Kabir's works. Pandit Ram Chandra Shukla has attempted to solve the problem by saying that Kabir used Sadhukkari for the poems teaching his doctrine (Sikhis) and Kavyabhasha or Braj for his Ramainis and Sabads.

This solution is hardly satisfactory. It contradicts Kabir's own statement. Again in the absence of authentic documents it is not possible to prove it.

8. Thus the more one investigates these literary products the more strongly the conclusion is borne in upon one that the popularly held opinion regarding their language has little basis in fact. Other considerations support this conclusion. It is well known that no dialect rises to the position and status of a literary language unless a strong social force supports it. This force may be political or religious. Pali and Ardhamagadhi rose into fame because they became the vehicles of Buddhist and Jaina reformations. Hindustani acquired its literary status as a result of the support of Muslim preachers and rulers. Rajasthani which was the literary language of a great part of northern India during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries owed its rise and popularity to the greatness of Sisodias of Mewar. When the Moghals overthrew the Ranas of Mewar, Rajasthani shrank into a local language.

Now if we consider Braj, we do not discover any political or religious movement at its back till the 16th century. Braj was not the political centre of any power. Till Vallabhacharya settled in Braj and began his sectarian movement of Krishna Bhakti, Braj had no importance as a religious centre. Vallabha's movement apparently gave the impetus which transformed the spoken dialect into a literary language. Surdas and the other disciples of Vallabha (the Ashtachhapa) established the supremacy of Braj in northern India, with the result that a form of Braj was adopted even in distant Bengal as the medium of expression of Krishna Bhakti.

9. The poems of Kabir and other Bhaktas, whatever their original language, were mainly handed down by word of mouth. When the flood of Braj began to flow they were easily affected and Brajified.

10. My view that Braj has no genuine literature which can be ascribed to centuries before the 16th is based upon considerations which I have summarised above. But I am not the only one who holds these views. Dr. Dharendra Varma, the head of the Hindi department of the Allahabad University, who is emphatically not biased in favour of Hindustani, has given expression to the same view in his history of Hindi language and the grammar of Brajbhasha, to which reference may be made."

Rajaji

Although I retain the opinion I have expressed about my differences with Rajaji, and although I adhere to every word I have said and he has quoted, and although I reaffirm my opinion that my language taken in its context does not bear the interpretation Rajaji puts upon it, I do not propose henceforth to enter into any public controversy with him. I join him in hoping that some day I shall see the error of my views which he sees so clearly. But public controversy with close companions like Rajaji repels me. He has a new mission and he has need to speak.

THROW AWAY THE CARCASS

Everyone knows the story of Sindbad the Sailor and the Old Man of the Sea who would not get off his shoulders. To say that Sindbad is India and that the Old Man of the Sea is Britain would cause no surprise. It is a perfectly apt simile, and for Britain to expect India's cooperation is like the Old Man of the Sea asking for Sindbad's cooperation in resisting an assailant without getting off Sindbad's back.

But in a recent interview Gandhiji reversed the simile and likened Britain and the Allies to Sindbad carrying a heavy carcass on his shoulders and appealed to them to throw away the carcass if they would have victory. "India has no heart in the War, in fact she has her eyes on Japan. You may today be denuding her of her resources, but they are the resources of an unwilling India. India is thus a corpse — a heavy carcass of which the weight might make your victory impossible. If by some chance England comes to her senses—the Allies come to their senses—and say, 'let us get rid of this carcass', that single act will give them a power which no military skill or resources and no amount of American help can give them." This is what Gandhiji said to Mr. Preston Grover, the representative of the Associated Press of America, who came specially from Delhi to have his interview.

It was as usual a day of broiling heat and heavy work. Gandhiji had offered to go to Wardha to have his talk with the Maulana who has been keeping indifferent health, rather than let him go to Sevagram. As we went the car broke down about six furlongs from Shethji's bungalow. Gandhiji got down and began to walk in the blazing sun. I could not keep pace with him and collapsed after I had walked a furlong or two. It was only when I got a tonga, on coming round, that I got to the bungalow when Gandhiji had already got there. He evidently can bear this terrible heat, as it is nothing compared to the blazing furnace that is burning within him, and it was to share it with the Maulana that he went to Wardha. After a full two hours' talk with the Maulana and Jawaharlalji, he asked Mr. Grover to come in, and poured out his heart's agony before him for about an hour. "There has been a great deal of questioning in America and India as to the nature of your activities during the balance of the War. I should like to know what it will be like," said Mr. Grover. "But can you tell me when the War will end?" said Gandhiji laughing.

It Will Be Felt by the World

Coming to the point Mr. Grover said again: "There is a good deal of speculation that you are planning some new movement. What is the nature of it?"

"It depends on the response made by the government and the people. I am trying to find out public opinion here and also the reaction on the world outside."

"When you speak of the response, you mean response to your new proposal?"

"Oh yes," said Gandhiji, "I mean response to the proposal that the British Government in India should end today. Are you startled?"

"I am not," said Mr. Grover, "you have been asking for it and working for it."

"That's right. I have been working for it for years. But now it has taken definite shape and I say that the British power in India should go today for the world peace, for China, for Russia and for the Allied cause. I shall explain to you how it advances that Allied cause. Complete independence frees India's energies, frees her to make her contribution to the world crisis. Today the Allies are carrying the burden of a huge corpse—a huge nation lying prostrate at the feet of Britain, I would even say at the feet of the Allies. For America is the predominant partner, financing the war, giving her mechanical ability and her resources which are inexhaustible. America is thus a partner in the guilt."

"Do you see a situation when after full independence is granted American and Allied troops can operate from India?" Mr Grover pertinently asked.

"I do," said Gandhiji. "It will be only then that you will see real cooperation. Otherwise all the effort you put up may fail. Just now Britain is having India's resources because India is her possession. Tomorrow whatever the help, it will be real help from a free India."

"You think India in control interferes with Allied action to meet Japan's aggression?"

"It does."

"When I mentioned Allied troops operating I wanted to know whether you contemplated complete shifting of the present troops from India?"

"Not necessarily."

"It is on this that there is a lot of misconception."

"You have to study all I am writing. I have discussed the whole question in the current issue of Harijan. I do not want them to go, on condition that India becomes entirely free. I cannot then insist on their withdrawal, because I want to resist with all my might the charge of inviting Japan to India."

"But suppose your proposal is rejected, what will be your next move?"

"It will be a move which will be felt by the whole world. It may not interfere with the movement of British troops, but it is sure to engage British attention. It would be wrong of them to reject my proposal and say India should remain a slave in order that Britain may win or be able to defend China. I cannot accept that degrading position. India free and independent will play a prominent part in defending China. Today I do not think she is rendering any real help to China. We have followed the non-embarrassment policy so far. We will follow it even now. But we cannot allow the British Government to exploit it in order to strengthen the strangle-hold on India. And today it amounts to that. The way, for instance, in which thousands are being asked to vacate their homes with nowhere to go to, no land to cultivate, no resources to fall back upon, is the reward of our non-embarrassment. This should be impossible in any free country. I cannot tolerate India submitting to this kind of treatment. It means greater degradation and servility, and when a whole nation accepts servility it means good-bye for ever to freedom."

India's Gains from British Victory?

"All you want is the civil grip relaxed. You won't then hinder military activity?" was Mr. Grover's next question.

"I do not know. I want unadulterated independence. If the military activity serves but to strengthen the strangle-hold, I must resist that too. I am no philanthropist to go on helping at the expense of my freedom. And what I want you to see is that a corpse cannot give any help to a living body. The Allies have no moral cause for which they are fighting, so long as they are carrying this double sin on their shoulders, the sin of India's subjection and the subjection of the Negroes and African races."

Mr. Grover tried to draw a picture of a free India after an Allied victory. Why not wait for the boons of victory? Gandhiji mentioned as the boons of the last World War the Rowlatt Act and martial law and Amritsar. Mr. Grover mentioned more economic and industrial prosperity — by no means due to the grace of the government, but by the force of circumstances, and economic prosperity was a step further forward to Swaraj. Gandhiji said the few industrial gains were wrung out of unwilling hands, he set no store by such gains after this war, those gains may be further shackles, and it was a doubtful proposition whether there would be any gains — when one had in mind the industrial policy that was being followed during the war. Mr. Grover did not seriously press the point.

What Can America Do?

"You don't expect any assistance from America in persuading Britain to relinquish her hold on India," asked Mr. Grover half incredulously.

"I do indeed," replied Gandhiji.

"With any possibility of success?"

"There is every possibility, I should think," said Gandhiji. "I have every right to expect America to throw her full weight on the side of justice, if she is convinced of the justice of the Indian cause."

"You don't think the American Government is committed to the British remaining in India?"

"I hope not. But British diplomacy is so clever that America, even though it may not be committed, and in spite of the desire of President Roosevelt and the people to help India, it may not succeed. British propaganda is so well organised in America against the Indian cause that the few friends India has there have no chance of being effectively heard. And the political system is so rigid that public opinion does not affect the administration."

"It may, slowly," said Mr. Grover apologetically.

"Slowly?" said Gandhiji. "I have waited long, and I can wait no longer. It is a terrible tragedy that 40 crores of people should have no say in this war. If we have the freedom to play our part we can arrest the march of Japan and save China."

What Do You Promise to Do?

Mr. Grover, having made himself sure that Gandhiji did not insist on the literal withdrawal of either the British or the troops, now placing himself in the position of the Allies, began to calculate the gains of the bargain. Gandhiji of course does not want independence as a reward of any services, but as a right and in discharge of a debt long overdue. "What specific things would be done by India to save China," asked Mr. Grover, "if India is declared independent?"

"Great things, I can say at once, though I may not be able to specify them today," said Gandhiji. "For I do not know what government we shall have. We have various political organisations here which I expect would be able to work out a proper national solution. Just now they are not solid parties, they are often acted upon by the British power, they look up to it and its frown or favour means much to them. The whole atmosphere is corrupt and rotten. Who can foresee the possibilities of a corpse coming to life? At present India is a dead weight to the Allies."

"By dead weight you mean a menace to Britain and to American interests here?"

"I do. It is a menace in that you never know what sullen India will do at a given moment."

"No, but I want to make myself sure that if genuine pressure was brought to bear on Britain by America, there would be solid support from yourself?"

"Myself? I do not count — with the weight of 73 years on my shoulders. But you get the cooperation — whatever it can give willingly — of a free and mighty nation. My cooperation is of course there. I exercise what influence I can by my writings from week to week. But India's is an infinitely greater influence. Today because of widespread discontent there is not that active hostility to Japanese advance. The moment we are free, we are transformed into a nation prizing its liberty and defending it with all its might and therefore helping the Allied cause."

"May I concretely ask — will the difference be the difference that there is between what Burma did and what, say, Russia is doing?" said Mr. Grover.

"You might put it that way. They might have given Burma independence after separating it from India. But they did nothing of the kind. They stuck to the same old policy of exploiting her. There was little cooperation from Burmans, on the contrary there was hostility or inertia. They fought neither for their own cause nor for the Allied cause. Now take a possible contingency. If the Japanese compel the Allies to retire from India to a safer base, I cannot say today that the whole of India will be up in arms against the Japanese. I have a fear that they may degrade themselves as some Burmans did. I want India to oppose Japan to a man. If India was free she would do it, it would be a new experience to her, in twenty-four hours her mind would be changed. All parties would then act as one man. If this live independence is declared today I have no doubt India becomes a powerful ally."

Mr. Grover raised the question of communal disunion as a handicap, and himself added that before the American Independence there was not much unity in the States. "I can only say that as soon as the vicious influence of the third party is withdrawn, the parties will be face to face with reality and close up ranks," said Gandhiji. "Ten to one my conviction is that the communal quarrels will disappear as soon as the British power that keeps us apart disappears."

Why not Dominion Status?

"Would not Dominion Status declared today do equally well?" was Mr. Grover's final question.

"No good," said Gandhiji instantaneously. "We will have no half measures, no tinkering with independence. It is not independence that they will give to this party or that party, but to an indefinable India. It was wrong, I say, to possess India. The wrong should be righted by leaving India to herself."

C. R.

"May I finally ask you about your attitude to Rajaji's move?"

"I have declared that I will not discuss Rajaji in public. It is ugly to be talking at valued colleagues. My differences with him stand, but there are some things which are too sacred to be discussed in public."

But Mr. Grover had not so much in mind the Pakistan controversy as C. R.'s crusade for the formation of a national government. Mr. Grover had the discernment to make it clear that C. R. "could not be motivated by British Government. His position happens to harmonise with them."

"You are right", said Gandhiji. "It is fear of the Japanese that makes him tolerate the British rule. He would postpone the question of freedom until after the war. On the contrary I say that if the war is to be decisively won, India must be freed to play her part today. I find no flaw in my position. I have arrived at it after considerable debating within myself; I am doing nothing in hurry or anger. There is not the slightest room in me for accommodating the Japanese. No, I am sure that India's independence is not only essential for India, but for China and the Allied cause."

"What are the exact steps by which you will save China?"

"The whole of India's mind would be turned away from Japan. Today it is not. C. R. knows it, and it worries him as it should worry any sane patriot. It worries me no less, but it drives me to a contrary conclusion. India lying at the feet of Great Britain may mean China lying at the feet of Japan. I cannot help using this language. I feel it. You may think it startling and big. But why should it be startling? Think of 400 million people hungering for freedom. They want to be left alone. They are not savages. They have an ancient culture, ancient civilisation, such variety and richness of languages. Britain should be ashamed of holding these people as slaves. You may say: 'You deserve it!' If you do, I will simply say it is not right for any nation to hold another in bondage."

"I agree," whispered Mr. Grover.

"I say even if a nation should want to be in bondage it should be derogatory to one's dignity to keep it in bondage. But you have your own difficulties. You have yet to abolish slavery!"

"In United States, you mean?"

"Yes, your racial discrimination, your lynch law and so on. But you don't want me to remind you of these things."

JODHPUR TRAGEDY

(By M. K. Gandhi)

As I had feared, Jodhpur satyagraha has taken a serious and ugly turn. Heaps of paper have come in. From these I gather that arrests are multiplying. Lathi-charges are a daily occurrence. Official circulars have been issued prohibiting the use of private premises by satyagrahis. In fact all the worst things that were experienced during the satyagraha campaigns in British India are being repeated in Jodhpur. Only in Jodhpur they are being done far from the public gaze and a first class tragedy may pass unnoticed and may be buried like many such that have been buried and are being buried even today. The cause of all these troubles is one and so is the remedy. Till it is successfully applied, the painful drama will continue in some shape or form. The British Government cannot escape blame and responsibility for every such happening in the States. It is bound by treaty obligation to protect the people of the States from inhumanities such as those going on in Jodhpur in the name of law and order. The prisoners have no respite even behind the prison bars. The food is bad, usual facilities are denied to them. By way of protest Shri Jai Narayan Vyas has undertaken a hunger-strike till the grievances are redressed or unto death. If he has to die, the death will be upon those who are primarily responsible for the grievances which compel hunger-strikes unto death. Dr. Dwarkanath Kachru has sent an instructive note on Jodhpur from which I take the following for public information:

"The direct authority of the Jodhpur Government extends over 17 % of the total area of the State; the remaining area—about 83 %—is owned by the Jagirdars, about 1300 in number. These Jagirdars are mostly autonomous internally and pay fixed tributes to the Maharaja.

"For a long time now the Political Department has been controlling the affairs in Jodhpur. Thrice during this century the State passed under the direct control and supervision of the Political Department. At present Englishmen—a large number of them—occupy prominent positions in the State. The prime minister is also a retired British official.

"Apart from the British officials, other non-State subject elements also predominate in the State administration. There is thus a "Mulki Movement" which is becoming stronger day by day. There is also a very strong rivalry between the different castes, Rajputs, Brahmins etc., which is very often exploited by the government to play one against the other or to prevent the Lok Parishad from growing stronger.

"The Marwar Lok Parishad, formed in 1938, became, during the course of these four years, a tremendous force in Jodhpur. Because of the general political backwardness of the Rajputana States, a more advanced mass movement in Jodhpur was destined to lead the vanguard of the popular movement in the whole of Rajputana. An All Rajputana Political Conference was also announced to be held in Jodhpur in March 1940. The mass awakening in Rajputana caused grave anxiety to the Political Department and the Jodhpur Government was instructed to act promptly. The Jodhpur Government therefore declared the Lok Parishad illegal and put all its prominent men in jails. Mass arrests, followed by terrible repression, ended in a compromise with the Government. Marwar Lok Parishad began its constructive work once again and soon came to be recognised by all the people in Marwar, both in the khalsa and jagiri territories. The Parishad contested the Municipal elections and emerged as the majority party in the Board. Its leader became the chairman.

"Since the war began the governments of Indian States have changed their attitude towards popular movements. The war had in fact provided as excuse to suppress civil liberties and check the growth of popular forces. In Jodhpur, where the Political Department has a hand in shaping the policy of the government, Prime Minister Sir Donald Field, set to work according to the instructions from above. Funds had to be procured for war and the whole State had to be put on war footing. Money had largely to be procured from the Jagirdars, who must in turn be protected against the popular movement in the Jagirs led by the Lok Parishad. The State Government thus assumed an attitude of neutrality towards the Jagirs and allowed the Jagirdars to squeeze even the last drop of blood from their subjects.

"But the Lok Parishad could not ignore the grievances and demands of the masses of Marwar living in Jagirs. The Parishad did not want the abolition of the Jagirs, but it certainly wanted the betterment of the people of Jagirs. Repeated requests were made to the government to intervene and secure a just and a humane treatment for the tenants in Jagirs, but unfortunately the government chose to act differently. They encouraged the Jagirdars and suppressed the Lok Parishad workers. Briefly stated the conditions in Jagirs are: (a) the tenants demand regular latai (allocation of the shares of the Jagirdars and their tenants). But the Jagirdars would not arrange to do it regularly and often evaded with the result that the tenants suffered, (b) the tenants also want the abolition of such cesses which have been declared illegal in the courts of the States.

"The Government of Jodhpur repeatedly refused to come to the help of the tenants and even refused to stop the exaction of such cesses which were declared illegal in their own courts of law. The Government went a step further and encouraged the Jagirdars themselves to take up cudgels against the Lok Parishad. Thus when the Jagirdars beat and victimised and even burnt the houses of the Parishad workers the government refused to intervene."

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Its Meaning

Q. What is the meaning of your appeal to the British power to withdraw from India? You have written much recently on the subject. But there seems to be confusion in the public mind about your meaning.

A. So far as my own opinion is concerned, British authority should end completely irrespective of the wishes or demand of various parties. But I would recognise their own military necessity. They may need to remain in India for preventing Japanese occupation. That prevention is common cause between them and us. It may be necessary for the sake also of China. Therefore I would tolerate their presence in India not in any sense as rulers but as allies of free India. This of course assumes that after the British declaration of withdrawal there will be a stable government established in India. Immediately the hindrance in the shape of a foreign power is altogether removed the union of parties should be an easy matter. The terms on which the Allied powers may operate will be purely for the Government of the free state to determine. The existing parties will have dissolved into the National Government. If they survive they will do so for party purposes and not for dealings with the external world.

What about Non-Violence

Q. But what about your non-violence? To what extent will you carry out your policy after freedom is gained?

A. The question hardly arises. I am using the first personal pronoun for brevity, but I am trying to represent the spirit of India as I conceive it. It is and will be a mixture. What policy the National Government will adopt I cannot say. I may not even survive it much as I would love to. If I do, I would advise the adoption of non-violence to the utmost extent possible and that will be India's great contribution to the peace of the world and the establishment of a new world order. I expect that with the existence of so many martial races in India, all of whom will have a voice in the government of the day, the national policy will incline towards militarism of a modified character. I shall certainly hope that all the effort for the last twenty-two years to show the efficacy of non-violence as a political force will not have gone in vain and a strong party representing true non-violence will exist in the country. In every case a free India in alliance with the allied powers must be of great help to their cause, whereas India held in bondage as she is today must be a drag upon the war-chariot and may prove a source of real danger at the most critical moment.

What about Radio Messages?

Q. You do not hear the radio messages. I do most assiduously. They interpret your writings as if your leanings were in favour of the Axis powers and you had now veered round to Subhas Babu's views about receiving outside help to overthrow the British rule. I would like you to clear your position in this matter. Misinterpretation of your known views has reached a dangerous point.

A. I am glad you have asked the question. I have no desire whatsoever to woo any power to help India in her endeavour to free herself from the foreign yoke. I have no desire to exchange the British for any other rule. Better the enemy I know than the one I do not. I have never attached the slightest importance or weight to the friendly professions of the Axis powers. If they come to India they will come not as deliverers but as sharers in the spoil. There can therefore be no question of my approval of Subhas Babu's policy. The old difference of opinion between us persists. This does not mean that I doubt his sacrifice or his patriotism. But my appreciation of his patriotism and sacrifice cannot blind me to the fact that he is misguided and that his way can never lead to India's deliverance. If I am impatient of the British yoke I am so because India's sullenness and suppressed delight of the man in the street over British reverses are dangerous symptoms which may lead to the success of Japanese designs upon India, if they are not dealt with in the proper manner; whereas India finding herself in possession of complete freedom will never want the Japanese to enter India. India's sullenness and discontent will be changed as if by magic into joyful and hearty cooperation with the Allies in consolidating and preserving her liberty from any and every evil design.

Education through Handicrafts

Shrimati Ashadevi sends the following interesting figures:

"The 27 basic schools in the small compact area in the Bettiah Thana, Dist. Champaran, Bihar, completed three years of work in April 1942. The annual economic chart of Grade I, II and III of these schools for the year 1941-42 makes encouraging study for all workers of basic education. The chart will be published in detail in 'Nai Talim', the monthly organ of basic education. Here we give a brief summary of the principal facts for all who are interested in the progress of basic education. The average attendance for these 27 schools is 70% in Grade I, 76% in Grade II and 79% in Grade III; the average individual earning is 0-11-0 in Grade I, Rs. 2-4-2 in Grade II and Rs. 6-1-1 in Grade III. The total earning of 390 (number based on average attendance) children of 10,264 total hours of work in all the schools is Rs. 267-8-6 in Grade I, of 356 (number based on average attendance) children of 14,082 total hours of work in all the schools is Rs. 804-13-8 in Grade II, and of 319 (number based on average attendance) children of 14,362 total hours of work in all the schools is Rs. 1,935-14-11 in Grade III, i. e. the total earning of 1,065 children is Rs. 3008-2-1 for the whole year. The average maximum individual earning of these schools is Rs. 15-12-0 in Grade III, Rs. 6-2-0 in Grade II and Rs. 2-10-1 in Grade I. The average maximum speed is 480 rounds per hour on the charkha and 281 rounds per hour on the takli for Grade III; 350 rounds per hour on the charkha and 242 rounds per hour on the takli for Grade II; and 164 rounds per hour on the takli for Grade I."

These figures are not given to show the output and the income, important as they are in their place. The output and the income have a secondary place in an education chart. But they are given to demonstrate the high educational value of handicrafts as a means of training the youth. It is clear that without industry, care and attention to detail the work could not have been done.

Only if They Withdraw

"Till the last day you said there can be no Swaraj without Hindu Muslim unity. Now why is it that you say that there will be no unity until India has achieved independence", the Nagpur correspondent of the Hindu asked Gandhiji the other day.

Gandhiji replied, "Time is a merciless enemy, if it is also a merciful friend and healer. I claim to be amongst the oldest lovers of Hindu Muslim unity and I remain one even today. I have been asking myself why every whole-hearted attempt made by all including myself to reach unity has failed, and failed so completely that I have entirely fallen from grace and am described by some Muslim papers as the greatest enemy of Islam in India. It is a phenomenon I can only account for by the fact that the third power, even without deliberately wishing it, will not allow real unity to take place. Therefore I have come to the reluctant conclusion that the two communities will come together almost immediately after the British power comes to a final end in India. If independence is the immediate goal of the Congress and the League then, without needing to come to any terms, all will fight together to be free from bondage. When the bondage is done with, not merely the two organisations but all parties will find it to their interest to come together and make the fullest use of the liberty in order to evolve a national government suited to the genius of India. I do not care what it is called. Whatever it is, in order to be stable, it has to represent the masses in the fullest sense of the term. And, if it is to be broad-based upon the will of the people, it must be predominantly non-violent. Anyway, upto my last breath, I hope I shall be found working to that end, for I see no hope for humanity without the acceptance of non-violence. We are witnessing the bankruptcy of violence from day to day. There is no hope for humanity if the senseless fierce mutual slaughter is to continue."

A RURAL ANTHOLOGY

IV

Not only clothes and shoes but even tools were made in the cottage factory. As James Nasmyth writes in his autobiography:

"Peter Stubbs's files were so vastly superior to other files, both in the superiority of the steel and in the perfection of the cutting, which long retained its efficiency, that every workman gloried in the possession and use of such durable tools. Being naturally interested in everything connected with tools and mechanics, I was exceedingly anxious to visit the factory where these files were made. I obtained an introduction to William Stubbs, the head of the firm, and was received by him with much cordiality. When I asked him if I might be favoured with a sight of his factory, he replied that he had no factory as such; and that all he had to do in supplying his large warehouse was to serve out the requisite quantities of pure cast steel as rods and bars to the workmen; and that they on their part forged the metal into files of every description at their own cottage workshops..."

And apart from the manufacture of clothes and other things of domestic use, cottage industries enabled women in some cases to earn as much money as the menfolk, and even children took part in them with benefit to the family purse and without any undue strain upon themselves. Mr. T. Hennell writes in Change in the Farm:

"The commonest sort [of straw-plait] was made by boys and children and paid for at the rate of five pence a score [twenty yards]. It was quite usual for children to be made to plait a score between coming out of school and going to play. For.....elaborate plaits women were often paid half a crown or three shillings a score and so were able to earn eighteen shillings a week, while their husbands got only sixteen shillings a week as labourers. They had to buy the straw which they used, but this was not a heavy proportion of the cost. Thirty yards of fine plait or twenty-six of coarser quality went to make a hat. No doubt it is a craft which could well be revived with much advantage to many British farmers and cottagers, but it has almost been killed by Japanese plaits and coarse rye-straw imported from France."

V

Mr. Bell's delightful little volume not only tells us about the handicrafts practised in the British countryside; it also lets us catch a glimpse of the fine character which "living in constant touch with nature and face to face with reality" (C. J. Sharp) enables the countryman to build for himself.

For one thing a villager often sleeps under the sky, and "sleeping... under the sky, you come to find out for yourself what nobody taught you at school—how Orion is sure to be not there in summer, and Aquila always missing in March, and how the Great Bear, that was straight overhead in the April nights, is wont to hang low in the north in the autumn. Childish as it may seem to the wise, a few years' nightly view of these and other invariable arrangements may give a simple soul a surprisingly lively twinge of what the ages of faith seem to have meant by the fear of God—the awesome suspicion that there is some sort of fundamental world order or control which cannot by any means be put off or dodged or bribed to help you to break its own laws" (C. E. Montague, Disenchantment).

The sympathy and solidarity which unite the members of a village community have been exquisitely described by Mr. W. H. Hudson (A Traveller in Little Things):

"I imagined the case of a cottager at one end of the village occupied in chopping up a tough piece of wood or stump and accidentally letting fall his heavy sharp axe on to his foot, inflicting a grievous wound. The tidings of the accident would fly from mouth to mouth to the other extremity of the village, a mile distant; not only would every individual quickly know of it, but have at the same time a vivid mental image of his fellow villager at the moment of the misadventure, the sharp glittering axe falling on to his foot, the red blood flowing from the wound; and he would at the same time feel the wound in his own foot, and the shock to his system."

And hospitality is of course a characteristically rural virtue. Mrs. Burrows in her Life As We Have Known It tells us how along with forty other children she used to work fourteen hours a day in the fields about the middle of the nineteenth century. One day "the cold east wind, . . . the sleet and snow, . . . seemed almost to cut us to pieces. . . . Well, the morning passed somehow. . . . Dinner time came, and we were preparing to sit down under a hedge and eat our cold dinner and drink our cold tea, when we saw the shepherd's wife coming towards us, and she said to our ganger, 'Bring these children into my house and let them eat their dinner there.' We went into that very small two-roomed cottage and when we got into the largest room there was not standing room for us all, but this woman's heart was large even if her house was small, and so she put her few chairs and table out into the garden and then we all sat down in a ring upon the floor. She then placed in our midst a very large saucepan of hot boiled potatoes, and bade us help ourselves. Truly, although I have attended scores of grand parties and banquets, since that time, not one of them has seemed half as good to me as that meal did. I well remember that woman. She was one of the plainest women I ever knew; in fact she was what the world would call quite ugly, and yet I can't think of her even now without thinking of that verse in one of our hymns where it says:

'No, Earth has angels though their forms are moulded
But of such clay as fashions all below,
Though harps are wanting, and bright pinions folded,
We know them by the love-light on their brow.'

We will close with Mr. Alexander Somerville's description in Autobiography of a Working Man of a stone mason Alick F—, who gave him some new ideas about the killing of birds and beasts. He said it was mean to put down a snare and catch a hare in the dark. He ridiculed the delight which people took in shooting. "I was with him one wintry day on the sea-shore.....He was quarrying stones in a sheltered nook, and I had taken my gun, because it was a stormy day, to have a shot at the sea-birds, which could be more easily reached in tempestuous weather than at other times. Thus we met. In the midst of our geological speculations.....and just as we had admired the magnificence of a wave which seemed in itself to be a sea risen on end to overwhelm the land, I saw a redshank on the wing, which I thought was within shot, and snatched up the gun to shoot it. He stopped me on the instant and said, 'Let it go! What if the hand, which has more power over that ocean and these waves than you have over that gun and the shot within it, were to have as little mercy for living things? What, if you and I were redshanks, or that all this nation was as but one redshank, and the author of this storm, which permits that redshank to live which you would have killed, should have lifted his arm against us?'"

AMERICAN RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

The treatment of the Negro by the whites in America and racial discrimination operating against him in various walks of life has been discussed in these columns already. A brief reference may now be made to America's policy of racial discrimination against Asiatics—especially the Chinese who are now America's allies. The February number of Asia contains a studiously objective article on the subject by Dr. Spinks who makes out a strong plea for the immediate repeal of Chinese exclusion. Says Dr. Spinks: "Today the future of the United States has become more dependant than ever before upon our relations with the millions of inhabitants of Asia. Whether in war or in peace, whether as enemies or friends, we must henceforth deal with all these peoples upon a basis of equality. We cannot inspire their confidence in our efforts to make this a better world for humanity if our own laws and policies so glaringly place the Asiatic races in a different category from the rest of mankind." The plea is thus made both on the grounds of justice and expedience, though it is little realised that true justice is always the best expediency.

Dr. Spinks complains that "by our own action we ourselves are today violating two of the essential principles" for the violation of which the Axis powers are being strongly condemned. "By our immigration laws, the United States not only excludes over one quarter of the human race from the application of justice and equality, but singles out the Chinese people for a most shameful and categorical form of discrimination." He mentions the various measures on the statute book of the United States of which the very purpose is exclusion and discrimination. The United States Immigration Law of 1924 excludes no Chinese or any other race as such, but excludes those who are ineligible to American citizenship, and the Supreme Court decisions in several cases have ruled that Asiatic races—including Indian—are ineligible for citizenship. Thus the Chinese, the Indians, the Japanese are all debarred except "in case of certain exempt classes (students and merchants) who can enter and reside here temporarily."

This however was what may be called dealing injustice to all Asiatics with an even hand. But China was singled out more especially than others, as we shall presently see. "The American Treaty with China of 1894 gave the United States the right to suspend all immigration for ten years. In 1902 Chinese exclusion was applied to the American insular possessions, and finally in 1904 the Chinese exclusion acts were made perpetual"—and this is in force in spite of the all-comprehensive law of 1924, and thus "the United States has singled out the Chinese by name for categorical discrimination and exclusion." A section of an Act of 1884 makes it obligatory for a Chinese holding passports to have in addition to the passport which does define his occupational status a certificate to the effect that the holder intends to make a temporary visit to the United States. "By this provision the United States in effect does not recognise a passport of the Government of China, which is fully tantamount to not recognising the sovereign power of that country."

"The only bar to immigration based on race", says the Encyclopaedia Britannica, "was the prohibition, since 1888, of Chinese immigration and the practical exclusion of Japanese labourers by a 'gentlemen's agreement' with the Japanese Government." Also, "the Chinese decreased in number, as might be expected from the policy of exclusion; in 1910 there were 71,531 and in 1920, 61,639. The number of Japanese however increased from 72,157 to 111,010, or 53.9 per cent." The Tables for Immigrant Aliens by country and by race give no figures of Asiatics or Orientals, which means that they are nil or negligible.

But to proceed. The Chinese are "justly sensitive and resentful" over a provision in the law prohibiting them from marrying women of their home-land and bringing them to the United States permanently. The Chinese population in America "is overwhelmingly male", and the resentment is thus natural.

Then the Chinese, as distinguished from all other Asiatic or non-Asiatic races, "must enter the United States at certain designated ports"—apart from the discourtesy that legitimate Chinese immigrants too often meet with at the hands of immigration officials.

The Chinese have felt the sting of the racial insult, and Dr. Spinks notes that the first anti-foreign boycott in China in 1905 was "directed against the United States over our exclusion policy." Japan could make of the question a burning international political issue as she had attained the position of a "great" power, but it was precisely because Japan did so that it is said that the whole question of Asiatic immigration was prejudiced. The argument that unless Asiatics are specifically banned, they will in some way or other enter the United States in such numbers as to bring about serious economic and social problems, is dismissed by Dr. Spinks as fallacious, because if the quota system of 1924 which is applied to non-Asiatics were applied to the Asiatics there would be little social or economic disaster. This quota system consists of permission to all non-Asiatic nations to send as immigrants two per cent. of its population resident in the U. S. A. in 1890. Dr. Spinks calculates that if this system were to be applied to Asiatics "only about two thousand Chinese, a mere handful of Indians and other Asiatics and (when the war is over) only a hundred and eighty Japanese could enter the United States annually. Despite their racial and cultural differences, such meagre numbers could not conceivably give rise to economic and social problems." It may be interesting to note in this connection the figures of Asiatic population in the U. S. A. In 1870 there were 63,119 Chinese and 75 Japanese there. In 1930 there were 74,954 Chinese (16 per cent. increase in 60 years), but the Japanese had increased to 138,834 (because of gentleman's agreements with the Great Asiatic power) and other Orientals were only 50,978 in a total population of 12 crores. (Statesman's Year Book, 1937.) While the war lasts even if a partial open door was declared on the quota basis there would be little Chinese immigration.

Dr. Spinks dismisses equally summarily the legal argument—viz., the sovereign right to exclude certain races. This is nothing, says he, before the "broader, more fundamental principle of racial equality which has been a vital part of our national policy and which today is prerequisite to our concept of a new world order." In other words, rather than indulge in big talk of a new world order, make the just and righteous beginning now, and free yourselves of the charge of hypocrisy.

A CHALLENGE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I have before me three letters rebuking me for not going to Sindh to face the Hurs personally. Two are friendly. The third comes from a critic who has no faith in non-violence. His letter demands an answer. Its main part runs as follows:

"I am deeply interested in your writings and in the effect that they make upon the minds of the ignorant masses and your blind followers. I would therefore feel obliged if you enlighten me on the following points, especially because points nos. 3 & 4 raise novel and fundamental issues about non-violence.

"You have been training a number of satyagrahis in your Ashram and they must have had the advantage of your supervision and instructions. You have been proclaiming that violence could be effectively met by non-violent means. Japan is now attacking India in the East and Hurs are creating trouble in the West. Is this not then the long-awaited opportunity when you can practise what you have so long preached?

"Instead of doing that, you are contenting yourself by writing articles in the Harijan. Imagine Hitler or Stalin, without sending their armies to the front line, writing such articles in Pravda or such other paper. Instead of asking the Sindh M. L. A. s. to resign and go to the Hurs, why should you not send a 'company' of your trained satyagrahis and try the luck of your doctrine?

"Is it not the duty and business of a satyagrahi to go and meet the danger where it exists and threatens the country? Or is it your case that your satyagrahis will meet it only when it reaches the Ashram and not before? If so, is not your doctrine a doctrine of inaction?"

I have no doubt that if I could have gone to Sindh, I might have been able to do something. I have done such things before, not without success. But I am too old for such missions. What little energy I have, I am storing up for what promises to be the last fight of my life.

I have not conceived my mission to be that of a knight-errant wandering everywhere to deliver people from difficult situations. My humble occupation has been to show people how they can solve their own difficulties. So far as Sindh is concerned, I maintain that my advice was perfect. It was clearly Congressmen's duty to proceed to the infested areas and spend themselves in the effort to convert the Hurs to the way of peace. Indeed they could have used arms if they had no faith in non-violence. They should have resigned from the Congress to free themselves from the obligation to observe non-violence. If we are to be fit for independence, we have to learn the art of self-defence either non-violently or violently. Every citizen should consider himself liable to render help to his neighbour in distress.

If I had adopted the role my critic has suggested, I would have helped people to become parasites. Therefore it is well that I have not trained myself to defend others. I shall be satisfied if at my death it could be said of me that I had devoted the best part of my life to showing the way to become self-reliant and cultivate the capacity to defend oneself under every conceivable circumstance.

My correspondent has committed the grave error of thinking that my mission is to deliver people from calamities. That is an arrogation only claimed by dictators. But no dictator has ever succeeded in proving the claim.

Indeed if I could say, as the correspondent thinks I could, that if the menaces of the kind described by him face the Ashram, it will give a good account of itself, I should be quite content and feel that my mission was wholly successful. But I can lay no such claim. The Ashram at Sevagram is only so-called. The visitors gave it the name and it has passed current. The Ashram is a medly of people come together for different purposes. There are hardly half a dozen permanent residents having a common ideal. How these few will discharge themselves when the test comes remains to be seen.

The fact is that non-violence does not work in the same way as violence. It works in the opposite way. An armed man naturally relies upon his arms. A man who is intentionally unarmed relies upon the unseen force called God by poets, but called the unknown by scientists. But that which is unknown is not necessarily non-existent. God is the Force among all forces known and unknown. Non-violence without reliance upon that Force is poor stuff to be thrown in the dust.

I hope now my critic realises the error underlying his question and that he sees also that the doctrine that has guided my life is not one of inaction but of the highest action. His question should really have been put thus:

How is it that, in spite of your work in India for over 22 years, there are not sufficient satyagrahis who can cope with external and internal menaces? My answer then would be that twentytwo years are nothing in the training of a nation for the development of non-violent strength. That is not to say that a large number of persons will not show that strength on due occasion. That occasion seems to have come now. This war puts the civilian on his mettle no less than the military man, non-violent no less than the violent.

THE PRESSURE OF LOVE

I extract the following from a correspondent's Gujarati letter:

"Our little village was the scene of an event last week. Two of the leading men in our village were drink-addicts. Their sons who are reformers could not bear this. The fathers would not listen to the sons' entreaties. So the sons went on a fast refusing to have any food until the fathers promised to give up drink. This created a stir in the village. After a day of the fast the fathers promised privately before a few friends to give up drink. The sons refused to accept this promise as satisfactory, and insisted on a pledge being taken before a public meeting of the villagers. After two days the fathers relented and agreed to pledge themselves publicly never to touch drink. Shri Gordhandas Chokhawala who was here was invited to preside over the public meeting held for the purpose, and the sons thereafter broke the fast.

"This is all very well. But I do not know if the sons were right in coercing their fathers. Is not this coercion violence? My own father is a drink-addict. I have tried hard and long to wean him from the habit, but in vain. But these my cousins have succeeded and their action has had a great effect in the village and its neighbourhood. May I follow in their footsteps? I was not sure of the ethical correctness of the course, otherwise I too should have joined them. But your word would be enough for me. I would request you to deal with this letter in Harijanbandhu, so that your advice may be acted upon by young men like me."

I am sure there was no coercion involved in the step taken by the young men, and I am equally sure that it has Gandhiji's blessings and he would commend it to all young people who have the misfortune to have their nearest and dearest ones in the grip of a vice. Satyagraha in the domestic field is a well-trying and unexceptionable remedy. There are a few obvious conditions. The short-coming it is aimed against must be an intolerable vice amounting to a disgrace and working the physical and moral ruin of the addict. Then there should be an indissoluble bond of affection between the parties. It is the right of service and affection that entitles the children and wards to exercise this moral pressure on their parents or guardians. The other condition is that they should have exhausted all other remedies which include repeated requests and entreaties, more devoted service, and giving the dear ones visible demonstration of one's mental pain by giving up one's favourite dishes or one meal, and so on, briefly anything short of a complete fast. Non-cooperation of a sort can also be applied. I have known a sister who non-cooperated with her husband and patiently suffered the consequences thereof for a number of years in order to wean him from vice, and the husband was completely won over as a result of her suffering. If even after all possible gentle measures have been employed the parents or guardians or other dear ones persist, fasting may be legitimately resorted to. There should be no anger and no resentment, there should be utmost love. The dear ones should be made to feel that their persistence in the vice gives the relatives deep pain so much so that it becomes impossible for them to eat and drink and carry on as usual until the unpleasant thing that divides them is removed. The greater their earnestness and affection the quicker and more abiding will be the result. Let me tell the correspondent that this form of Satyagraha has, to my knowledge, been successfully used not only by children against their parents, but by parents against children, by husbands against wives and vice versa. Being the purest type of weapon it can be used by all those who are fired with love, who have no axe to grind, and only the highest end to serve.

The young men in question were right in insisting on the pledge being taken in public. There is shame in persisting in vice, no shame in owning it up and declaring it from the housetops that one is free from it. This public avowal gives one a measure of moral strength and is sufficient protection against a temptation to break the pledge.

CASUAL NOTES

"Extraordinary Blindness"

Lin Yutang, the distinguished Chinese author who has made his mark in the domain of English letters, is the last person to be charged with pro-Japanese sympathies or with a defeatist mentality. He has written an article in the 25th anniversary issue of Asia on the necessity of a Union Now (of China) with India as a counterblast to Clarence Streit's cry of "Union Now" (of U. S. A.) with Britain. We are not now concerned with the idea of an Asiatic Federation — not at any rate so long as the principal Asiatic nation — Japan — is out for totalitarian fascism. But some of the home-truths he has uttered must be laid to heart by every Britisher. He deplores that "both the United States and Great Britain have not changed in their attitude to Asia", and he is therefore worried not so much about the outcome of the war as about the outcome of the peace. He refers to what he calls "the extraordinary blindness of the British Government with regard to Asia", "shown not so much by the inadequate defence of Singapore as by the complacency with which that inadequacy is excused, and apparently accepted." Malay and Singapore were lost, he says on the authority of British Cabinet Ministers, not due to "neglect" but to "deliberate choice". And yet, says Lin Yutang, both the United States and Great Britain "expect to go on colonizing every Asiatic when the war is over." "What is happening," he asks, "inside the minds of the Malays and the Indians and the Burmese and the Chinese? Are the white Imperialists going to stage a comeback?"

The inference to be drawn from these apparently contradictory statements is that neither America nor Britain can afford to lose these "colonies", and it is part of their strategy to lose them now in order to win them back as "colonies", rather than to win an honourable victory by freeing these and letting them fight as equal Allies.

"Democracy today has its chance," he concludes warning them, "and democracy may forfeit it. The Atlantic Charter has been promised to all countries subjected by Hitler. The Atlantic Charter must be equally promised to all countries subjected by England, or we shall run into another and greater world catastrophe."

One vital correction is needed in this warning. The Atlantic Charter must not be promised—Germany and Japan also can make and are making big promises—but it must be applied now at this very moment, if the Allies are to have a moral victory which alone counts and which alone can ensure a stable peace.

Stop the Traditional Game

A writer in the New Statesman and Nation sounds a similar warning and refers pointedly to the expectation of "traditional England" "that at the end of this war, with the aid of the Chinese, American, and Dutch, it is going to recover its traditional Empire in which everything will go on as before." "Our reverses in Malay and Burma mean not merely that on the spot we were ill-prepared and ill-led: they mean that by our own faults of racial arrogance and aloofness our leadership over these peoples has passed from us. We may, if we have the grace to mend our ways, become in the future their allies, friends and helpers, but only on condition that we abandon our traditional claim to rule over them." The mention of Dominion Status serves, he says, but as "an irritant and a symbol of insincerity." "In the past all our offers were qualified by reservations which in effect enabled and even invited the minorities to put their veto on any advance. What Indians chiefly mean by 'independence' is that we should cease to play this traditional game of divide to rule." Alas, the writer did not know then that even before the ink on his paper was dry the British were preparing to play the last (one hopes it was the last) move in that game, viz., the Cripps' proposals. It is therefore that Gandhiji would have no more offer from them, neither the promise of Independence nor any schemes for India's "future Freedom," as they love to describe it, but only an orderly withdrawal leaving us alone to do what we like with ourselves.

Another Game

A Chinese resident in Britain gives through the columns of the same weekly a warning against another game that the British are playing, little knowing that Japan has all along profited by it. "Each time when a city in the Far East is evacuated, the population is invariably divided between the Europeans (which illogically includes the Americans) on the one hand, and the 'coloured people' (with 'natives' and 'Asiatics' as alternatives) on the other. Behind this rough classification I fear that there is still the old white men's consciousness lurking. It is unpleasant but true to say that the Japanese propagandists have exploited this time-worn generalisation with some success."

"Are there," he asks, "any colourless people on earth except those standing in Madame Tussaud's?"

Of all colours, nothing frightens me more than wax! Be one's face a Devon apple, a half-ripen tomato, or a brownish dumpling, there is always so much more life." He recognises what Britain is doing for China, and says, "with such a rosy picture in mind, I venture to suggest that we should uproot the colour-bias."

That, I should think, is an extraordinarily mildly worded warning. The stark fact, as we have known it to our cost, is that the bias is there not only in outward verbal expression but corrupts their daily life—even their behaviour in organising to win this war! The war, they should know, cannot be won, except "ye be converted" and "born again".

Notes

Independence Ensures Speedy Victory

Asked by the Reuter's London representative to amplify his statement about the possibility of Free India entering into a treaty with the United Nations, Gandhiji said:

"There can be no limit to what friendly Independent India can do. I had in mind a treaty between United Nations and India for defence of China against Japanese aggression. But given mutual goodwill and trust, the treaty should cover protection of human dignity and rights by means other than resort to armament. For this involves competition in capacity for greatest slaughter. I wish British opinion could realise that Independence of India changes character of Allied cause and ensures speedier victory."

Deliberate Distortion

Replying to the criticism of the London Times on his latest proposal Gandhiji said: "Every time nationalists have suggested solutions however sound intrinsically there has been distortion of their speeches and writings; followed later by persecution. My latest proposal conceived in the friendliest spirit and in my opinion intrinsically sound has already begun to be distorted. I regard my proposal as fool-proof. The operations of the Allied forces against Japanese aggression have been left intact under my proposal which amounts to this that Britain should become true to her declaration, withdraw from India as conqueror and therefore controller of her destiny, and leave India to shape her own destiny without the slightest interference. This, as I can see, puts her case on a moral basis and gives her in India a great ally not in the cause of Imperialism but in the cause of human freedom. If there is anarchy in India, Britain alone will be responsible, not I. What I have said is that I would prefer anarchy to the present slavery and consequent impotence of India. Any person, however great he may be, who distorts the proposals I have made will be condemned by history as an enemy of the Allied cause. Sir Stafford Cripps' proposals have been weighed by India and after great deliberation rejected by all parties. It is an insult to India to repeat those proposals as the final word of British statesmanship."

A POSER

( By M. K. Gandhi )

A correspondent writes to Mahadev Desai :

"Referring to Gandhiji's demand for an orderly withdrawal of the British from India or for a complete and immediate ending of the British rule in this country, some friends here want to clearly understand the implications of the suggestion that on free India becoming an ally of the United Nations, British and American troops may remain on Indian soil and operate from her under a treaty with free India, because defence of India will be then our 'common cause'. Theoretically from the standpoint of India's independence the position is no doubt quite clear. But some questions arise as to its practical implications. It is of course understood that Gandhiji here is not stating his personal non-violent position but is visualising one of the possibilities, namely, that of a free nationalist India going in for a policy of armed resistance or of collaboration of some kind with foreign troops in armed resistance, to aggression. But what about the British position? A cordial acceptance of Gandhiji's demand by the British will not only completely change the moral basis of the war but will in fact negative, for them, its political and economic sine-qua-non. If the British are not driven out of India by force of circumstances, but they give up their hold on India as a voluntary repayment of a debt long overdue, this moral act cannot, by its very nature, be an isolated one, but should fundamentally affect Britain's relations with her other Asiatic and African possessions also. If Britain is forced to leave India to God or to the Japanese she will go on fighting to save her other possessions in Asia and Africa and to regain those already lost; but if she voluntarily dispossesses herself of her ill-gotten properties, her material reasons for prosecuting the war will practically vanish. From the economic point of view, Britain could never inflict upon herself this terrible costly war if she did not hope afterwards to reimburse herself somehow out of the possessions she was fighting to retain. It will be absolutely beyond the resources of Britain, divested of her foreign possessions, to carry on the war on anything like its present scale. To try to do that would be a most senseless and inhuman infliction on the British people themselves.

"As regards ideal reasons, these have no substance now, because so long as Britain is holding millions upon millions of human beings in subjugation she has no right to speak for democracy, etc. But the ideal reasons will gain substantiality on Britain responding to Gandhiji's appeal. And then it is true Britain may look forward to the sympathy and co-operation of the peoples she will have freed and may to some extent rely on their resources too. But just here we are brought face to face with the old question of means and ends, namely, whether war can be a proper and effective instrument of policy for the attainment of the democratic ends of justice and human freedom. It would be a disaster if anything were said or done that would give rise to a misunderstanding on this issue so as to jeopardise or prejudice the historic lead which Gandhiji has given in this matter to the world at this unprecedented crisis in human affairs. On no account can that moral world-leadership be endangered. Why does not Gandhiji persist in the line which he enunciated sometime ago, namely, that the voluntary abdication of the British power in respect of her imperial possessions is sure to bring about a moral situation in the world that will baffle Hitler and Mussolini and their war machines? The voluntary liquidation of British Imperialism in India, if it comes about, will be a tremendous act of non-violence on the part of the British. When we are visualising its effect, why should we not think in terms of non-violence also? If the tree is non-violence the fruit also should be non-violence.

"There are so many side issues arising from the question of allowing foreign troops on Indian soil. Foreign troops cannot at all function in this part of the world without India being made a vast arsenal and supply-base for the United Nations. Any suggestion, however tentative and hypothetical, in this direction is fraught with danger.

"While Gandhiji is desperately anxious to prove his bona fides as to his determination to keep the Japanese out, his utterances regarding the future position of foreign troops in India are likely to be misunderstood by the other party who may be already seeking an opening for bargaining. Not that negotiations as such are objectionable, but if the other party's approach is vitiated by the spirit of bargaining, that will not only detract from the value of the British action, if any, but will also introduce unwanted complications on the Indian side. The effect on the mind of the Indian masses has also to be taken into consideration. At this stage of the new movement it is most essential to attune the public mind to the thought and conviction that India must get ready to fall back exclusively upon her own resources, moral and material. Can we at this psychological moment emphasise a possibility which will suggest to the man in the street that 'after all they will be here'? The mind of the man in the street will hardly be able to juxtapose national freedom and the presence of thousands and thousands of foreign troops in the country."

This letter demands an answer. The difficulty about the confusion in the public mind by the contemplated stay of the Allied troops in the country is very real. Neither the masses nor even the classes will appreciate the necessity of the military operations of the Allied powers after the declaration of withdrawal. But if the necessity is proved, the public may be expected to reconcile themselves to the inevitable.

There was obviously a gap in my first writing. I filled it in as soon as it was discovered by one of my numerous interviewers. Non-violence demands the strictest honesty, cost what it may. The public have therefore to suffer my weakness, if weakness it may be called. I could not be guilty of asking the Allies to take a step which would involve certain defeat. I could not guarantee fool-proof non-violent action to keep the Japanese at bay. Abrupt withdrawal of the Allied troops might result in Japan's occupation of India and China's sure fall. I had not the remotest idea of any such catastrophe resulting from my action. Therefore I feel that if in spite of the acceptance of my proposal, it is deemed necessary by the Allies to remain in India to prevent Japanese occupation, they should do so, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed by the national government that may be set up after the British withdrawal.

The writer's argument about Britain having no cause left for pursuing the war, if she accepts my proposal and logically follows it in Africa, is sound. But that is the acid test proposed. India has every right to examine the implications of high-sounding declarations about justice, preservation of democracy and freedom of speech and individual liberty. If a band of robbers have among themselves a democratic constitution in order to enable them to carry on their robbing operations more effectively, they do not deserve to be called a democracy. Is India a democracy? Are the States a democracy? Britain does not deserve to win the war on the ground of justice if she is fighting to keep her Asiatic and African possessions. I am not unaware of the tremendous change in Britain's economic policy that the acceptance of my proposal involves. But that change is a vital necessity, if this war is to have a satisfactory ending.

Who knows if Britain's acceptance of my proposal will not by itself mean an honourable end of the war resulting in a change even in the mentality of the Axis powers?

The writer is afraid that my reconciliation to the presence of the British troops would mean a descent on my part from my non-violent position. I hold that my non-violence dictates a recognition of the vital necessity. Neither Britain nor America share my faith in non-violence. I am unable to state that the non-violent effort will make India proof against Japanese or any other aggression. I am not able even to claim that the whole of India is non-violent in the sense required. In the circumstances it would be hypocritical on my part to insist on the immediate withdrawal of the Allied troops as an indispensable part of my proposal. It is sufficient for me to declare that so far as India is concerned, she does not need troops to defend herself, having no quarrel with Japan. But India must not by any act of hers short of national suicide let China down or put the Allied powers in jeopardy. So long therefore as India lacks faith in the capacity of non-violence to protect her against aggression from without, the demand for the withdrawal of the Allied troops during the pendency of the war would itself be an act of violence, if the controllers of the troops hold it to be necessary for their defence to keep them in India for that purpose and that alone.

TWO ACTIONS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

My proposal for the withdrawal of the British power involves two actions. One is to deal with the present emergency, and the other to secure freedom from British supremacy. The second admits of delay. There is a lot of confusion about its implications. I am trying to the best of my ability to deal with the questions as they arise from time to time.

The first admits of no delay and demands specific action irrespective of the proposal for British withdrawal. This is in connection with (1) the behaviour of troops, (2) the impending salt famine, (3) control of food grains, (4) evacuation for the sake of the military, (5) discrimination between Europeans and Anglo-Indians and Anglo-Burmans on the one hand and Indians on the other.

On the first item the people have the law and public opinion wholly on their side. The Government machinery is always slow to move, more so now, when it is all pre-mortgaged for military preparations. People must everywhere learn to defend themselves against misbehaving individuals, no matter who they are. The question of non-violence and violence does not arise. No doubt the non-violent way is always the best, but where that does not come naturally the violent way is both necessary and honourable. Inaction here is rank cowardice and unmanly. It must be shunned at all cost. Pandit Nehru told me that at the stations in the north, platform hawkers have banded themselves for self-defence, so the troops are careful at those stations.

As to salt famine, the law is not quite on the people's side but right is wholly on their side. I am hoping that the Government will put the widest construction on the clause referring to salt in Gandhi-Irwin pact and allow people to manufacture salt wherever they can. And I would advise them to manufacture salt even at the risk of prosecution. Necessity knows no law. A starving man will help himself to food wherever he finds it. Rishi Vishwamitra did so.

Number three is difficult to deal with. But the same rule applies as to the second. Food cannot be manufactured as easily as salt. It is up to the merchants to band themselves to do what they can and force the hands of the Government to do the right thing by suggesting wise rules for the supply of food to the poor people at fixed prices. If this is not done in time looting shops is sure to be a daily event.

As to four, I have no doubt that the authorities may not ask people to vacate except where they are ready to offer equivalent land and buildings and cart the people and their belongings to the places prepared for them and pay them a living wage till they find suitable occupation. The people, if they have nowhere to move to, should simply refuse to vacate and suffer the consequences.

As to the fifth, the people should refuse to submit to discrimination and it will break down. Most of these difficulties take place because we have cultivated the habit of submitting to them. In the words of the late Lord Willingdon, we must learn resolutely to say 'no', when that is the real answer possible and take the consequence. Sevagram, 22-6-42

"THE COMMUNAL TRIANGLE"*

The Communal Triangle in India is the pregnant title of a book on our communal problem by two of our distinguished socialists. It is a remarkable contribution to the study of a problem which has baffled our best leaders, and though the book has been published over the authorship of two, it is acknowledged to be the result of the joint labours of several socialist friends whose harmonious collaboration in jail has borne such rich fruit. Study of our social, economic and political problems has become a rare virtue in these days, what with the preoccupations of the struggle for our freedom and what with our lack of emphasis on patient and tireless study of facts and figures which used to be the forte of our stalwarts like Dadabhai and Wacha, Gokhale and Joshi. The charge that our labours since 1920 have lacked study is well-founded. This book into the making of which have gone infinite cooperative labour, study and research, will be a considerable answer to that charge. Every possible source of information has been tapped, important literature on the subject, not only in English and other foreign languages, but in Hindustani, Persian and Marathi has been utilised, and the result is history which, as Buchan has said, is not only a science but an art, "a synthesis rather than a compilation, an interpretation as well as a chronicle".

The book has, as I have said, a pregnant title. The phrase 'the eternal triangle' is well-known, and the havoc that the third party works in the life of a married couple is incalculable. Often the disaster is irretrievable, unless the two who have plighted their troth to each other recover their senses and eliminate the third, or the third repents and eliminates himself or herself. The third side which the authors have rightly described as the base of our communal triangle has played the disastrous part of the third party in 'the eternal triangle', and the conclusion is irresistible that as soon as the base is eliminated there will be no basis left for the perpetual troubles between the two, who for good or ill plighted their troth to each other centuries ago. Gandhiji, temperamentally accustomed to looking for the cause of our ills in ourselves rather than outside, made his best endeavour to rivet the attention of his countrymen for over a quarter century on our own failings and shortcomings and on our duty. But failure of his intensive prayerful effort has now driven him to the conclusion that unless the fons et origo mali is removed, the disease cannot be eradicated. It is not with a light heart that he came to that painful conclusion. The last straw on the camel's back was the Cripps' proposals constituting the climax of the diabolical process of divide et impera, and he returned from Delhi with the decision made up in his own mind that there was no salvation for this stricken land without a withdrawal of its imperialist masters. The authors of the book have traced the history of the operation of this disastrous policy ever since the British gained their foothold in India, with such wealth of detail, such masterly analysis, and such accuracy that any dispassionate reader, Hindu or Muslim, should come to the same conclusion that they have arrived. It is remarkable that the book was given to the press before the climax of the Cripps' proposals came upon us, and months before Gandhiji raised his life-giving slogan asking the British to withdraw; but the conclusion they have arrived at is absolutely identical. "It is for this reason," they say at the end of a revealing description of the 'the British arm of the Triangle', "that the Congress has always thrown out the challenge that the first condition for a speedy settlement of the Hindu Muslim differences is that the third party of the triangle should withdraw unconditionally and give the two parties an honest chance to face each other's fears and demands." Again: "the fact is that whatever form of government or constitutional arrangements we want in this country, if they are to be based on the people's consent, then we can never get them as long as the British are masters in our house." Exposing the mischievous conclusions of a book by Sir George Schuster and Mr. Guy Wint, the latest genealogical descendants of the "Empire-builders", the authors say: "If as Guy Wint suggests, the Congress is not a homogeneous organisation but a body of miscellaneous opinion held together by their common opposition to the British Raj then, as soon as that opposition is over and India becomes free, the Congress will fall to pieces and the various groups in it may seek fresh party alignments and party labels. When that happens, the Congress will no longer be there to impose its totalitarian will upon the Indian people, and the stage will be clear for sober statesmen to try all the constitutional experiments they want in a spirit of sweet reasonableness." But the primary inexorable condition for that happy consummation is the British withdrawal. They came as birds of passage and remained as birds of prey, "and the marks of their ravages have sunk deep into the face of this unfortunate land". The Muslims stayed not to exploit but to make the country their motherland and helped in producing a culture which is our "richest treasure". The only expiation for the "Great Refusal" of the British to settle in India is now to withdraw in dignity.

The authors have used the language of sociology and discussed in separate chapters the political, the sociological and the "irrational factors" of the communal problem, but it will be found that the three are but the branches of the same poison-tree, and the facts therefore of one chapter run into those of the other chapters. Thus the development of Muslim politics which has been treated in a separate chapter is bound up with the working of the "British arm of the Triangle" which has a chapter for itself, and it is again intimately connected with the sociological aspect of the problem to which a valuable chapter has been devoted. The same poison runs through all the aspects, for the simple reason that it is administered by the consummate masters of the art of divide and rule.

One wonders if the ordinary Muslim knows even a fraction of the history of the Muslim connection with the British. They were the bete noir of the British in the beginning of the nineteenth century, they were systematically shut out of the army, as "part of a deliberate policy to enfeeble a great community, to crush the spirit of a proud people"; in 1871 out of 2141 gazetted appointments in Bengal 711 were held by Hindus and 92 were held by Mussalmans; "a hundred and seventy years ago it was impossible for a well-born Mussalman in Bengal to be poor" wrote Dr. Hunter; "at present it is almost impossible for him to continue rich"; Persian and Arabic were "utterly untaught" in the schools, says Bowen, and "the curriculum was so designed as to estrange rather than interest the Muslim"; the tragic story of the Hooghly Trust which was so manipulated as to leave only a fraction of the millions of the trust for Muslim education; "they are a race ruined under the British rule," concluded Dr. Hunter. Well do our authors exclaim: "The Muslim League today is declaiming against the terrible 'atrocities' committed by the Congress Governments during the twenty-seven months that they were in office. It has, however, little to say about a Government which during a period of nearly a hundred years has perpetrated every injustice against the Muslim community. . . . You may take away by force all that a man possesses, and then call him magnanimous, you may do everything to sink him into the mire of poverty and ignorance and then talk of his culture, you may utterly ruin him and then call him a member of a great community. You may do all these things in India, for here unthinkable things are not only thinkable but do-able and often done."

A cold-blooded narration of the working of the British policy in India with the deliberate purpose of playing one community against the other demonstrates to the hilt the truth of the last sentence in the foregoing extract. "In the Montford Report, its distinguished authors expressed themselves against separate electorates, but nonetheless accepted them because of the Congress-League understanding. In 1933 the Communal Award was imposed for exactly the opposite reasons. In 1919 communalism was introduced because the two parties had agreed to it; in 1935 communalism was extended because the Hindus and the Muslims could not agree." The inexorable purpose throughout, of every detail of their policy, no matter how ludicrously inconsistent one may be from the other, is the crushing out of the spirit of nationalism and its strategic value in the perpetuation of the British heel. "The Government of India Act (1935) appreciably widened the franchise. 27.43 out of every 100 adult males in British India are voters. Here was material that nationalism could mobilize. The Government, however, took good care to frustrate such efforts. The electorate in 1919 was broken up into ten parts, now it is fragmented into seventeen unequal bits. Separate electorates were thrust, against their wishes, on women and the Indian Christians. The Hindu community was further weakened by giving separate representation to the scheduled classes.

Divisions on the basis of religion, occupation, and sex were made. Every possible cross-division was introduced." The share of every one of the Empire-builders, beginning with Mount Stuart Elphinstone, Lawrence, and Beck the original exponent of the two-nation theory, to Minto and Samuel Hoare — Lord Irwin's refusal to invite Dr. Ansari to the second Round Table Conference, and his mischievous Massey lecture might have been mentioned too — has been mentioned in its proper place. Amery and Cripps and Churchill and Attlee will deserve a special chapter in a second edition of the book. But the consummation was complete even before Amery and Co. came. The two-nation theory had been enunciated and tacitly accepted by the rulers and taken up as a war-cry by the misguided Mussalmans and Hindus.

That brings us to the brilliant chapters on the two nationalisms in India — the communal nationalism of the two rivals Muslim League and the Hindu Mahasabha and the democratic nationalism of the Indian National Congress — and the chapters on the Hindu Communalism and the movement for Pakistan. The authors have shown with ruthlessly impartial analysis how the illogicality of one communalism has provoked and stimulated the illogicality of the other; how their narrow self-interest has driven them from one impossible position into another; how the Muslim League shamelessly declares, 'we can go on multiplying the list' (not only of demands, but of 'atrocities' also) and how the Hindu Mahasabha sets up a board called the Hindu Militarization Mandal; how both are anxious for the Congress to fade out, so that the war of attrition exhausts both, destroys the Congress and leaves the field clear for the third Party. Both have no nobler urge than that of power politics, the one deluding itself with the will o' the wisp of a Hindudom meaning the maintenance, protection, and promotion of the Hindu race, Hindu culture, and Hindu civilisation, and the advancement of the glory of Hindu rashtra, and the other looking forward to the recreation of the exploded conception of a Muslim theocracy on the strength of methods and tactics which are aptly described as "spuriously Bismarckian" or Hitlerian.

As against this is the democratic nationalism of the Congress — which is not uni-national but broad-based on the fundamental rights of all India's diverse citizens — "recognising the need for nations to expand into peaceful federal units", eschewing violence and therefore all exploitation and "mercantilist adventures", — "as Mahatma Gandhi put it recently in his own inimitable way, Indians will go to Burma, but they will do so without guns". For, "only that nationalism can survive in the stress of the modern world which embraces federalism, is anchored in democracy and has an answer to the insistent challenge of war — viz., satyagraha . . . Lincoln condemned slavery because it degraded the master as much as the slave. The same could be said of modern warfare, for no matter how just your cause may be, war in the end will degrade it. One cannot fight the enemy without improving upon the enemy's weapons."

This last can alone be the foundation of a World Federation of Free States, whenever it can be formed. There are erudite chapters in the book on this and kindred subjects, but I must content myself with just a bare mention of them. In these days of spurious nationalisms which are at the root of all the welter of strife and bloodshed, it is something to see two socialist authors stand up for "a moral and political country" which, in the language of Burke, is "distinct from the geographical and which may possibly be in collision with it." "Nationalism," they declare, "has a meaning, it can enlist our allegiance only when its political and moral boundaries are co-terminous."

A question is asked: 'If Britain retires, would communal unity automatically come?' It will not come, for the simple reason that the several years' growth of poisonous weeds will have to be cleared and it may take some time, but the ground will be automatically created, and the poison-root removed, the weeds will not take long to be removed. It is in this work of removal of the weeds that constructive work will have to play a great part. The only hiatus that I have noticed in the book is a chapter surveying the work of those who have devoted themselves during the past twenty years to this task—not only of Gandhiji who fasted 21 days in order to awaken our consciences, but of numerous people like Appa Saheb Patwardhan who often risked their lives in the cause of unity. The epilogue devotes a para or two to methods of improving communal relations. But that is not enough. For only that kind of work will set unity on a firm foundation and prevent it from being wrecked again by outside third parties.

There is many an interesting feature of the book on which one would like to pause—the history of Hindu Muslim relations before the advent of the British, the numerous useful appendices containing facts and figures—but I must cut a long review short and commend the book to every Hindu and Muslim student for careful study. It is a distinct service rendered by the socialist friends and it deserves to be translated into every one of our provincial languages.

The Late Dr. Datta

In Dr. Datta, Principal of Forman Christian College, the country has lost a staunch Christian nationalist. I had the privilege of knowing him intimately soon after my return from South Africa. He was an intimate friend of the late Deenabandhu Andrews and he would not be satisfied until he had brought me in touch with every one of his friends. Dr. Datta worked wholeheartedly day and night at the Unity Conference during the anxious time of my 21 days fast in 1924 in Delhi. I saw him again equally earnestly at work at the time of the second Round Table Conference. His loss at this critical juncture in the country's history would be doubly felt. I tender my condolences to Mrs. Datta. His numerous friends will share her sorrow. Sevagram, 23-6-42

REPLY TO SIR S. CRIPPS

In an interview by the representative of the United Press of London regarding Sir Stafford Cripps' statement published in the press Gandhiji said:

"I have read Sir Stafford Cripps' statement to the United Press representative in London. It is not conducive to the proper understanding between different parties, if ascertainable facts are not admitted by all. Sir Stafford knows that I was disinclined to proceed to New Delhi. Having gone there, I intended to return the same day that I reached there. But Maulana Saheb would not let me go. I wish that I could have induced the Working Committee to take up its stand on pure non-violence. But it did not and could not. With it, rightly, politics were all important and it could not, not having the conviction, allow its deliberations to be affected by the issue of non-violence. The deliberations, therefore, of the Working Committee at New Delhi were carried on without any interference or guidance on my part. Therefore, the negotiations had nothing to do at any stage with the question of non-violence. I would not have brought out this fact, if it was not relevant to a calm consideration of the situation that faces British and Indian statesmen.

"Nor do I like Sir Stafford's description of my appeal for withdrawal of the British power as a walk-out. The appeal has been made in no offensive mood. It is the friendliest thing that I could do. It is conceived in the interest of the Allied cause. I have made it in a purely non-violent spirit and as a non-violent step. But this is merely personal to me. It is necessary to remember in considering my proposal that it is essentially a non-violent gesture. Such non-violence as India has or may have becomes impotent without the withdrawal of the British power—even as that part of India which will put up an armed fight becomes impotent. The step that I have conceived overcomes all difficulties, shuts all controversy about violence and non-violence and immediately frees India to offer her best help to the Allied cause and more especially to China which is in imminent danger. I am convinced that the independence of India, which the withdrawal of the British power involves, would ensure China's freedom and put the Allied cause on an unassailable basis."

FOR THE SIKH FRIENDS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Thus writes Sardar Mangal Singh:

"I wish to bring to your notice the objections raised against the Congress and against your personal attitude towards the Sikhs. I hope you will deal with them in a proper way in Harijan.

(1) The first and the great point made against the Congress is that the Congress does not care for the Sikhs. No Sikh has been taken on the Working Committee or even specially invited to attend the Working Committee meetings during the last 7 years. We tell them that Working Committee is not constituted on a communal basis, but this does not carry conviction with the general Sikh masses.

(2) Several years ago while discussing the thesis of non-violence in Young India you said that 'Guru Govind Singh was a misguided patriot' or words to that effect. When fiery speakers mention this it makes a great sentimental appeal to the Sikhs. I think you should explain your point of view.

(3) That you are against the bearing of Kirpan by the Sikhs.

(4) That you said to certain Sikhs that they should either follow Guru Govind Singh or yourself.

I personally know that the last two allegations have no foundations, but lies when repeated do acquire some importance. I hope you will agree with me that some elucidation is necessary from you. This will help the nationalist Sikhs and the Congress in the Punjab."

It is painful for me to have to write on this subject. Some of the points have been discussed thread-bare. When however suspicion usurps the place of reason, it becomes most difficult to remove it. But I cannot resist the inquiry of a fellow-worker especially when he makes it to smooth his way.

The first question is really for the Congress Secretary to answer. But I can say that for years Sardar Shardul Singh Caveesher was a member of the Working Committee. It is not always possible to provide for communal representation on the Working Committee. The policy should be and is to get the best men. The fact is that the Congress has always given the greatest consideration to the Sikh sentiment. It was for them that a special committee was appointed on the question of the colour of the National Flag. It was for them that the famous Lahore resolution on the communal question was framed. They have therefore the least cause for complaint against the Congress.

As to what I am supposed to have said about Guru Govind Singh, I can only repeat what I have said about the charge that I have no recollection whatsoever of having made the remark attributed to me. Whoever brings the charge should at least refer me to the passage in question in my writings. I have searched in vain. What is however more to the point is to know what I think about Guru Govind Singh. I have the highest regard for him. The popular belief is that it was he who gave the sword to the Khalsa. I have believed that to the extent that he did so he departed from the non-violence of his predecessors. This is not the place to examine or question the justification for the great Guru's step. A learned Sikh friend tells me that he could show that Guru Govind Singh never departed from the teachings of the preceding Gurus on non-violence. But such proof may have an academic value. The common belief as I have understood it among the Sikhs is that Guru Govind Singh accepted resort to the sword in well-defined circumstances as quite valid. Be that as it may, there never was the slightest disrespect on my part for the great Guru or the Sikh Panth. Indeed among the bhajans sung at the the Ashram prayers there are several of Guru Nanak's.

As to Kirpans I am afraid I must say that I do not like the wearing of Kirpan or the like by human beings as part of their religion. But my likes or dislikes can produce no effect on the Sikh practice. If by the question is meant whether I should vote for legislation prohibiting the wearing of Kirpans by the Sikhs, I can unhesitatingly say 'no' for the simple reason that I do not believe in making people non-violent by legislation.

The suggestion made in the fourth question is ridiculous. I have never considered myself as a religious teacher. I have never asked anyone to disown his own faith, in order to accept non-violence or my teaching. I have not known any religion to make violence obligatory. Most religions have permitted it, where non-violence is not possible. But I have no right to judge other religions. I entertain equal respect for all religions. I must if I expect others to respect mine.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A Fallacy

Q. You consider it a vital necessity in terms of non-violence to allow the Allied troops to remain in India. You also say that, as you cannot present a fool-proof non-violent method to prevent Japanese occupation of India, you cannot throw the Allies over-board. But, don't you consider that the non-violent force created by your action which will be sufficient to force the English to withdraw will be sufficiently strong to prevent Japanese occupation also? And is it not the duty of a non-violent resister to equally consider it a vital necessity to see that his country, his home and his all are not destroyed by allowing two foreign mad bulls to fight a deadly war on his soil?

A. There is an obvious fallacy in the question. I cannot all of a sudden produce in the minds of Britishers, who have been for centuries trained to rely upon their muscle for their protection, a belief which has not made a very visible impression even on the Indian mind. Non-violent force must not act in the same way as violence. The refusal to allow the Allied troops to operate on the Indian soil can only add to the irritation already caused by my proposal. The first is inevitable, the second would be wanton.

Again, if the withdrawal is to take place, it won't be due merely to the non-violent pressure. And in any case what may be enough to affect the old occupant would be wholly different from what would be required to keep off the invader. Thus we can disown the authority of the British rulers by refusing taxes and in a variety of ways. These would be inapplicable to withstand the Japanese onslaught. Therefore, whilst we may be ready to face the Japanese, we may not ask the Britishers to give up their position of vantage merely on the unwarranted supposition that we would succeed by mere non-violent effort in keeping off the Japanese.

Lastly, whilst we must guard ourselves in our own way, our non-violence must preclude us from imposing on the British a strain which must break them. That would be a denial of our whole history for the past twenty-two years.

A Bengali Mother's Two Questions

Q. Bengal is threatened by the Japanese menace. It is time now the political workers in this province composed their differences. I believe they will readily forget their domestic squabble only if the right person mediates. Would you not exert yourself to that end and save Bengal from the impending disaster?

A. What you say is too true. But I doubt if I am the right person to mediate. A Bengali should tackle the question. I would go to Bengal today, if I had the confidence that I could perform the trick. When one comes to think of it, the differences are too trivial to need any mediation.

Q. My husband is a teacher employed in a school of Calcutta. His income is already alarmingly diminished. It is apprehended in a month or so he will have no income at all. He has now seven dependants. Formerly he earned just enough to provide his family with the ordinary necessities of life. He has now nothing to fall back upon. I know my husband is patriotic and Congress-minded. But in order to be able to give us food he finds no alternative but to join war-service. What else can he do? What is your advice to those who are similarly stranded?

A. This is a very serious question. I know that joining the military is the shortest cut to bread-winning. If you and your husband are averse to all war like me, you will face starvation and prove your aversion. God will prevent you from dying of starvation. You might have to revise your way of living. Middle classes have to come down to the level of the peasantry. Then only shall we know real India and the way to deal with growing distress of the millions. But if you have no such aversion, I see no harm in your husband joining military service. He will do no worse than many are doing.

WITH KHADI WORKERS

On the 26th of June Gandhiji gave a couple of hours to the khadi workers in India most of whom had come for the annual meeting of the All India Spinners Association. That was also the occasion of distribution of certificates to the students of the Khadi Vidyalaya who had passed their examinations this year. The Vidyalaya and the examinations are all organised by the A. I. S. A. The course is an intensive one in the theory and practice of all the processes involved in the manufacture of khadi from the selection of the cotton-seed to getting the finished product ready for market, including account-keeping in all its details. Thus the study of the theory and practice of spinning includes the detailed mechanics of the wheels and the spindle and the strings; the practice includes practice on all the varieties of wheels and taklis, and so on.

Gandhiji after distributing the certificates gave a brief benedictory speech, in which he blessed both those who had passed and those who had failed. "For," said he, "these examinations are unlike the orthodox university examinations which are at best a test of book-knowledge and depend on the whims of examiners. Here even if you do not pass in your examinations what you have learnt is not lost, it has profited the country, failure means inadequate practice or work, and the next year you will increase your knowledge and production. Then the orthodox examinations prepare the examinees at best for clerkships, and those who pass have no illusions about adding anything to the wealth of the country, while even the failures amongst you have added something to the wealth of the country, if not quite as much as those who have passed. Then there is another very vital difference. The boys in the schools and colleges pay heavy fees, but far heavier than their fees are the expenses incurred by Government on their education. The country gets nothing by way of return for this enormous expenditure; if there is any little gain it belongs to an alien government. Then the system of examinations is most mechanical and tiring and calculated to add little to the examinees' intellectual calibre. Here the end in view is to qualify students to add more and more to the country's wealth, to stimulate originality and, apart from gaining them a living, render service of the country. One last point which if you have not grasped I want you to grasp today. Inasmuch as service of the country is the final aim, the failures have no cause for disappointment, the passes have no reason to look down upon the failures, and there is little scope for unhealthy rivalry. The students in the ordinary schools and colleges throw away their books after they have passed their examinations, for they think they are no longer going to be of use to them. Here you cannot afford to throw away your books or tools, for they are always of value, and once a khadi student is always a khadi student, he goes on adding to his knowledge and fitness as a khadi worker."

Gandhiji next addressed himself to a vital difference between spinning as practised in ancient times and as it is being taught and practised now. It is a thing which has to be borne in mind by both the taught and the teachers and the examiners, for the latter not only teach the students but teach themselves in the process. "The distinction I desire to invite your attention to is fundamental," said Gandhiji. "Our ancestors did spin and weave and produce their own cloth, but they were just spinners and weavers, toiling either for their bread or for their employers, e. g. the East India Company. There was little joy about their work, and no spirit of service or knowledge. They toiled because they could not help it, and often it was such irksome drudgery that it drove them to cut off their own fingers in order that the slave-drivers may drive them no more. Their toil was their slavery. They have left nothing for us to emulate. We have to do penance for and wipe out that slavery. Their toil would have been perfectly honourable, if there had been knowledge at the back of it, as also the desire for the country's freedom, the determination not to bend the knee to the slave-driver, and a sense of art. A revival of the industry means adoption of all these life-giving virtues, it means infusing new life into the dead bones of the old industry."

Questions and Answers

The first question discussed was about adding to the capital by making collections and raising loans. The collections could, it was explained, be made by every one of the branches, but they should be made on behalf of the A. I. S. A., which must determine the way of their disposal. Gandhiji had no objection to raising loans, but those who advanced loans must be told, in this uncertain time of war, they were taking obvious risks, though perhaps no more than deposits in banks. If we survive the war and the terrible struggle ahead, we should repay every pie, but if we don't survive, they stand every risk of losing their money. It is likely that no one would care to advance loans. It was better therefore to concentrate on self and sacrificial spinning, and on getting gifts of yarn and cotton.

"But those who advance loans to us may have another fear," some one asked. Even as it is there is the obvious risk of war, but by advancing loans to us they may feel that they add to their risk." "Then," said Gandhiji, "let them know they will have earned the merit of having lost money in a good cause."

"Would the struggle involve the khadi workers?" was another question.

"I am not going to make a call to the khadi workers", said Gandhiji. "But if there is a general conflagration khadi workers cannot escape it, should not escape it. You must know the full implications of that beautiful phrase, 'livery of freedom' applied to khadi by Jawaharlal. Khadi must not fetter us. You must also understand that I am not thinking of civil disobedience or non-cooperation of old. But there may be quixotic and arbitrary orders given to the people in the midst of whom we are working. We would reason with the authorities, but if they do not listen, we might be involved in spite of ourselves. Therefore no hard and fast rules can be laid down this time. Let us go on as usual unmindful of risks. Our inflexible rule is not to take part in politics, not to meddle with them."

There were a number of administrative questions asked and discussed. Summing up Gandhiji said: "All these may well prove irrelevant before the crisis that faces us. You must make no mistake about it. A conflagration is imminent and let us not have the slightest thought of saving our skins. If we do, we shall have plied our wheels and worn khadi in vain. Let it never be said the A. I. S. A. was an institution which would run no risk."

And with this he invited the workers to vivisection him regarding his new move. "If you feel it is mid-summer madness you must unhesitatingly tell me so. If you think anything I am doing is prompted by anger or passion you must not spare me. I think all that I am doing is prompted by the highest sense of non-violence and therefore for universal good. My readiness to allow foreign armies to stay in India for their own self-protection and for saving China should be enough proof of this."

There were questions and answers on this crucial question of foreign troops, for it was the only plank in the new programme to which many could not reconcile themselves. I will not give here Gandhiji's reply, as he discusses the question in this week's leading article.

OH! THE TROOPS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I have to pay a heavy price for having drawn up an entrancing picture of a Free India without a single British soldier. Friends are confounded now to discover that my proposal admits of the presence of British and even American troops under any circumstance at all. In vain do I argue that the Allied troops, if they remain, will do so not to exercise authority over the people, or at India's expense, but they will remain under treaty with the Government of Free India at the United Nations' expense for the sole purpose of repelling Japanese attack and helping China.

It has been pointed out that not to consent to the Allied troops remaining in India during the period of the war is to hand over India and China to Japan, and to ensure the defeat of the Allied powers. This could never have been contemplated by me. The only answer, therefore, to give was to suffer the presence of the troops but under circumstance the reverse of the existing. They will remain under permission of Free India and not at all in the role of masters but of friends.

My proposal presupposes shedding of all fear and distrust. If we have confidence in ourselves, we need neither fear nor suspect the presence of Allied troops.

May I suggest also that it is altogether premature and wrong to pore over the weakest points of a very difficult project which may not be accepted even with the troops remaining in India. It will be most assuredly an event of the century and may be a turning point in the war if Britain can honestly perform the act of renouncing India with all that the renunciation would mean. The virtue and the value of the renunciation in my opinion will not be affected in the least, because the Allied troops will be operating in India with the sole object of preventing Japanese attack. After all India is as much interested as the Allies in warding off the attack and yet under my proposal India will not have to pay a single pie over the expenses of the troops.

As I have already said in the previous issue of Harijan, the British acceptance of my proposal may itself lead to a most honourable peace and hence automatic withdrawal of the troops. I would therefore ask the doubters to concentrate their attention upon the grandeur of the proposed renunciation and help to the utmost of their power the fruition of the great act. Let them not dread the presence of the troops in India for the purpose indicated but regard it as an inevitable part of the proposal so as to make it not only justifiable but fool-proof. So far as I can see, Free India will run no risk by their presence. Her freedom will certainly suffer no diminution thereby.

The implications of my proposal are :

(1) India becomes free of all financial obligation to Britain;

(2) The annual drain to Great Britain stops automatically;

(3) All taxation ceases except what the replacing government imposes or retains;

(4) The deadweight of an all-powerful authority keeping under subjection the tallest in the land is lifted at once;

(5) In short, India begins a new chapter in her national life, as I shall hope to affect the fortunes of the war with non-violence as her predominant sanction. This non-violence will no longer take the shape of non-cooperation and the like. It will express itself in her ambassadors going to the Axis powers not to beg for peace but to show them the futility of war for achieving an honourable end. This can only be done if and when Britain sheds the gains of perhaps the most organized and successful violence the world has seen.

All this may not come to pass. I do not mind. It is worth fighting for, it is worth staking all that the nation has.

NOW IS THE MOMENT

Prof. Harold Laski's book Where Do We Go from here? is by far the most important "Penguin Special" published during the war. His main argument is that the way to victory lies through the revolt of the masses against their conquerors in the occupied countries, but that that revolt can come only by Britain setting the example by building a just and equal society. This again depends upon, what Prof. Laski calls, "the cleansing of our democracy" which has two aspects, viz., "our position as an empire", and secondly "our authority to persuade the peoples of the European continent that we genuinely seek a world-peace which definitely rules out the possibility of resuming war." Empire has, until now, meant life-trade, raw material, opening for successful career to thousands of young men, a standard of life for the local proletariat—but it is that Empire that has caused war and now is synonymous with death, as I showed in a previous article in these columns. Prof. Laski takes as an illustration of the Problem of Empire—the most pivotal of all—India. "India stands before us to-day," says Prof. Laski, "demanding freedom from our paramount power as unmistakably as Poland or Czechoslovakia demand freedom from the paramount power of Germany over them," and he describes vividly how that "paramount power" is being maintained. He says :

"Year by year, to maintain it, even in the revised form of 1936, we have to resort to special powers, the exercise of undemocratic authority, the wide use of the power to imprison and to flog. The few Indians of position we can produce to applaud our rule are men whom we have elevated for that purpose, who without the elevation, as both we and India know, would be against us and not for us. The main interest we support in India, apart from our own financial interest, is a mass of feudal princes of whom, with not more than six exceptions, it can, so far as the last half century is concerned, be said with literal accuracy, that the character of their governance competes, in barbarism and squalor, with that of the outlaws in Europe.

"The character of our rule in India, maintained in defiance of Indian demands, has long stained our reputation for plain dealing all over the world; until the advent of Hitler and Mussolini, it was the classic example of imperialist exploitation. We are squarely faced from India with a demand, insistently maintained, for self-government; and we know, within ourselves, that sooner or later we must yield to it, even though the risk to our interests of so yielding is a formidable one. But we cling to the maintenance of that interest by every pretext and device we can discover. The very statesmen who manipulate these pretexts and devices are most prolific in the announcement of their yearning for the fulfilment of India's ambition; Sir Samuel Hoare was even shameless enough to represent the Act of 1935, which ingeniously multiplied every protective device discoverable of reaction, as a long step on the road to that fulfilment. We announce that we shall put no obstacle in the way of Indian freedom; we only ask that all Indians of every sort shall first agree upon its pattern. And since that agreement is not forthcoming, we continue to govern India for our own purposes. Meanwhile, in the name of the Indian people, we ourselves take this and that decision on its behalf; and then proudly thank India for its generosity to us; or accept this gift or that from one or other of the Indian princes — their method of insuring their further protection from us — which we know is a gift mostly wrung from the misery of their unhappy subjects, and then exhibit these gifts as the proof of Indian "loyalty". I do not know how far we deceive ourselves by this technique; empire possesses a large capacity for self-deception. I do know that we deceive no people beyond the boundaries of our empire — least of all the Indian people themselves." (Italics ours.)

After stating the naked fact Prof. Laski proceeds to offer a solution which does credit to his sense of justice, but which now would seem out of keeping with the reality of the situation. He suggests a declaration that "self-government will begin to operate within a year of the conclusion of peace", the offer of a constituent assembly, the submitting of communal differences to independent arbitration, and so on. The book was published towards the end of the year 1940, and the solution, had it been applied then, might have been timely and might have worked admirably. But we have found that all solutions offered since then have been vitiated by the policy followed until now and described in the paragraph just quoted. In fact Prof. Laski is not unaware of this, for he says: "But as long as every vested interest in India is, like the Moslem interest, encouraged, openly or secretly, to believe that it will get better terms from dependence upon us than from a real attempt at accommodation with other Indian interests, of course agreement between them is not forthcoming. We patronize these dissidents from unity in the same way, though much more subtly, as the Conservative Party has so long patronized the separation of Ulster; and with the same evil consequences."

Now that is exactly what the Cripps' proposals gave ample proof of. But it is interesting to note that even Prof. Laski had no idea of the mischief that these proposals were fraught with, for he supported the proposals in advance in an article written a week before Sir Stafford Cripps' departure.

The fact is, as Prof. Laski has himself said, the "empire possesses a large capacity for self-deception", and there is no greater enemy of man than self-deception. The deception lies in the belief that those who hold the empire can judge the interests of those they hold in subjection, and to say the least the Cripps' proposals are vitiated by that belief. In fact, as a proposition Prof. Laski himself expounds it most ably:—

"The point I am making is the simple one that empire is a handicap to freedom whenever its subjects deny the validity of its maintenance. At that stage, it must either become a partnership or it degenerates into a tyranny. And it is particularly dangerous to permit that degeneration when it offers to our enemies an opportunity of reproach to which we have no adequate response. The plea made by our enemies that the real nature of our dominion is shown by the way in which we maintain our rule in India, we cannot answer by reference to a single Indian representative able freely to secure the full support of his own people. We can answer that plea only by saying that we are satisfied with our achievement there. But we have, in truth, no more right to constitute ourselves judges in our own cause than the Fascist leaders possess; less even, since we deny them that right so soon as its attempted application touches ourselves. A nation can justly stand as trustee of another people when it can be shown that no vested interest of its own is safeguarded by that trusteeship, and when a detached observer would admit, first, that the people so ruled do not claim freedom from trusteeship, and second, when the objective results of its exercise are clearly and mainly for the benefit of that people. Judged by these standards, it is, I think, clear that the sooner we end our paramountcy over India the better for Indians and for ourselves. And there is no moment more fitting to end it than in a war where we claim to be the world-defenders of democracy and freedom." (Italics ours)

That is the barest truth. No promises to be carried out after peace, but while the war is going on, and there is no better way of ending the paramountcy than by an orderly withdrawal, for it has one saving virtue, viz., those who hold the Empire cease to be judges of the interests of those held in subjection.

FRIENDS' AMBULANCE UNIT IN INDIA

The Friends' Ambulance Unit is a voluntary body of workers who share Quaker views on peace and war. Conscientiously unable to help in the war directly or in organisations set up to achieve ends by violent means, they still would share the sorrows and sufferings of a war-torn world and are therefore pledged to relieve suffering and heal the wounds of war wherever their services may be acceptable. They number about 700, are all unpaid, receiving only board and lodging, and pledged to go wherever they may be required. They have all received training in first aid, stretcher work, and anti-gas, and also training in hospitals. The Unit has worked, during the present war, in London and many parts of England, in Finland, Norway and Greece, in Central China and on the Burma Road, in Libya and Syria, and in hospitals in Germany, Poland and Hongkong.

After Japan entered the war some of the members felt that their experience in the bombed areas in Britain might prove of value in India, and it was proposed to send a small band to work, if possible, in cooperation with the volunteer agencies here. Accordingly a band of eight (six men and two women), with Prof. Horace Alexander of Woodbrooke College (Birmingham) as the leader, were told off to go to India, and Prof. Alexander and Mr. Richard Symonds have already arrived. Prof. Alexander is an old friend, belonging as he does to the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and having been a sympathetic student of Indian affairs for several years. Mr. Symonds is much younger and is not long down from Oxford, but has had considerable experience of the work to which they have been called, having organised medical aid in London shelters and done active evacuation work. The others who have not yet arrived and are still on the high seas are Messrs. Alec Horsefield, Brian Croves, Kenneth Criffin, Glanmore Davies, and Miss Jeane Coffle and Miss Pamela Bankhart, who have all had experience of work in the bombed areas in England.

"We were wondering if it was auspicious for an English party to arrive in India, when you were asking the British to withdraw," said Prof. Alexander with a kindly smile. "Agatha suggested that we might have a party from India to work with us, and make of our party a mixed party."

"My first writing," said Gandhiji, "did, I am afraid, give rise to that kind of fear. That was because I had not given expression to the whole idea in my mind. It is not my nature to work out and produce a finished thing all at once. The moment a question was asked me, I made it clear that no physical withdrawal of every Englishman was meant, I meant the withdrawal of the British domination. And so every Englishman in India can convert himself into a friend—as you have come as Friends—and remain here. The condition is that every Englishman has to dismount from the horse he is riding and cease to be monarch of all he surveys and identify himself with the humblest of us. The moment he does it, he will be recognised as a member of the family. His role as a member of the ruling caste must end for ever. And so when I said 'withdraw', I meant 'withdraw as masters'. The demand for withdrawal had another implication. You have to withdraw, irrespective of the wishes of anybody here. You do not need the consent of a slave to give him freedom. The slave often hugs the chains of slavery. They become part of his flesh. You have to tear them asunder and throw them away. You must withdraw because it is your duty to do so, and not wait for the unanimous consent of all the sections or groups in India.

"There is thus no question of the moment being inauspicious for you. On the contrary, if you can assimilate my proposal, it is the most auspicious moment for you to arrive in India. You will meet many Englishmen here. They may have entirely misunderstood what I have said, and you have to explain to them what exactly I want them to do.

"Really speaking, therefore, this should become the major part of your mission, and even the India Office who facilitated your coming here cannot possibly misunderstand you. You have, therefore, not only the humanitarian mission—there may not be any bombing here, and in this vast country even if there is bombing you may not be able to reach everywhere—but you have also this peculiar mission of interpretation and reconciliation. And it is well perhaps that your mission begins with me. Begin it with finding out what exactly is at the back of my mind by putting to me all the questions that may be agitating you."

That put both the friends at ease and prompted them to try to understand the whole of the background of Gandhiji's mind. And in this connection I may mention a curious but very significant fact. When Sir Stafford Cripps' mission was announced, Prof. Horace Alexander and Miss Agatha Harrison had sent Gandhiji a cable reminding him of the phrase Gandhiji himself had used, viz., "Andrews' legacy" meaning thereby that in memory of Andrews the best Englishmen and the best Indians should come together to bring about a permanent understanding between England and India. "Here," their cable seemed to say in effect, "is one of the best Englishmen coming to India. You had better settle with him, as there is a great opportunity."

It was in reply to this cable that Gandhiji wrote a long letter to Prof. Horace Alexander soon after the failure of the Cripps' mission,—a letter in which he gave expression for the first time to the demand for British withdrawal. He had not discussed it with any soul on earth, but as he was writing the letter the thing that was, so to say, cooking in his mind ever since his return from Delhi came to his pen. "Sir Stafford" he said in that letter, "has come and gone. How nice it would have been if he had not come with that dismal mission. . . How could the British Government at this critical hour have behaved as they did? Why should they have sent proposals without discussing them with the principal parties? Not one single party was satisfied. In trying to please all, the proposals pleased none.

"I talked to him frankly but as a friend, if for nothing else, for Andrews' sake. I told him that I was speaking to him with Andrews' spirit as my witness. I made suggestions, but all to no avail. As usual, they were not practical. I had not wanted to go. I had nothing to say being 'anti-all-wars'. I went because he was anxious to see me. All this I mention in order to give you the background. I was not present throughout the negotiations with the Working Committee. I came away. You know the result. It was inevitable. The whole thing has left a bad taste in the mouth."

And now comes the key paragraph: "My firm opinion is that the British should leave India now in an orderly manner and not run the risk that they did in Singapore, Malay and Burma. That act would mean courage of a high order, confession of human limitations, and right doing by India."

The letter was sent by air mail on the 22nd April, but Prof. Horace Alexander had left England before it could reach him. He was agreeably surprised when he found that he was the first person with whom Gandhiji had shared his great thought.

Gandhiji's talk was almost a commentary on the parts of the letter I have quoted. "You will see that I have used the words 'orderly withdrawal'. I had, when I used the phrase, Burma and Singapore in mind. It was a disorderly withdrawal from there. For they left Burma and Malay neither to God, nor to anarchy, but to the Japanese. Here I say: 'Don't repeat that story here. Don't leave India to Japan, but leave India to Indians in an orderly manner,'" said he, concluding a long talk. The whole talk, even as the letter I have reproduced, was inspired by the spirit of C. F. A., and the idea of asking the British to withdraw was conceived in the friendliest spirit, as it was done with a remembrance of C. F. A. and all his noble work. As Gandhiji said, "So you have now to do what Andrews did—understand me, pitilessly cross-examine me, and then if you are convinced be my messenger", Prof. Alexander felt overwhelmed and said: "We dare not assume his mantle. We can but try."

They propose to meet various people and see things for themselves before they decide where to start work. And they should take a little time, as their companions will not arrive until a week or more. Their work will be in cooperation both with the A. R. P. agencies and voluntary organizations, as the case may be.

BADSHAH KHAN'S POPULARITY

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Associated Press has circulated the following note about Khan Saheb:

"The Frontier Provincial Congress Committee has released the following statement:

"We warn the public against the false propaganda that is being carried on against Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, the undisputed leader of the Pathans, and the Khudai Khidmatgar movement, in certain sections of the press. It has been hinted that the differences have arisen among the workers and party-politics is raising its ugly head. Not a single Khudai Khidmatgar has so far resigned. They are all united like one man under Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan's leadership. All talk about parties among them has no foundation whatsoever. All these so-called differences etc. exist only in the imagination of a few interested people who are craving for offices and think that by encouraging such talk they can gain their end. The Government is at the back of all such propaganda. But these people have no following among the Frontier masses. Every true nationalist in the Frontier clearly realises that we can have nothing to do with the British Government in India, much less with offices. Whatever attraction the parliamentary programme may have elsewhere in India, it has certainly no place in the Frontier.

"Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan's peaceful constructive humanitarian work among the villages for the maintenance of internal security and self-sufficiency in matters of food and cloth has further endeared him to the people—especially the poor. He has been hoping to carry his message of peace and good-will even to the neighbouring tribes. He has been devoting all his energy to raise a non-violent and peaceful army who can render true service to the people under difficult days ahead. What the Government has failed to achieve at the cost of millions of rupees he is attempting to do with purely voluntary help. He deserves the sympathy and cooperation of every man, woman and child of the Frontier in this noble work. We hope that the Frontier masses will respond to his call and the Press and journalists of India who have the true interests of the country at heart will take a dispassionate interest in his work."

The Frontier Provincial Congress Committee has done well to pass the resolution and circulate the note. But Badshah Khan's reputation rests on much more solid ground than the resolution of the Frontier Provincial Congress Committee. It rests on the strength of selfless service rendered for nearly a quarter of a century and the affection of the people won through that service. In spite of traducers Khan Saheb has come triumphant through every ordeal so far. And I have little doubt that when the next test comes, he will show the same popularity as he has shown before.

Jodhpur

Shri Sriprakasa who went to Jodhpur at my request to do whatever he could to ease the atmosphere, interview the authorities and know their version of the affair has returned and given me his report which leaves no doubt that free use has been made by the authorities of the lathi in order to repress the people. He nevertheless tells me that some members of the Lok Parishad have not always been discreet in their language. He was told by the authorities that they had no objection to the Lok Parishad holding meetings and asking for responsible government so long as the language kept within bounds. He also tells me that the Jodhpur Government are anxious to reduce to some kind of order the admitted irresponsibility of Jagirdars, but that the passage from feudalism to legalism must take some time. So far as the treatment of political prisoners is concerned, Shri Sriprakasa has hope that it would be better, though he has also hope that, given some accomodation on the part of the local workers, there should be no political prisoners at all. If all his hopes are fulfilled, the visit although brought about accidentally, will have borne ample result and the hunger-strike of the prisoners and the sad death of Balmukund Bisa would not have gone in vain. Shri Sriprakasa tells me too that though the death was due somewhat, no doubt, to bad prison accomodation, there was no callousness on the part of the prison authorities. Deaths will occur even in the best of circumstances. We may not therefore always blame authority whenever a death occurs in a prison. Every case has to be examined and judged on merits. I understand that Balmukund Bisa was a very fine worker. He leaves a large family to mourn him. It is hoped that the citizens of Jodhpur will provide for the widow and children to whom I send my condolences.

Shri Sriprakasa has brought me a leaflet from Beawar, which contains language which a satyagrahi will not use. It is to be hoped that the workers will be careful in the choice of the language they use. I would ask them to keep themselves in touch with Shri (not Dr. as I had called him by mistake) Kachru who will be in Jodhpur till the whole trouble has subsided.

Hooliganism

The report of hooliganism at Rajaji's meeting in Matunga makes painful reading. Has Rajaji lost every title to respect because he has taken what seems to be an unpopular view? He went to Matunga on invitation. He was entitled to a patient hearing. Those who did not share his views might have abstained from attending the meeting, but having gone there they should have given him a hearing. They might have cross-questioned him. Those who tarred him and created a disturbance have disgraced themselves and have harmed their cause. Their way is neither the way to Swaraj nor 'Akhand Hindustan'. It is to be hoped that hooliganism of Matunga will be the last exhibition of barbarism. The calmness, good humour, presence of mind and determination that Rajaji showed that trying time were worthy of him. These must bring him many admirers, if not even followers. For people generally do not weigh the pros and cons of a problem. They follow their heroes. And Rajaji has never lacked the qualities that go to make a hero.

A Correction

A certain misunderstanding has been caused by the figures regarding hours of work given in the note on "Education through Handicrafts" in Harijan of 21-6-42. The total hours of work for each grade do not represent the hours devoted by all the children in that grade in the 27 basic schools; but the sum-total of hours actually devoted by one child of that grade in each of the 27 schools—in other words, the total hours devoted by 27 representative children of that grade in the 27 basic schools.

Basic Training Centre at Sevagram

A training centre of basic education will be opened at Sevagram by the Hindustani Talimi Sangh on August 1, 1942, to prepare workers and teachers of basic education both men and women.

Candidates seeking admission in the training centre should have faith in Gandhiji's constructive programme, and enthusiasm to work for the same. They should also be healthy and capable of putting in eight hours of strenuous work per day during their period of training. Their standard of general knowledge should not be below that of the present matriculation or its equivalent, but candidates of higher academic qualification will be preferred. Knowledge of English, however, will not be considered essential. Every candidate must bring a written assurance, either individually or on behalf of an institution, of working in the field of basic education after the completion of his or her training.

Institutions and individuals seeking further information should write to the Secretary, Hindustani Talimi Sangh, Sevagram, Wardha, for the prospectus.

For Middlemen

I am having pathetic letters from upper poor people bitterly complaining about grain merchants. The substance of these letters is, "why should we serve these merchants when they will not sell grain, though they have the stock, unless we pay prices higher than those fixed by the Government and in every case at prices beyond our reach? What is there left for us but to starve or loot?"

The complaint is just and universal. The Government is no doubt most answerable for this state of things. They have sent out grain and they do not know how to deal with the stock there is in the country. Prices must be regulated and there must be grain offices like post offices where people can buy grain like stamps. But people cannot starve while Government are learning wisdom. It is therefore the duty of the whole merchantile community to take the matter into their own hands and ensure a regular supply of grain to the poor at reasonable rates. The Government can't interfere with any such humanitarian effort. It will be a real help to them if the merchants perform what is their obvious duty. This requires voluntary co-operation of the whole merchantile community of India. But the beginning must be made with the provinces or even districts. The matter brooks no delay. Hunger knows no law and bread-or rather grain-riots are sure to break out all over the country if energetic benevolent measures are not taken in time.

A. I. S. A. and Kindred Institutions

The question of the connection with present politics of the members and the staff of the A. I. S. A., A. I. V. I. A., The Hindustani Talimi Sangha and the kindred institutions was raised at the recent meeting of the A. I. S. A. held in Wardha and is being raised by numerous correspondents. It is better therefore for me to give my opinion in sufficient detail for the guidance of the persons concerned. These institutions, though some are creations of the Congress, are wholly autonomous and unconnected with Congress or other politics. Their mission is humanitarian, social, educational, economic, or all combined. Their work is wholly constructive and creative. But it is true that most men and women in charge of them are Congress-men or Congress-minded, though they are open to all. There are cases of men unconnected with the Congress being found actively engaged in working or aiding them. These institutions must not lose this non-political character of theirs, if they are to retain their prestige, usefulness, and efficiency such as it is.

This is simple enough. But the question raised is complicated. It is clear that the members and the staff may not take part in any civil resistance movement and be still connected with these organisations. But what are they to do if they see a civil resister belaboured or a general lathi charge takes place in front of them? I say unhesitatingly that the workers in these institutions are bound to render such aid as they can at the moment without considering the consequences. This intervention is itself pure humanitarian work. Persons engaged in these institutions must not be cowards nor may their work be used as a halter round their necks making them useless for service. It is this fear of losing one's job or risking the safety of one's organisation that has played a large part in hindering our march to freedom. During the previous struggles all the most scrupulous care to avoid even the remotest suspicion of participation in politics did not save the men and these organisations from the attention of the authorities. Therefore the golden rule is to dare to do the right at any cost. But there should be no camouflage, no secrecy, no make-believe. Those who feel the urge to take part in the coming movement must resign before joining it. In all other respects the organisations should run their even course. Every moment they are building the temple of liberty and when it is won they will all be required as specialists for the numerous nation-building activities. Let them therefore diligently add to their knowledge and usefulness. During all these twenty-two years the true workers have proved their worth, they are responsible for creating and distributing lacs worth of material and lacs of rupees among lacs of poor men and women who, but for the work provided, would have lived in a state of semi-starvation.

THE GROUNDWORK FOR INDEPENDENCE

(By J. C. Kumarappa)

Before good bread can be made the dough has to be kneaded well. Similarly adequate preparation has to proceed any system of organisation if such a system is to be effective. Great preparations are needed to attain and maintain independence through non-violent means.

As we had long been taught to look at economics through the window of money economy most of us associate capitalism with a method of production in which accumulated wealth is sunk in the equipment needed to produce goods. This description is partly correct. If this were all, capitalism would have died long ago as there is no means of propagating itself. For the continuity of its existence capitalism has to create a clientele for itself by setting up social customs and fashions which people will follow without questioning their rationale. The life of any organisation depends on its capacity thus to make a place for itself. Therefore, a more correct classification would be the one which sorts out the methods of production according to the manner by which a system seeks to control the environment and circumstances of human beings so as to justify its existence and to create and retain its market and custom. Such a classification will be human rather than monetary.

An Enslaving System

The shopkeeper would like to see the wants of the people increase, he would like to supply their needs himself, and the more helpless the people are to help themselves the better will his own business be. Therefore, his interest is identical with making his customers depend on him. To this end he will study their needs most minutely and attempt to supply them better than they themselves can. The ultimate result of this will be the customer will become emaciated, numbed and paralysed for lack of scope to develop his faculties and the shopkeeper will become fat, flourishing and resourceful. This is what is happening under centralised methods of production. We witness the degradation of races and nations who have become dependent politically and economically on those who supply their wants under various masks of trusteeship for civilising backward races. They give their victims an opiate that with the aid of factory production people can raise their standard of living, can buy standardised goods cheaply and have more of them. In the measure in which manufacturers succeed in doping their victims into thinking that it is to the customer's advantage to take their help to that extent only can the manufacturers thrive.

We see such helplessness taking alarming strides in countries like the U. S. A. where a woman need not even cook her food. Everything is done for her. She can walk into a shop and get her soup tablets, meat and fish courses prepared and tinned, freshly made puddings and sweets, and well preserved fruits. All the trouble she needs to take is to set the table and dine. We find this trend in our country. Quaker oats, shredded wheat, corn flakes, jams, marmalade and hundred and one things are becoming more and more common, and half-baked medical men advocate these to ill-educated women and repeat the salesman's slogans about these food articles being richer in nutrition than home made wheat dhalia, seasonal fruits, etc. If this goes on, in a few years we may find our bazars stocked with chapaties, cooked dal and rice made in England and sent out in attractive containers and our ambitious medical men may tell us that these very articles prepared in the English climate and latitude have special food values as compared with food made in India! Women who have more money than sense will patronise them. In time the art of cooking will be forgotten, but the London manufacturers will flourish. We need only look around with our eyes open to know that this is no fairy tale. The capitalistic structure of centralised production rests on the tombstones of its customers. Therefore, judged from the point of view of its effect on human beings, centralised production may be appropriately described as an enslaving, parasitic, or as Tagore would have it, cannibalistic system. Once the victim realises the true situation, bestirs himself and sets about supplying all his own needs the capitalist's reign is doomed.

An Emancipating System

As against this, a method of production and consumption which will awaken the people to realise their own possibilities will be emancipatory, creative or evolutive system. Our villages can meet their wants in two ways: 1. provide what they need by their own efforts, and 2. forego such of what they need as cannot be supplied by themselves. The reaction will be progressive self-reliance and self-advancement, though in the beginning the so-called standard of living may appear low. Our goal is a state where the villagers will supply all their own requirements and that of the city people. Their effort to do so will bring employment to millions and make for a better circulation of money. This is the only permanent way of dispelling poverty and creating wealth.

Freedom

What shall we do with political freedom even if it is given as a gift? It will be meaningless as we shall not be able to turn it to good account. As our people learn to produce all that is needed by the country they will acquire self-reliance which is the basis of freedom, while dependence on others is the essence of slavery. When the villagers have become self-reliant, and attain freedom, they will be able to look after themselves. Their panchayats will function, they will settle their own disputes and banish litigation, they will control their water-supply and sanitation, build their own roads, run their schools and to an extent tax themselves and thus govern themselves. If we are not prepared to take up all this responsibility our second state will be worse than the first.

As a corollary to this, such discipline and initiative as may be generated by self-directing and regulating villages will enable us to put up a non-violent barrage of defence against any foreign aggression, without submitting to the humiliating experience of begging other nations to help defend our own hearths and homes.

GURU GOVIND SINGH

(By M. K. Gandhi)

At last after diligent search Mahadev Desai and others have traced the writing in which I have referred to Guru Govind Singh. It appears in Young India of 9th April, 1925. It is headed 'My Friend the Revolutionary'. I would commend it to my Sikh friends and, for that matter, others the whole of the article. It is seasonable and they will profit by it, whether they accept or reject the views propounded in it. Here I must content myself with only relevant extracts from that article. Here they are:

"One of your objections against the revolutionaries is that their movement is not mass-movement, consequently the mass at large will be very little benefitted by the revolution, for which we are preparing. That is indirectly saying that we shall be most benefitted by it. Is it really what you mean to say? Do you believe that those persons who are ever ready to die for their country—those mad lovers of their country—I mean the revolutionaries of India in whom the spirit of Nishkama Karma reigns, will betray their motherland and secure privileges for a life—this trifling life? It is true that we will not drag the mass just now in the field of action, because we know that it is weak; but when the preparation is complete we shall call them in the open field. We profess to understand the present Indian psychology full well, because we daily get the chance of weighing our brethren along with ourselves. We know that the mass of India is after all Indian, it is not weak by itself but there is want of efficient leaders; so when we have begot the number of leaders required by constant propaganda and preaching, and the arms, we shall not shrink from calling, and if necessary, dragging the mass in the open field to prove that they are the descendants of Shivaji, Ranajit, Pratap and Govind Singh. Besides we have been constantly preaching that the mass is not for the revolution but the revolution is for the mass. Is it sufficient to remove your prejudice in this connection?"

I neither say nor imply that the revolutionary benefits if the masses do not. On the contrary, and as a rule, the revolutionary never benefits in the ordinary sense of the word. If the revolutionaries succeed in attracting, not 'dragging', the masses to them, they will find that the murderous campaign is totally unnecessary. It sounds very pleasant and exciting to talk of 'the descendants of Shivaji, Ranjit, Pratap and Govind Singh'. But is it true? Are we all descendants of these heroes in the sense in which the writer understands it? We are their countrymen, but their descendants are the military classes. We may in future be able to obliterate caste, but today it persists, and therefore the claim put up by the writer cannot in my opinion be sustained.

"Last of all, I shall ask you to answer these questions: Was Guru Govind Singh a misguided patriot because he believed in warfare for noble cause? What will you like to say about Washington, Garibaldi and Lenin? What do you think of Kamal Pasha and De Valera? Would you like to call Shivaji and Pratap well meaning and sacrificing physicians who prescribed arsenic when they should have given fresh grape-juice? Will you like to call Krishna Europeanised because he believed also in the vinasha of dushkritas?"

This is a hard or rather awkward question. But I dare not shirk it. In the first instance Guru Govind Singh and the others whose names are mentioned did not believe in secret murder. In the second, these patriots knew their work and their men, whereas the modern Indian revolutionary does not know his work. He has not the men, he has not the atmosphere, that the patriots mentioned had. Though my views are derived from my theory of life I have not put them before the nation on that ground. I have based my opposition to the revolutionaries on the sole ground of expedience. Therefore, to compare their activities with those of Guru Govind Singh or Washington or Garibaldi or Lenin would be most misleading and dangerous. But by test of the theory of non-violence I do not hesitate to say that it is highly likely that, had I lived as their contemporary and in the respective countries, I would have called every one of them a misguided patriot, even though a successful and brave warrior. As it is, I must not judge them. I disbelieve history so far as details of acts of heroes are concerned. I accept broad facts of history and draw my own lessons for my conduct. I do not want to repeat it in so far as the broad facts contradict the highest laws of life. But I positively refuse to judge men from the scanty material furnished to us by history. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Kamal Pasha and De Valera too I cannot judge. But for me as a believer in non-violence out and out they cannot be my guides in life in so far as their faith in war is concerned. I believe in Krishna perhaps more than the writer. But my Krishna is the Lord of the Universe, the creator, preserver and destroyer of us all. He may destroy because He creates. But I must not be drawn into a philosophical or religious argument with my friends. I have not the qualifications for teaching my philosophy of life. I have barely qualifications for practising the philosophy I believe. I am but a poor struggling soul yearning to be wholly good—wholly truthful and wholly non-violent in thought word and deed, but ever failing to reach the ideal which I know to be true. I admit, and assure my revolutionary friends, it is a painful climb, but the pain of it is a positive pleasure for me. Each step upward makes me feel stronger and fit for the next. But all that pain and the pleasure are for me. The revolutionaries are at liberty to reject the whole of my philosophy. To them I merely present my own experiences as a co-worker in the same cause even as I have successfully presented them to the Ali Brothers and many other friends. They can and do applaud whole-heartedly the action of Mustafa Kamal Pasha and possibly De Valera and Lenin. But they realise with me that India is not like Turkey or Ireland or Russia and that revolutionary activity is suicidal at this stage of the country's life at any rate, if not for all time, in a country so vast, so hopelessly divided and with the masses so deeply sunk in pauperism and so fearfully terror-struck."

I reverted to the same subject in another article written a short time after, from which I need take only the following lines:

"My belief about the Sikh Gurus is that they were all deeply religious teachers and reformers, that they were all Hindus, and that Guru Govind Singh was one of the greatest defenders of Hinduism. I believe too that he drew the sword in its defence. But I cannot judge his actions nor can I use him as my model so far as his resort to the sword is concerned."

It must be clear even to him who runs that I never applied the word 'misguided patriot' to the Great Guru and that I have not written a word in disrespect or of which I have any reason to be ashamed or to repent. I abide by every word I have said in that article. I hope that now that the source of the mischief has been traced it will abate entirely and the Sikhs will count me, though a humble Hindu, as a fellow devotee of the Panth. Sevagram, 4-7-'42

TO MUSLIM CORRESPONDENTS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"How can you think of a mass movement for liberation without first closing with Muslims?" ask Muslim correspondents whose letters fill my file. I used at one time to think like my correspondents. But I see that for the moment I cannot reach the Muslim mind. The Muslim League blocks my way. I try to read the League newspapers. They give me a peep into the League mind in so far as they represent it. In their opinion I am thoroughly untrustworthy. Even my services during the Khilafat days wear for them a sinister meaning. I am quite clear in my mind that this is a passing phase. I am not aware of having done a single disservice to any Muslim cause or a Muslim person. Thank God, even today I claim numerous Muslim friends.

I do not know how to get rid of the distrust. "Give Pakistan", say my critics. I answer, "It is not in my giving." If I felt convinced of the rightness of the demand, I should certainly work for it side by side with the League. But I do not. I would like to be convinced. Nobody has yet told me all its implications. Those that are described in the anti-Pakistan Press are too terrible to contemplate. But I cannot take them from the opposition. Only the protagonists know what they want and mean. I plead for such an exposition. Surely Pakistanis want to convert the opposition, not to force them? Has an attempt been ever made to meet the opposition in a friendly manner and to convert them? I am sure the Congress is willing to be converted, let alone me.

But what I am to do meanwhile? I feel that now is the time for India to play an effective part in the fortunes of the war, if she becomes free from British servitude. I am convinced too that nothing stands in the way of that freedom except British unwillingness to give up India as the happy hunting-ground for the British that she has been for three centuries. If she gives up India, she might as well give up fighting, says the imperialist. If such is the case, what is all this war for? The original fighters are Great Britain and Germany. Was India the hidden stake between the two? This is all speculation I know. The truth will be known presently. Thinking Indians cannot idle away their time. I think that even a large number, if not all of us, prepared to undergo any sacrifice that may fall to our lot, would impress the British rulers that they can no longer hold India as a British possession. I believe too that such a number is available. Needless to say, their action must be non-violent, irrespective of their belief, as even a military man's has often to be, on behalf of his cause. The fight has been conceived in the interest of the whole of India. The fighters will gain no more than the poorest Indian. They will fight, not to seize power but to end the foreign domination, cost what it may.

What will happen after, if ever we reach that stage, will depend upon how we act when the all-powerful British hand is withdrawn. We may quarrel among ourselves or we may adjust our quarrels and agree to set up ordered rule on behalf of the people. It may be a democratic constitution or unadulterated autocracy or oligarchy. The conception is not that of a settlement with the British Government. That could happen only if there is a settlement between the principal parties, and as a preliminary the Congress and the League. But that so far as I can see is not to be.

Therefore the only settlement with the British Government can be that their rule should end leaving India to her fate. Thus assuming that the British leave, there is no government and no constitution, British or other. Therefore there is no Central Government. Militarily the most powerful party may set up its rule and impose it on India, if the people submit. Muslims may declare Pakistan and nobody may resist them. Hindus may do likewise, Sikhs may set up their rule in territories inhabited by them. There is no end to the possibilities. And to all this idle speculation let me suggest one more addition. The Congress and the League being best organised parties in the country may come to terms and set up a provisional government acceptable to all. And this may be followed by a duly elected Constituent Assembly.

The movement has only one aim—that is of displacing the British Power. If that happy event comes about and if it is followed by a stable government, it will most assuredly decide the fate of the war—I shall hope in a non-violent manner. India can show no other strength during this war at any rate. Why should not Muslims who believe in Pakistan but also believe in Independent India join such a struggle? If on the other hand they believe in Pakistan through British aid and under British aegis, it is a different story. I have no place in it.

OUR ORDERED ANARCHY

In the midst of a world of woes the following account of conditions and happenings in Orissa may be passed over lightly by the casual reader. But though the blood and thunder may be less than that of the war fronts, the root tragedy it brings to view is deeper. That tragedy is perpetrated by one belligerent nation on another, whereas this tragedy is perpetrated by a so-called protecting government on its subjects.

I came to Orissa on May 11th. Since then I have been almost continually moving about the province, in the company of Babu Harekrishna Mehtab, visiting places where people are in trouble and distress, owing to the present crisis. We have toured through the villages, putting up as we went along, in the peasants' little homes and we have had public and private meetings in big towns, besides which I have had interviews and discussions with government officials of all grades from the Chief Secretary to village clerks. The following description is based on these experiences.

It is difficult to know where to begin and on what to concentrate in such a tale of confusion and suspicion. So in order to give a living picture to the reader, I will depict in detail one scene in the drama, and make but a passing mention of the rest.

On the day of my arrival we started straight off for a tour of the coastal area where the little villages are dotted about like islands in a vast sea of brown fields. When the rains come these lands go under water, and the villages become islands indeed. Throughout these flood areas, all along the coast, the villagers have been ordered to immobilize their boats. At every place where we went, the villagers told us that to be without their boats in the rains would literally mean death. There is no other means of getting about. Even for answering the calls of nature it is necessary to go in a boat. The villagers were in despair. "Are we then to be killed even before the Japanese invasion?" they asked. "No, you must gather up courage when the floods come and resist such an order." What else could we say?

After this experience, we were faced with the problem of the canal districts. Here all the canals have been kept dry by order of the military authorities, lest the waterways might be of use to the Japanese. Each year the canals are dried off for a certain period; but before cutting off the water, notice is given, and the villagers have time to fill up their tanks and other water-supplies. This time no notice was given, and the villagers were left high and dry. When the usual season came for letting in the water nothing was done, and the canals have remained dry. The working of the land has been all upset and the villagers have been put to great hardship. Appeals have been sent up to the government, but the reply is always that the matter has been referred to the military department, from where no answer comes. One wonders how much, if at all, these orders have been thought out. When I look at these broad dry canal beds they strike me as more serviceable for bringing up tanks and other heavy equipment, than they would be if full of water.

After drying up the canals the government got the bright idea of sending round the province 50 propagandists for the "grow more food" campaign. "But what is this!" exclaimed the unfortunate propagandists, "the canals are all dried up." "O yes, the canals are dry, you had better appeal to the military department."

Now at last the rains have begun.

In the cities there is an atmosphere of helplessness and panic, specially since the government notice of May 24th prohibiting the formation of any volunteer organizations for self-protection or any groups for patrolling, except under government authority and guidance. This notice has had a very bad effect, especially amongst the merchants who do not dare to keep proper stocks of food. Cuttack, which will be completely isolated if the bridges are blown up, is running now-a-days, on a fortnight's supply and Puri, which gets its stocks from Cuttack, is still more hand-to-mouth. There the merchants' troubles are further increased by the fact that bookings for goods between Cuttack and Puri are often closed without notice, and for indefinite periods. Reasoning and appeals are at present being tried for getting the government to revise its policy regarding self-protection.

And now for the scene which I want to depict in detail, and which, indeed, is not yet finished. As I write these lines I am sitting in the village where the main tragedy occurred only six days ago.

While staying in Cuttack I began to hear accounts of an aerodrome that is being prepared in this area, and the government plans for evacuating several villages around the site. I decided to go and have a look at the place, and about the end of May spent two days with the District Congress workers bicycling around the area. What I saw and heard was very disquieting, and as soon as our programme would enable us, I planned to return with Mehtab Babu, who was engaged elsewhere at the time of this first visit.

In the meantime we put the matter before the Chief Secretary, the Collector and subordinate government officials. They listened sympathetically, especially the Collector, who expressed himself anxious to do everything he could, within reason, to alleviate the plight of the villagers. The position was briefly as follows: Lands for the site of an aerodrome were requisitioned last December. Most of the land is bare, rocky upland, the property of a zemindar. Round the edge of this upland many villages are situated, and a few of their fields were also requisitioned. The chief difficulty, however, arose when the military department announced its intention of taking possession of eight of these villages, and then too, before the rains. Orders for evacuation were served only in the beginning of June. The civil administration took up the military instructions and proceeded to warn the villagers that they must go to sites two to three miles off which would be allotted to them. The villages were measured and evaluated for compensation, and everything pointed to an immediate evacuation. At the same time the new sites had not been prepared, not even wells or tanks had been dug. the compensation fixed upon was quite inadequate and the monsoon was now rapidly approaching, when all building operations would become impossible. The villagers were desperate and said they would rather die of bombs in their homes, or risk the perils of attempted evacuation by force, than go out into the rains to die of exposure and want.

Alongside this evacuation dilemma, the problem of imported labour had been unnecessarily created. Though large quantities of local labour were available some 3,000 labourers had been imported from Hyderabad (Deccan), U. P., Travancore and Cochin. These were paid Re. 1/- a day, along with food, and the local labourers were paid, for the same work, 6 annas per day with no extras. This naturally led to heart-burning and then, added to this, the new labourers were housed in camps built right alongside, and in some cases half inside, these villages. For this huge imported population, as well as for the cement-work and road-making in the aerodrome, no special water-supply was provided for; for all purposes the wells and tanks of the villagers were drawn upon. For sanitation no kind of arrangement was made. And then, finally, as if occasion for frictions and fracas were not enough, toddy-shops were added. One big village was burdened with no less than 1,500 Travancore and Cochin labourers and a toddy-shop right up against the side of the village. The inhabitants sent up a petition to the Collector, but before it could pass through the red-tape labyrinths of officialism, the explosion came.

On the morning of June 14th, for a trifling reason, the outside labourers rushed into the village with sticks, stones and fire, and before anyone could bring them under control, 40 villagers had been wounded, 258 rooms including bazar shops had been burnt and looted and 88 families rendered homeless and propertiless.

We heard the news first through the Collector who had just received the information, when we went to him in Cuttack for a discussion on the evacuation problem. So here was a new problem, or rather the fruits of the other, in bitterest form! Investigation, and temporary relief had to be organized forthwith. The Marwaris, as is their wont, were first in the field with distribution of grains, and government servants of all grades came rushing in. The law is now going through its tortuous channels of identification, attestation, application, evaluation and the rest. In these matters, I am happy to say, the government officials are willingly taking our help.

It is to be hoped that ultimately substantial relief will be granted, for the villagers have been the helpless victims of gross mismanagement and confusion of government departments, civil and military. But who is to blame? Both the Collector (Indian) and the Flying Corps Officer (British) in command at the aerodrome, are good, sincere people, from whom I have received immediate sympathy and help in all matters connected with the villagers. It is the system, the foreign system, the foreign language, the foreign rule in all its ugliness, bound up in prestige and red-tape and giving shelter to all sorts of imprincipled, time-serving officials, contractors and other hangers-on.

In the midst of this tragedy the evacuation problem had to be immediately settled as the rains are upon us, and I am thankful to say that, thanks to the sympathetic attitude of the Collector and the military officer in command, the evacuation has been postponed for the duration of the rains, and the question of compensation will be reconsidered in detail. At the same time it has been agreed that as much local labour as possible should be employed, at 12 annas per day (instead of 6), that the outside labourers should be reduced to a minimum, and that those, if any, that remain shall now be removed to an isolated camp, out of direct touch with any of the villages.

The cause of the looting and arson is still under investigation, but one fact alone, which has come to light, makes matters sufficiently clear. A number of these coolies, especially those from Travancore, are criminals released from jail for sending out in labour corps. Many of them have tough records of crime to their account. To put such men in the company of hundreds of rough labourers, pay them Re. 1/- and food per day, and station them in an open camp by the side of a large village with a well stocked bazar, was to invite certain trouble.

And now the village is a pitiable sight. The burnt houses stand gaunt and roofless, with nothing left but the blackened mud walls. Inside not a burnable thing remains. Furniture, grain, clothes, everything except iron fittings, tool heads and utensils, have vanished into smoke and ashes.

From house to house, from quarter to quarter I went, seeing the same heart-rending destruction. In one little home the owner, with shaking hands and trembling voice, showed me the burnt out room where his child had been born only the day before the attack. The next morning the young mother had to rise up and fly as best she could with the baby in her arms. "And there," he said, pointing to a corner in the yard, "our goat was burnt to death. The cow escaped, but what has happened to the calf we do not know. It is lost or killed." Then he showed me the black heaps of smouldering rice and pulses—his precious little stocks of food to see him and his family through these hard times—all gone.

Such is the ruin and sorrow that administrative mismanagement and muddle can bring upon innocent people in the twinkling of an eye!

"FOR WHITES ONLY"

[Pearl Buck is the only American woman to win the Nobel Prize for literature, awarded for her great novels forming a kind of Chinese saga — The Good Earth and others. She lived for seventeen years in Nanking, and has now written a novel Dragon Seed describing the fall and rape of the city after the Japanese assault. She is one of the editors of Asia which may be said to be devoted exclusively to the cause of democracy for all peoples — white, black or yellow. Her appeal to Americans to put their own house in order in the following article condensed from the March number of Asia is timely and applies to Britain as well. The caption of her article is Tinder for Tomorrow, meaning thereby that unless the Allies give visible evidence of their fight being not only for the white people but for all the races they have suppressed, that fact in itself will supply enough material for a fiercer conflagration tomorrow. The extracts are reproduced here to show that Gandhiji's demand for withdrawal has the support of the best mind of America. M. D.]

Worse than Folly

.....Race prejudice continues unabated among white people today, the Japanese are saying. Tokyo radio programs daily send their broadcast over Asia in their campaign to drive out the white man. They dwell upon white exploitation of colored troops and cite mistreatment of Filipinos by the American military and similar treatment of Indian troops by the English.

.....The truth is that the white man in the Far East has too often behaved without wisdom or justice to his fellow man. It is worse than folly — it is dangerous today — not to recognise the truth, for in it lies the tinder for tomorrow. Who of us can doubt it who has seen a white policeman beat a Chinese coolie in Shanghai, a white sailor kick a Japanese in Kobe, an English captain lash out with his whip at an Indian vender — who of us, having seen such oriental sights or heard the common contemptuous talk of the white man in any colored country, can forget the fearful bitter hatred in the colored face and the blaze in the dark eyes? Who of us can be so stupid as not to see the future written there? The most dangerous human stupidity has been that of the white race in the baseless prejudice through which even the meanest of white creatures has felt he could despise a king if his skin were dark. Yet, if this stupidity were limited to the mean, how easily it might be cured! But among us even some who are able, even some who are good, are sometimes so blind.

The effect therefore of this Japanese propaganda cannot be lightly dismissed. It lies uneasy in the minds and memories of many at this moment who are loyally allied with Britain and the United States, in the minds and memories of colored peoples of Asia. Yes, and it lies uneasy, too, in the minds and memories of many colored citizens of the United States who cannot deny the charge and must remain loyal in spite of it. For such minds realize that, though Nazism may give them nothing but death, yet the United States and Britain have given them too little for life in the past and not even promises for the future. Our colored allies proceed to war against the Axis not deceived or in ignorance. They know that it may not be the end of the war for them even when Hitler has gone down and Nazism is crushed and Japan returned to her isles again. The colored peoples know that for them the war for freedom may have to go on against the very white men at whose side they are now fighting.

Fulfil Conditions Today

We must realize, we citizens of the United States, and this whether Britain realizes it or not, that a world based on former principles of empire and imperial behavior is now impossible. It cannot exist. We must make clear our determination for real democracy for all peoples with mutual responsibility demanded of all to fulfil its conditions. Nor can we postpone such decision for democracy by saying, "Let's win this war first." We cannot even win this war without convincing our colored allies — who are most of our allies — that we are not fighting for ourselves as continuing superior over colored peoples. The deep patience of colored peoples is at an end. Everywhere among them there is the same resolve for freedom and equality that white Americans and British have, but it is a grimmer resolve, for it includes the determination to be rid of white rule and exploitation and white race prejudice, and nothing will weaken this will.

.....But if they are not soon convinced, and by unmistakable means, of the sincere democratic determination of the English and Americans, if they fear that they must be reduced one day to fighting for themselves, there will be many thoughtful men and women who will declare openly what they are now thinking and saying secretly, "Will it not be better for us to come to terms, not with Hitler, who is after all a white man of the most arrogant type, but with Japan, and utilize the military and modern resources of that country to free us from white rule?"

It takes no great practical sense for any colored people to see that even if Japan took the position over them of conqueror it would be easier to get rid of one victor than of several. There could have been nothing reassuring or comforting to our Asiatic allies in the closing words of Churchill's first speech in Washington, "The British and American peoples will, for their own safety and the good of all, walk together side by side in majesty, justice and peace." An England, a United States, "walking together in majesty", can only mean to the colored peoples a formidable white imperialism more dangerous to them than anything even a victorious Japan can threaten.

Disprove Japan's Charges

The United States and England are at a very critical moment in this War. Our allies, India, China, the Philippines and Malaya, are waiting for us, whether they tell us so publicly or not, to make clear the stand of the white peoples toward them. Are we all-out for democracy, for total justice, for total peace based on human equality, or are the blessings of democracy to be limited to white people only? The answer must be made clearly and quickly.

To evade the question, to delay the answer, is to reply in the negative, and the United States must now take the lead.

For we cannot now trust to English minds however we admire them, nor to English leadership, however strong. We must think and act for ourselves. If our allies cannot be assured, America may find herself deserted in the Pacific when she supremely needs allies there. It is only natural that England should think first and most of Hitler, the wolf at the door. It is to be expected that English minds cannot take seriously enough the full threat of Japan also to us. Why should they when Americans themselves have not taken Japan seriously enough and do not now take any Asiatic people seriously enough? Pearl Harbor and Manila are today awful witnesses of our ignorance. There will be other witnesses as stern before we are done with this war. If England cannot understand fully our danger in the Pacific, let us not ourselves be misled. We Americans face the Orient as well as Europe, and we face it not as the ruler of a great subject people held under military power. We face an Asia in which we have no long-established power. It is too dangerous for us to accept any estimate of the Pacific except our own. We must for our own sakes give our allies in the Far East confidence in our leadership toward full democracy.

But can the United States provide such leadership? This also the Far Eastern allies are asking. Japan is busily declaring that we cannot. She is declaring in the Philippines, in China, in India, Malaya and even Russia that there is no basis for hope that colored peoples can expect any justice from the people who rule in the United States, namely, the white people. For specific proof the Japanese point to our treatment of our own colored people, citizens of generations in the United States. Every lynching, every race riot, gives joy to Japan. The discriminations of the American army and navy and the air forces against colored soldiers and sailors, the exclusion of colored labor in our defense industries and trade unions, all our social discriminations, are of the greatest aid today to our enemy in Asia, Japan. "Look at America," Japan is saying to millions of listening ears. "Will white Americans give you equality?"

Who can reply with a clear affirmative? The persistent refusal of Americans to see the connection between the colored American and the colored peoples abroad, the continued, and it seems even wilful, ignorance which will not investigate the connection, are agony to those loyal and anxious Americans who know all too well the dangerous possibilities.

Declare for Democracy Today

..... Our ignorance of how they feel is dangerous as the ignorance of England is dangerous, as the ignorance of France was dangerous even to destruction. But ours is a peculiar danger, for one tenth of our own nation is colored. Our relation to the colored peoples and democracy does not even lie so far off as Africa or India. It is just outside our doors, it is inside our homes. The deepest loyalties today are not national.

But even if Americans realize our danger, our responsibility, our peculiar position, can we produce the necessary leadership for democracy? What is this division between our belief in democracy for all and our practice of democracy only for some? It is not hypocrisy. We Americans are not hypocritical except in small, amusing ways. Talk to any dirt American and he honestly believes in equality and justice and in giving everybody democratic rights. But mention to him the colored man and you will not believe your own ears. This cannot be the same man talking, you will say. No, the colored man cannot have the same treatment as the white man, it seems. "Why?" you inquire. The white American scratches his head. "Well, it just don't work that way," he says, and thereby gives huge comfort to our present enemies, the Japanese.

What is the matter with this American? It is clear enough. He suffers from what is called in psychology a split personality. He is two distinct Americans. One of him is a benevolent, liberty-loving, just man. The other one of him is a creature who may or may not be benevolent but who is certainly undemocratic in his race attitudes, and who, on this subject, throws justice and human equality to the winds as completely as any Fascist.

..... Russia is justly proud of her freedom from race prejudices. But let Americans be sure of this — unless we can declare ourselves whole for total democracy now, we shall lose our chance to make the world what we want it to be, we shall lose even our place in the world, whatever our military victories are. For most of the people in the world today are colored.

How can we integrate ourselves for democracy? The first step toward unifying a split personality is to realize that there is the split. The next step is to reject the undesired self. We must be willing to see that our inner division has the gravest relation now to other events, to the success of this war for us, to world events which will shape an entirely new era. Whether it will be a golden age of democracy depends entirely on whether we choose democracy now.

We know this better than we are willing to acknowledge. It must be sternly said that it is the white peoples who have the deepest race prejudices. This is in itself a sign of insecurity and fear. And we do well to be afraid if we intend to persist blindly in our prejudices. If we plan to persist as we are, then we are fighting on the wrong side in this war. We belong with Hitler. For the white man can no longer rule in this world unless he rules by totalitarian military force. Democracy cannot so rule. Democracy, if it is to prevail at this solemn moment in human history, can do so only if it purges itself of that which denies democracy, if it dares to act as it believes.

Pearl Buck

CASUAL NOTES

More War Effort

If the Cripps proposals can be described as the British Government's special contribution in India to their tremendous war-effort, the latest announcement of the new members of the expanded Viceroy's Council and of the new names to fill departed men's posts must be considered to be another contribution of a piece with the previous one.

A Council expanded to ten times its size with similar names cannot turn it into a Council of Free India. And whether one thinks in terms of violence or non-violence none but a Free India can win the war. Mr. Hore-Belisha writing as long ago as the 'occupation of the Andamans by the Japanese—the situation has very considerably worsened for the British since then—uttered the barest truth in these words: "With the authentic voice of a true leader, General Mac Arthur has proclaimed that 'one cannot wage war under present conditions without the support of public opinion...Men will not fight and die without knowing what they are fighting and dying for. In democracies it is essential that the public should know the truth.'

The enemy will be beaten, not by the military sword alone, but by that invincible weapon which is made out of the strong will and resolute spirit of free peoples. Let not censorship blunt that weapon!"

The Terrible Lesson of Burma

But the British character, if it has a toughness that has served them well frequently in history, has a denseness that is impervious to all warnings. We saw the other day how General Alexander gave the lie direct to the Burma Governor's statement about Burma. But even he had to make a guarded statement after what the Governor of Burma had said. The fact would seem to be much worse than General Alexander would let us know. This is what Mr. W. M. Towler wrote in the Daily Herald about the "Quislings in Burma:"

"Burmese guerilla bands are fighting for Japan against us. Burmese snipers are picking off British soldiers. Burmese guides are leading Japanese patrols through the jungle. Burmese spies are giving away to enemy information about our military dispositions. This should make us think. Perhaps we are to blame."

That this was not an exaggerated picture is proved by other non-British sources. This was the news flashed from American Western Group Headquarters, South-Western China:

"An American volunteer pilot, returning here from Burma, said today that native Burmese are killing unarmed British citizens. Natives in many districts have rebelled and are killing unarmed Britishers, he said. The Burmese are assisting the advancing Japanese in every possible way. Some armed Burmese forces have joined the Japanese. All over Burma it is dangerous for foreigners to move around unless they are armed, and in some districts the Burmese have even attacked armed Britishers, he continued. Meanwhile the British are feverishly evacuating all large Burma towns, including Prome and Mandalay. Some are leaving by planes, some by automobile and some are forced to walk. I am unable to estimate the number of British killed, but I believe it is not few."

Mr. Towler attributed this to the many years' policy of bungling in Burma. "After the last war—in which Burmese troops fought gallantly with us—movements began in Burma for constitutional reform, separation of Burma from India, Dominion Status, complete independence. Instead of this we gave them years of wrangling and all the rigmarole of a Round Table Conference. . . . Administration by a governor with carefully chosen counsellors and a hand picked senate to curb the House of Representatives was still regarded by Burma as an insult. . . . Even with war in the heart of Burma today, it may not be too late to admit our faults and remedy our lethargy. It is certainly not too late to learn the lesson of Burma and apply it to other countries—India above all—whose loyalty might still be made as firm as that of the free nations of our commonwealth."

That was on March 25th. In the same month wrote the Philadelphia Record:

"The British did not have enough confidence in their hold over the natives at Hongkong or Malay to arm them. And from Burma come eye-witness accounts of Burmese picking this moment to settle old scores with the British by killing Europeans and rioting while the Japs advance. India may be next. . . . Steps can be taken even at this eleventh hour, to erase the memory of past bungling, to make India a full partner in the struggle. The cure will take boldness and imagination. But nothing less will do the job." And the paper added a line about the policy at home (America): "Are we striving, at home, to avoid those mistakes of discrimination, prejudice, inequality and stupidity that may haunt us in the time of trial?"

But the British reply was the Cripps proposals and two months after India's rejection of them comes the expansion of the Viceroy's Council. When Sir Stafford was in India, he said, in reply to a question by journalists, that Britain was lacking in man-power. She certainly seems to be essentially lacking in brain-power and woefully lacking in boldness and imagination to cure past "bunglings". They seem, on the contrary, to delight in piling bungling upon bungling and insult upon insult.

Forced Labour

In fact, there is no improvement anywhere in the traditional policy of Britain to which Mr. Churchill is wedded. Look at this paragraph from 'A London Diary' in the New Statesman and Nation for March 14: "Forced labour in Kenya, now passed by the Colonial Office, creates an acute moral dilemma for those people who want to conscribe the native races of the Empire in return for a charter of self-government after the war. I discussed it with an honest-minded member of this group: 'Do you believe that Kenya natives are needed for war production and not to supply slave labour for employers too bad and farmers too incompetent to attract or pay workers?' 'No.' 'Do you suppose that the Government will offer them—or the natives of Southern Rhodesia, where forced labour threatens also—adequate land, equality of economic opportunity, the abolition of the colour-bar?' 'No.' "Do you consider it possible that self-government will be offered to the Kenya peoples?' 'No.'"

The Common Man

The same writer says that the British "Man-in-the-street" is now seriously discussing the British Empire. He describes his talk with a clerk in a big wholesale business. "Weeks ago, when the Japanese were still only at Kuala Lumpur, we talked about the future of India. George was dubious. 'Give them their freedom, and what happens to our money? That's what you have to look at. What happens to our investments if they get free?' Last week I saw him again. Said George; 'We'll have to give freedom to the Indians. We'll have to give it to the whole blooming Empire. I don't blame the Empire. Wanted to make our money like every one else. But the point is, they've rumbled us. They've got wise to us. And what I say is, it is never any use going on with a game like that once you've been rumbled.' His chief anxiety now is as to whether the Government is 'smart' enough to see, as he does, that 'they've seen through the trick, and the quicker we drop it the better.'"

But Mr. Churchill and Co. are too big to learn anything from the British "man-in-the-street", as they are too arrogant to learn anything from the lesson of Burma.

A Desperate Game

Let us understand the distinction between 'a National Government' and the Government of a 'Free India' that Gandhiji has been asking for. Of course there is no 'Free India' and no national Government, but a national Government even when it comes into being becomes part of the British war-machine, whereas Free India is free to decide the kind of help she can give as an ally, and free even to negotiate honourable terms of peace and stop further carnage. The national Government at best would carry round its neck the halter of the British-war methods and the British war-policy. In an article written about two months ago I tried to show that such a national Government, however satisfactory it might be, was incapable of fighting a successful military war against the Nazis and the Japanese. There is evidence accumulating in favour of this contention every day. Apart from the disloyalty of the Burmans in Burma there was superior military knowledge and strategy on the part of the Japanese, there was utter unreadiness in Singapore, and now spacious grounds are being given for the terrible disaster in Libya. There were tanks we are told—the strength being 7 to 5—there was full military equipment, superior air power, and at least equal man-power; and even Mr. Churchill has failed to explain why then the British failed. The New Statesman almost anticipated the disaster months ago and gave the reasons too: "Round this matter of tanks revolve our own fortunes in Libya. Rommel has swept us out of Bengazi and far beyond it (1) because he was reinforced by sea, (2) because he can repair his damaged tanks in the field, and (3) because his tanks are superior to ours. Our forces were (1) originally inferior in numbers to his and do not seem to have been reinforced; it looks (2) as if we were no better able to refit an injured tank than we were in the last campaign; (3) finally, the guns of our tanks, to say nothing of other defects, are inferior in calibre and range to those of the Germans. The bravery of our men cannot compensate for such defects. The mismanagement of this campaign ought to lead to a searching inquiry into its causes. Are we even now attending to the business of refitting tanks at the front, and to improvement of their armament and the modification of their types? It seems that Lord Beaverbrook has concentrated on quantity to the neglect of quality." The Londoner wrote in his diary the same week: "One reason for Rommel's success in Libya is the efficiency of his organisation for tank repair. While British tanks are often abandoned when temporarily knocked out, Rommel has a special device for hoisting damaged tanks on to the lorries in the night, rushing them to the repair shop, and getting them hastily refitted. British tanks only occasionally have more than one life, German tanks seem to have nine. This may be explained by the fact that Rommel is himself an engineer and mechanic. An American magazine not long ago gave a fascinating account of Rommel refusing to accept any one as an officer under him who could not build a whole tank with his own hands. The article describes the astonishment of a Prussian officer of the old-fashioned monocled type searching for General Rommel and finally discovering him in a tank repair shop, stripped to the waist, working like a mechanic somewhere in the intestines of a tank."

And let it be remembered that Mr. Eden said that Singapore was lost by choice, because they had to concentrate their best equipment in Libya. And we now know the best equipment that they had. When we think of this, can a national Government ever get militarily ready to fight the Japanese and the Nazis?

It is a desperate game. Instead why not leave India to her own resources and thereby gain a moral victory before the world, and be saved the ignominy of a very probable disaster?

HARIJANS AND SAVARNAS

These notes on the relations between Harijans and Savarnas, like similar ones made a few weeks ago, are a blend of bitters and sweets.

The question of the District Board school in Napa, a village in Kaira District, had been hanging fire for a long time. The Savarnas would not allow Harijan children to attend the school, and the school had to be closed down according to the Government Resolution made in this behalf. There was plenty of bad blood in consequence, the School Board had to be dragged into a court of law, and so on—facts which happily are now a thing of the past and with which the reader need not be bothered. Wiser counsels have at last prevailed, and the whole dispute has been amicably settled. A few leading men of the village and members of the local Panchayat have made it up with the School Board, by giving a written undertaking to admit Harijan children to the school, and five Harijan children were admitted as soon as the school was opened.

* * *

A Harijan hostel was opened the other day by Shri Morarji Desai at Surat. This will serve the Harijan students attending schools and colleges in Surat and hailing from villages in the District. There is accommodation, for the time being, for 20 students, but it is hoped that with more applicants desiring accommodation the citizens of Surat and the public workers there will not find it difficult to provide additional accommodation.

* * *

A vexatious and sorry chapter is that of the crematorium at Vile Parle, a Bombay suburb. Among Harijans, as amongst Savarnas, there are certain sections of people who bury their dead and some who cremate them. The crematorium at Vile Parle was sought to be used last year by some Harijans; the orthodox people who believed they were in charge of it objected; in heavy rains the poor people could not carry the dead to any other place; they broke open the lock and burnt the dead there. A fierce controversy arose, and the matter is now before a court of law—the men who claim to be members of the committee in charge of the crematorium having lodged a criminal complaint against the Harijans. This was done months ago, but we know the law's delays. Death however knows no delay. Neither should Religion or Duty know any. So even whilst the case is pending, Harijan Sevaks have dared to help the Harijans who have been cremating their dead, taking whatever risk may be in store for them.

When this matter was referred to Gandhiji last year, he had not the least hesitation in advising Harijan Sevaks to take the lead and give what help they could to the Harijans. There is room for patience and education of public opinion in the matter of temples, less in the matter of wells, but practically none in this matter. Harijans themselves may not be ready to take risks, but Gandhiji advised that it was the duty of the Harijan Sevaks to lead them and be ready to receive the first blows on their heads—if that was to be their lot—or receive the heaviest punishment.

It is a matter of gratification therefore that reckless of the law's delays some of the Harijan Sevaks and Congress workers of the place have been unremitting in their help of the Harijans who, only a fortnight ago, cremated their dead in this public crematorium. Quidquid multis peccatur inultum est. (An offence that is committed by many is no offence.)

It may be possible to find some plausible ground for excluding Harijans from the use of private wells, or from one's private house or temple. But it is impossible to find any such ground for excluding Harijans from a crematorium. There should be no private crematoriums save such as may be owned by Rajas or Maharajas, though one cannot conceive even these being polluted by cremation. All who carry the dead are supposed to be polluted and have to have a purificatory bath after the cremation is over. Where then is the difference between a Harijan and a Savarna? And so far as the dead are concerned, Fire consumes all impurities without caring for caste or creed. To exclude Harijans from a crematorium is not only to disgrace one's religion but to insult the dead and insult the all-purifying Fire. One wonders if even Fire can purify such intolerant exclusion.

* * *

A fire broke out in a village in the Nagpur district on the 22nd May and most of the houses of the Harijans and the Kotha of the Brahmana part proprietor of the village were completely gutted. A number of people from the surrounding villages collected to render what help they could. A Harijan entered the compound of the other part proprietor—a Kunbi and Lambardar and Mukadam of the village—and picked up a brass pot for fetching water to quench the fire. On this the said Lambardar and his son and other members of the family including women belaboured the Harijan mercilessly. It is said that strongly resenting this the crowd took the law into their own hands and retaliated by beating the Lambardar and his people. The Lambardar would give no help or facility to the people and would not allow people to draw water from the well which did not belong to him but to the other part proprietor who was a Brahman and then absent from the village. Luckily a female member of the latter's family arrived and invited every one to use the well. Had it not been for this timely help, the fire would have taken long to get under control.

The Lambardar who received a beating from the crowd filed a complaint against the Mahar, charging him with theft. The police investigated the case and found the charge to be unfounded. The Harijan is still said to be suffering from the injuries he received at the hands of the Lambardar.

It is difficult to withhold one's sympathy from the Harijan and the crowd who belaboured the Lambardar in retaliation.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Conflagration

Q.—What is the difference between Nero and yourself? Nero was fiddling when Rome was burning. Will you be also fiddling in Sevagram after you have ignited the fire which you will not be able to quench?

A.—The difference will be known if match, if I have ever to light it, does not prove a 'damp quib'. Instead of fiddling in Sevagram you may expect to find me perishing in the flames of my own starting if I cannot regulate or restrain them. But I have a grouse against you. Why should you shove all the blame on to me for all that may happen by reason of my taking action for the discharge of an overdue debt and that, too, just when the discharge has become the necessary condition of my life?

In their schools the rulers teach us to sing "Britons never shall be slaves." How can the refrain enthuse their slaves? The British are pouring blood like water and squandering gold like dust in order to preserve their liberty. Or, is it their right to enslave India and Africa? Why should Indians do less to free themselves from bondage? It is misuse of language to liken to the action of Nero that of a man who, in order to escape living death, lights his own funeral pyre to end the agony.

Andhra Separation

Q. You have, no doubt unintentionally, rather adversely affected Maharaja Kumar Sir Vijaya Anand's popularity in Andhra by your ridiculing a part of Sir Vijaya's letter on Andhra separation; and do you regard Andhra separation in the same light as Pakistan, as some people in Andhra fear you do?

A. You are right in saying that I ridiculed Sir Vijaya's letter. I could take that liberty with him. But nothing could be further from my thought than to discredit him in any way. What reflection there was was meant for his informants. As his letter showed, he had given me the impressions of his informants. Everyone of us is liable to be misled by our informants. He is among the very few zamindars who have taken up the popular cause. It will be pity if the Andhras, by putting a wrong construction on my letter to him, fail to avail themselves of his services.

As to the second question, there can be no comparison between Pakistan and Andhra separation. The Andhra separation is a redistribution on a linguistic basis. The Andhras do not claim to be a separate nation having nothing in common with the rest of India. Pakistan on the other hand is a demand for carving out of India a portion to be treated as a wholly independent sovereign state. Thus there seems to be nothing common between the two.

An Omission

At the Goseva Sangh Conference of 1st February last held at Wardha I said: "Chaunde Maharaj... whilst he accepts my facts and even arguments..... says, 'what about the public sentiment? They somehow want to save the cow from the butcher.'" And again, "But the good Chaunde Maharaj wonders if people can be persuaded to believe that dead cow's hide is sacred."

Shri Chaunde Maharaj of Govardhan Sanstha, who was present at the meeting, came to me and told me that the remark could not be applied to him as he did not favour the purchase of cows from butchers and did not discard the use of dead cattle hide. I told him that I would mention his assurance in Harijan. He reminds me that the report has appeared without the mention and it is likely to harm the Institution. I am sorry I forgot to mention the conversation in Harijan and that my omission caused grief to the Maharaj. As to the use of dead cattle hide, I may point out that it is not enough not to discard the use of dead cattle hide, it is necessary to discard the use of slaughter hide and insist on the use of dead cattle hide where slaughter hide was used. Probably that is what his letter means but has failed to convey.

IF 'HARIJAN' IS SUPPRESSED

( By M. K. Gandhi )

Anxious inquiries are being made as to what I would do if Harijan was suppressed. Rumours are afloat that orders are on their way. I would ask inquirers not to be agitated if Harijan is suppressed. The paper may be suppressed. The manager has been instructed to stop the paper immediately orders are served on him. It is no part of the movement to publish Harijan in defiance of orders. But Harijan may be suppressed, its message cannot be, so long as I live. Indeed, the spirit will survive the dissolution of the body and somehow speak through the millions. For, with due apologies to Veer Saverkar and Quaid-e-Azam Jinnah, I claim to represent the joint spirit of millions of Hindus and Mussalmans, and other non-Hindus who call themselves children of Hindustan. I am living, and hope to have the strength to die, for the freedom of every inhabitant of this land.

Let us see what Harijan is today. It is being published in English, Hindi, Urdu (2 places), Tamil, Telugu (2 places), Oriya, Marathi, Gujarati, Kanaree (2 places). It is ready to be published in Bengali only awaiting legal permission. Applications have come from Assam, Kerala and Sindh. All but one edition have a large circulation compared to the other weeklies. I suggest that it is no small matter to suppress such a paper. The loss will be more Government's than the people's. They will incur much ill-will by suppressing a popular paper.

Let it be known too that Harijan is a views-paper as distinguished from a newspaper. People buy and read it not for amusement but instruction and regulating their daily conduct. They literally take their weekly lessons in non-violence. It cannot pay the authorities to deprive the people of their weekly food.

And Harijan is not an anti-British paper. It is pro-British from head to foot. It wishes well to the British people. It tells them in the friendliest manner where in its opinion they err.

The Anglo-Indian papers I know are Government favourites. They represent a dying Imperialism. Whether Britain wins or loses, Imperialism has to die. It is certainly of no use now to the British people whatever it may have been in the past. In that sense therefore Anglo-Indian papers are really anti-British as Harijan is pro-British. The former are disseminating hatred day by day by hiding the reality and bolstering Imperialism which is ruining Britain. It is in order to arrest the progress of that ruin that, frail as I am, I have put my whole soul into a movement which, if it is designed to free India from the imperial yoke, is equally intended to contribute the mightiest war-effort in their behalf. If they suppress Harijan let them know what they will seek to suppress.

Let me add too that without needing any pressure from outside, I am using the greatest restraint in the choice of printing matter. Nothing is being consciously published that would give any clue to the 'enemy' as to military objectives or dispositions. Care is being exercised to avoid all exaggeration or sensational matter. Adjectives and adverbs are well-weighed before being used. And they know that I am ever ready to acknowledge errors and mend them.

In Case of Illness

Some one tells me that B. B. C. have been asking how I can hope to lead the impending non-violent movement if I am ill and bed-ridden. Well, the doctors have not pronounced me such. I am fatigued and they advise rest and a change to a cooler place for a fortnight. I am struggling to give myself rest. But sometimes duty, may be passion or infatuation, forbids it. But the relevant fact is that so long as the reason is unimpaired, physical illness is no bar to the conduct of a non-violent struggle. The peremptory belief in non-violent conduct is that all urge comes from God—the Unseen, even Unfelt save through unconquerable faith. Nevertheless as a seeker and experimenter I know that even physical illness, even fatigue is counted as a defect in a non-violent person. Mens sana in corpore sano is literally accepted by votaries of truth and non-violence. But that is said of perfect men. Alas I am far from the perfection I am aiming at.

Timely Action

Numerous inquiries have been made as to what should be done by evacuees and others who find it difficult and even impossible to comply with orders. The comprehensive instructions of the Working Committee in the matter are quite timely. The persons affected should know that these instructions are no part of the impending movement. They are necessary in every case for the very existence of the persons affected. Therefore, as the Working Committee very properly say, every precaution should be taken for obtaining relief through negotiation. Disregard of orders should be resorted to only when it becomes peremptory. Needless to say there is no room here for profiteering or exorbitant demands.

Sevagram, 12-7-'42

Congress and War Contracts

Q. Is it proper for Congressmen, especially members of Congress Committees, to accept war contracts?

A. This question should be properly addressed to the Working Committee. Personally however I think that Congressmen cannot accept war contracts.

1

Resolution passed by the Working Committee at Wardha on July 14, 1942:

Events happening from day to day, and the experience that the people of India are passing through, confirm the opinion of Congressmen that British rule in India must end immediately, not merely because foreign domination, even at its best, is an evil in itself and a continuing injury to the subject people, but because India in bondage can play no effective part in defending herself and in affecting the fortunes of the war that is desolating humanity. The freedom of India is thus necessary not only in the interest of India but also for the safety of the world and for the ending of nazism, fascism, militarism and other forms of imperialism, and the aggression of one nation over another.

Ever since the outbreak of the world war, the Congress has studiously pursued a policy of non-embarrassment. Even at the risk of making its satyagraha ineffective, it deliberately gave it a symbolic character, in the hope that this policy of non-embarrassment, carried to its logical extreme, would be duly appreciated and that real power would be transferred to popular representatives, so as to enable the nation to make its fullest contribution towards the realisation of human freedom throughout the world, which is in danger of being crushed. It had also hoped that negatively nothing would be done which was calculated to tighten Britain's strangle-hold on India.

These hopes have, however, been dashed to pieces. The abortive Cripps proposals showed in the clearest possible manner that there was no change in the British Government's attitude towards India and that the British hold on India was in no way to be relaxed. In the negotiations with Sir Stafford Cripps, Congress representatives tried their utmost to achieve a minimum, consistent with the national demand, but to no avail. This frustration has resulted in a rapid and widespread increase of ill-will against Britain and a growing satisfaction at the success of Japanese arms. The Working Committee view this development with grave apprehension as this, unless checked, will inevitably lead to a passive acceptance of aggression. The Committee hold that all aggression must be resisted, for any submission to it must mean the degradation of the Indian people and the continuation of their subjection. The Congress is anxious to avoid the experience of Malaya, Singapore, and Burma and desires to build up resistance to any aggression on or invasion of India by the Japanese or any foreign power.

The Congress would change the present ill-will against Britain into good-will and make India a willing partner in a joint enterprise of securing freedom for the nations and peoples of the world and in the trials and tribulations which accompany it. This is only possible if India feels the glow of freedom.

The Congress representatives have tried their utmost to bring about a solution of the communal tangle. But this has been made impossible by the presence of the foreign Power whose long record has been to pursue relentlessly the policy of divide and rule. Only after the ending of foreign domination and intervention, can the present unreality give place to reality, and the people of India, belonging to all groups and parties, face India's problems and solve them on a mutually agreed basis. The present political parties, formed chiefly with a view to attract the attention of and influence the British Power, will then probably cease to function. For the first time in India's history, realisation will come home that princes, jagirdars, zamindars, and propertied and monied classes, derive their wealth and property from the workers in the fields and factories and elsewhere, to whom essentially power and authority must belong. On the withdrawal of British Rule in India, responsible men and women of the country will come together to form a Provisional Government, representative of all important sections of the people of India, which will later evolve a scheme whereby a Constituent Assembly can be convened in order to prepare a constitution for the government of India acceptable to all sections of the people. Representatives of Free India and representatives of Great Britain will confer together for the adjustment of future relations and for the cooperation of the two countries as allies in the common task of meeting aggression. It is the earnest desire of the Congress to enable India to resist aggression effectively with the people's united will and strength behind it.

In making the proposal for the withdrawal of British Rule from India, the Congress has no desire whatsoever to embarrass Great Britain or the Allied Powers in their prosecution of the war, or in any way to encourage aggression on India or increased pressure on China by the Japanese or any other Power associated with the Axis group. Nor does the Congress intend to jeopardise the defensive capacity of the Allied Powers. The Congress is therefore agreeable to the stationing of the armed forces of the Allies in India, should they so desire, in order to ward off and resist Japanese or other aggression, and to protect and help China.

The proposal of withdrawal of the British Power from India was never intended to mean the physical withdrawal of all Britishers from India, and certainly not of those who would make India their home and live there as citizens and as equals with the others. If such withdrawal takes place with goodwill, it would result in establishing a stable Provisional Government in India and co-operation between this Government and the United Nations in resisting aggression and helping China.

The Congress realises that there may be risks involved in such a course. Such risks, however, have to be faced by any country in order to achieve freedom and; more especially at the present critical juncture, in order to save the country and the larger cause of freedom the world over from far greater risks and perils.

While, therefore, the Congress is impatient to achieve the national purpose, it wishes to take no hasty step and would like to avoid, in so far as is possible, any course of action that might embarrass the United Nations. The Congress would plead with the British Power to accept the very reasonable and just proposal herein made, not only in the interest of India but also that of Britain and of the cause of freedom to which the United Nations proclaim their adherence.

Should however this appeal fail, the Congress cannot view without the gravest apprehension the continuation of the present state of affairs, involving a progressive deterioration in the situation and weakening of India's will and power to resist aggression. The Congress will then be reluctantly compelled to utilise all the non-violent strength it might have gathered since 1920, when it adopted Non-violence as part of its policy for the vindication of political rights and liberty. Such a widespread struggle would inevitably be under the leadership of Gandhiji. As the issues raised are of the most vital and far-reaching importance to the people of India as well as to the peoples of the United Nations, the Working Committee refer them to the All India Congress Committee for final decision. For this purpose the A. I. C. C. will meet in Bombay on the seventh of August, 1942.

Re : Evacuation and Other Orders

Whereas complaints have been received from various places regarding Government orders for evacuation of villages, lands and buildings without due notice and proper compensation, seizure and destruction of country-boats, even where life is impossible without them, requisition of cycles, motor vehicles and carts without proper compensation and without regard for the needs of the civil population;

The Working Committee deem it necessary to issue the following instructions for the guidance of the people concerned and hope that the Government will take immediate and necessary steps to remove the grievances and that the people will carry out their instructions as circumstances demand, provided that in all cases before the final decision to disobey an order or resist any measure is taken, all possible avenues of negotiation and relief through negotiation shall be thoroughly explored.

With regard to evacuation and other orders involving loss, either temporary or permanent, of landed property of any kind, full compensation should be demanded. In fixing the compensation the factors to be taken into consideration are the value of the land and the crops, the inconvenience and expense likely to be caused to the holder of the land by having to move to another place, and the difficulty and delay likely to be involved in obtaining other land where the dispossessed landholder could settle.

Wherever possible, arrangement should be made for providing other land to agriculturists where their agricultural land is acquired. Where this is impossible, compensation in money should be paid.

Value of trees, water-channels, and wells etc. taken over or destroyed should be included in the compensation.

In case of temporary acquisition of agricultural land the full value of the crop plus 15% of it should be paid for each crop lost and when the occupation by Government terminates compensation should be paid for restoring the land to its previous conditions for agricultural purposes.

Where the bulk of the land of an agriculturist is acquired and the balance left over is so small that it may not be worth cultivating, the balance too should be acquired.

Houses where acquired should be fully paid for. Where the whole or bulk of the agricultural land of an agriculturist is acquired and only his house is left over, the house should also be acquired by paying full compensation if the agriculturist so desires.

Where a house is to be occupied temporarily for Government purposes fair rent should be paid and the owner compensated for the inconvenience and discomfort caused.

No one should be required to vacate his house without arrangement being made elsewhere for his residence, and full compensation should be paid for transport of the evacuee's belongings and for his maintenance for a reasonable period to enable him to find suitable occupation in his new surroundings.

Compensation should in all cases be paid promptly and on the spot by a responsible officer and not at the head-quarters of a District. In case no agreement is reached between the authorities and the evacuee regarding the amount of compensation and the matter has to be referred to a tribunal for decision, the amount of compensation proposed by the authorities should be paid forthwith and should not be withheld pending the adjudication of the claim.

There should be no interference with the use or disposal of private property except with the consent of the owner or on payment of adequate compensation.

In case of requisition of boats full compensation should be demanded and no boats should be surrendered till the question of compensation is settled. In areas surrounded by water where boats are indispensable for normal everyday life they should not be surrendered at all.

Fishermen who depend upon their boats for earning their livelihood should be compensated for loss of their employment in addition to the price of their boat.

In case of requisition of cycles, motor vehicles, carts etc. full compensation should be demanded and until the question of compensation is settled they should not be parted with.

In view of scarcity of salt and apprehended famine of it due to war conditions, facilities should be provided for collection, preparation and transport of salt on the sea-coast and in inland areas, free of duty, by individuals. People may manufacture salt for their own consumption and that of their cattle.

With regard to restrictions on organisations for self-protection, the Committee is of opinion that it is the inherent right of all to protect their own life and property and those of their neighbours and therefore all restrictions on them should be disregarded.

PERTINENT QUESTIONS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

1. If non-violent activity is neutralized by and cannot go along with armed violence in the same area, will there remain any scope for non-violent resistance to aggression in the event of India allowing foreign troops to remain on her soil and operate from here?

2. If the maintenance of India's freedom is allowed to be made dependent upon arms which, in the existing circumstances, will be led and controlled by Britain and America, can there be a feeling of real freedom experienced by the people of India, at any rate, during the duration of the war?

3. Whatever may be the terms of the 'treaty', if the Anglo-American military machine is allowed to operate for the 'defence' of India, can Indians play anything but a minor and subordinate role in the defence of this country?

4. Supposing the British, not from any moral motive but only to gain a political and strategical advantage for the time being, agree to a 'treaty' under which they are allowed to maintain and increase their military forces in India, how can they be dislodged afterwards if they prefer to remain in possession?

5. Is not the position postulated in the preceeding question comparable to the position that would arise if, for instance, Subhas Babu made a treaty with Germany and Japan under which India would be declared 'independent' and the Axis forces would enter India to drive the British out?

6. If the Congress, as Maulana Saheb has just stated, 'considers defence as armed defence only', is there any prospect of real independence for India, in view of the fact that India simply has not got the resources 'independently' to offer effective armed resistance to a formidable aggressor? If we are to think in terms of armed defence only, can India, to mention only one thing, expect to remain independent with her 4000 miles of coast-line and no navy and ship-building industry?

7. What material aid could India send to China today, even if she were declared 'independent' by the British?

A. (1) The flaw pointed out in the first question cannot be denied. I have admitted it before now. The tolerance of Allied troops by Free India is an admission of the nation's limitations. The nation as a whole has never been and never been claimed to be non-violent. What part is cannot be said with any accuracy. And what is decisive is that India has not yet demonstrated non-violence of the strong such as would be required to withstand a powerful army of invasion. If we had developed that strength we would have acquired our freedom long ago and there would be no question of any troops being stationed in India. The novelty of the demand should not be missed. It is a demand not for a transference of power from Great Britain to a Free India. For there is no party to which Britain would transfer such power. We lack the unity that gives strength. The demand therefore is not based on our demonstrable strength. It is a demand made upon Britain to do the right irrespective of the capacity of the party wronged to bear the consequences of Britain's right act. Will Britain restore seized property to the victim merely because the seizure was wrong? It is none of her concern to weigh whether the victim will be able to hold possession of the restored property. Hence it is that I have been obliged to make use of the word anarchy in this connection. This great moral act must give Britain moral status which should ensure victory. Whether without India Britain would have any reason to fight is a question I need not consider. If India is the stake and not British honour we should know. My demand then loses force but not justness.

Such being the case my honesty and honour require me to provide for the flaw. If to ask for the withdrawal of the Allied forces means their certain defeat, my demand must be ruled out as dishonest. Force of circumstances has given rise to the demand and also to its limitations. It must be admitted therefore that there will be little scope for non-violent resistance of aggression, with the Allied troops operating in India, as there is practically none now. For the troops are there today enjoying full mastery over us. Under my demand they will operate under the nation's terms.

2. If Britain's declaration is honest I see no reason why the presence of the troops should, in any shape or form, affect the feeling of real freedom. Did the French feel differently when during the last war the English troops were operating in France? When my master of yesterday becomes my equal and lives in my house on my terms, surely his presence cannot detract from my freedom. Nay, I may profit by his presence which I have permitted.

3. The conception in my scheme is that we do not want these troops for our defence or protection. If they left these shores we expect to manage somehow. We may put up non-violent defence. If luck favours us, the Japanese may see no reason to hold the country after the Allies have withdrawn, if they discover that they are not wanted. It is all speculation as to what can happen after withdrawal, voluntary and orderly or forced.

4. We assume their or rather British honesty. It would be not a matter of dislodging them, it is one of their fulfilling their plighted word. If they commit breach of faith, we must have strength enough non-violent or violent to enforce fulfilment.

5. Surely there is as much difference between the South Pole and the North as there is between the imagined conditions. My demand deals with the possessor; Subhas Babu will bring German troops to oust the possessor. Germany is under no obligation to deliver India from bondage. Therefore Subhas Babu's performance can only fling India from the frying pan into the fire. I hope the distinction is clear.

6. Maulana Saheb, it is well known, does not hold my view that any country can defend itself without force of arms. My demand is based on the view that it is possible to defend one's country non-violently.

7. India at present gives such indifferent and ill-conceived aid as the Allies think desirable. Free India can send men and material that China may need. India has affinities with China being part of Asia which the Allies cannot possibly possess and exploit. Who knows that Free India may not even succeed in persuading Japan to do the right by China?

THE WARDHA INTERVIEW

Soon after the final meeting of the Working Committee on Tuesday, the 14th July, Gandhiji met the various representatives of the press—Indian and foreign—and gave them a joint interview. To take up the last question first, Gandhiji made it clear that the Working Committee had worked on his own draft, there had been a lot of give and take, and accommodation. "Of course, if the resolution had not met with my approval," he added, "it would not have been passed. Whether it wholly meets with my approval or not is a difficult question to answer. It is not humanly possible for a group of people to agree on every sentence and every word. There always is room for accommodation, but I must say that the Working Committee has been most considerate to me."

A Mass Movement

"Is it possible," asked the A. P. (America) representative, "for you to tell us the things you might do after the All India Congress Committee meets and adopts the W. C. Resolution?"

"Is not that question a little premature? Supposing the A. I. C. C. vetoes the resolution, the whole thing wears a different aspect. But you may know that it will be a mass movement of a strictly non-violent character and then you can fill in the details. It will include all that a mass movement can include."

"Will you include closing of liquor shops and foreign cloth shops?"

"It will depend on the circumstances. I don't want rioting as a direct result. If inspite of all precautions rioting does take place, it cannot be helped." This question was not fully developed. It could not be, in the nature of things. The questioner meant perhaps picketing and peaceful persuasion. Gandhiji had in mind perhaps looting of cloth shops—as there has been looting of grain shops—and so on. If these things take place, they will be the direct product of the economic situation and not of the movement.

If Imprisoned?

"Will you court imprisonment?"

"I am not going to court imprisonment. The struggle does not involve courting imprisonment. It is too soft a thing. We had, no doubt, made it a business to court imprisonment up to now, but there will be no such thing this time. My intention is to make the thing as short and swift as possible."

Quick came another question: "Will you resort to fasting if sent to jail?"

"It is not my desire this time, as I have said, to court imprisonment. But if I am dragged into jail, it is difficult to say what I may do. But I can fast, as I have fasted before now, though I should try to avoid such an extreme step so far as possible."

"Do you hope that negotiations may be opened by the British Government?"

Negotiations?

"They may, but with whom they will do it I do not know. For it is not a question of placating one party or other. For it is the unconditional withdrawal of the British Power without reference to the wishes of any party that is our demand. The demand is therefore based on its justice. Of course it is possible that the British may negotiate a withdrawal. If they do, it will be a feather in their cap. Then it will cease to be a case for withdrawal. If the British see, however late, the wisdom of recognising the Independence of India, without reference to the various parties, all things are possible. But the point I want to stress is this: viz. that there is no room left for negotiations in the proposal for withdrawal. Either they recognise Independence or they don't. After that recognition many things can follow. For by that one single act the British representatives will have altered the face of the whole landscape and revived the hope of the people which has been frustrated times without number. Therefore whenever that great act is performed, on behalf of the British people, it will be a red letter day in the history of India and the world. And, as I have said, it can materially affect the fortunes of war."

"After the recognition of Free India it starts to function at once?"

"Yes, from the very next moment. For, independence will be not on paper, but in action. But your next legitimate question would be—'How will Free India function?' And because there was that knot, I said 'Leave India to God or anarchy.' But in practice what will happen is this—If withdrawal takes place in perfect good-will, the change will be effected without the slightest disturbance. People would have to come to their own without disturbance. Wise people from among the responsible sections will come together and will evolve a Provisional Government. Then there will be no anarchy, no interruption, and a crowning glory."

Shape of Things to Come

"Can you visualise the composition of the Provisional Government?"

"I do not need to do so. But I am clear that it won't be a party government. All parties—including the Congress—will automatically dissolve. They may function later and when they do they may function complementary to one another, each looking to the other in order to grow. Then, as I have said, all unreality disappears like mist before the morning sun—we don't know how, though we witness the phenomenon every day."

"But" asked two of the Indian correspondents rather impatiently, "looking to all their past record will the British have the sense to come to terms?"

"Why not? They are human beings and I have never discounted the possibility of human nature's upward growth, and no other nation had ever had to face a freedom movement based not principally but wholly on non-violence."

"But there is an apparent contradiction in your resolution," persisted the friends. "The first paragraphs recount the fact that there is no intention on the part of the British to part with power. Then suddenly you postulate such a desire on their part!"

"There is nothing inconsistent. The facts are narrated in order to justify the suddenness of the demand for withdrawal. The other paragraphs refer to possibilities. Many things may happen and they may be altogether creditable to the British."

"May not your movement hamper the efforts of the Allies in China?"

"No, since the movement is intended to make common cause with the Allies, it should not hamper the Allied effort."

"But if there is no withdrawal, then disturbances are bound to happen?"

"You see ill-will is already there. It will grow apace. Immediately the movement is started, the ill-will may be changed into good-will if the British people respond. But even if they don't respond, when people make an effort to free themselves from a foreign yoke, ill-will needs no other opening. It takes a healthy turn instead of the bad turn that it has today."

"But only last week Mr. Amery reminded us that nothing is going to be done?"

"I am very much afraid that we shall have the misfortune to listen to a repetition of that language in stronger terms if possible. But it can't change the will of a group of people who are determined to go their way."

Free India's Contribution

"You desire to have India's freedom in order to help the Allies", was Mr. Edgar Snow's question, and the last question. "Will Free India carry out total mobilisation and adopt methods of total war?"

"That question", said Gandhiji, "is legitimate but it is beyond me. I can only say Free India will make common cause with the Allies. I cannot say that Free India will take part in militarism or choose to go the non-violent way. But I can say without hesitation that if I can turn India to non-violence I will certainly do so. If I succeed in converting 40 crores of people to non-violence, it will be a tremendous thing, a wonderful transformation."

"But you won't oppose a militarist effort by civil disobedience?" Mr. Snow pertinently asked.

"I have no such desire. I cannot oppose Free India's will with civil disobedience, it would be wrong."

A TWO MINUTES' INTERVIEW

The number of Indian and foreign correspondents in Wardha at the present moment is unprecedentedly large, but it is quite natural looking to the momentous issues that the Working Committee have got to decide. But it makes it difficult for one in Gandhiji's health and with his preoccupations to meet them all. I have had to ask them to wait until the end of the Working Committee deliberations when Gandhiji might meet them all at a single interview. But the correspondent of the Daily Express (London) who was among the first to arrive and who was not staying until the end said he would be content with just a couple of minutes' interview, and Gandhiji acceded to his request. He had made up his mind that if the demand for withdrawal which seemed to gather strength every day was rejected, there would be some kind of a movement. So he asked:

"Would you say that your movement will make it more difficult or less difficult for us to keep the Japanese out of India?"

"Our movement," said Gandhiji, "will make it more difficult for the Japanese to come in. But of course if there is no cooperation from Britain and the Allies, I cannot say."

"But", said Mr. Young, "think of the war as a whole. Do you think that your new movement will help the Allied nations towards victory, which you have said you also desire?"

"Yes, if my submission is accepted."

"What do you mean by your submission?—That Britain should offer non-violent battle?"

"No, no. My submission that British rule in India should end. If that is accepted victory for the Allied powers is assured. Then India will become an independent power, and thus a real ally, while now she is only a slave. The result of my movement, if it is sympathetically responded to, is bound to be speedy victory. But if it is misunderstood by the British and they take up the attitude that they would like to crush it, then they would be responsible for the result, not I."

This was far from convincing Mr. Young. He would not think of any movement with equanimity. So he made an appeal to Gandhiji's sentiment—a sentiment he had more than once expressed:

"Mr. Gandhi, you have been in London yourself. Have you no comment to make on the heavy bombings which the British people have sustained?"

"Oh yes. I know every nook and corner of London where I lived for three years so many years ago, and somewhat of Oxford and Cambridge and Manchester too; but it is London I specially feel for. I used to read in the Inner Temple Library, and would often attend Dr. Parker's sermons in the Temple Church. My heart goes out to the people, and when I heard that the Temple Church was bombed I bled. And the bombing of the Westminster Abbey and other ancient edifices affected me deeply."

"Then don't you think," said Mr. Young, "it would be wiser to postpone your movement until we have settled with the Germans and the Japanese?"

"No, because I know you will not settle with the Germans without us. If we were free, we could give you cent per cent cooperation in our own manner. It is curious that such a simple thing is not understood. Britain has today no contribution from a free India. Tomorrow as soon as India is free, she gains moral strength and a powerful ally in a free nation—powerful morally. This raises England's power to the nth degree. This is surely self-proved."

CASUAL NOTES

Indian News in England

Excerpts from British newspapers just received give one a fair idea of the kind of news from India on which Britain is fed. Thus the Calcutta correspondent of the Star writing towards the end of April asserted that "Gandhi has become a lone voice crying in the wilderness of non-violence," that it meant "definitely the end of the Mahatma as an Indian political leader." That however represents his views. As for news this is what he has to say:

"I was present at Allahabad over the week-end, when Nehru was badly heckled and almost assaulted. The taunts hurled at Nehru, coupled with the obvious annoyance at the inability of the Congress leaders to give a lead to the Congress, showed me more plainly than I have seen before how easy it would be for a real Indian leader, with a policy of practical value and general compromise, to stride on to the stage and hold his position as the man of the hour. True, I would not be so bold as to state that there is such a man in the offing. The Madras Congress leader, Mr. Rajagopalachariar may turn out just the man."

The correspondent visualises "a trial of strength between Pandit Nehru and Mr. Rajagopalachariar", of which I am sure both are equally unaware.

Another Calcutta correspondent—the representative of the Observer, gave this wonderful evidence of his capacity to understand what Gandhiji says and writes:

"He (Gandhiji) has also made clear that whereas men must on no account fight, women are expected to defend their honour themselves, since 'God has given them nails and teeth.' Naturally, these teachings affront the manhood and commonsense of the majority of the Indian public and also Indian women, who in some parts of Bengal are organising themselves and asking for arms to defend themselves."

At The Old Game

That however may be dismissed as arising out of ignorance or of stupidity. What is far more subtle and insidious is Sir Stanley Reed's analysis of the breakdown of the Cripps proposals. He writes in the Spectator:-

"Far deeper was the eleventh-hour demand that the executive authority should be forthwith transferred to a cabinet of Indian leaders, untrammelled by any control of the Viceroy or the British Cabinet. Sir Stafford's analysis of that proposal is conclusive; it would vest sole authority in a nominated, non-responsible irremovable body, dominant over the minorities, and free to keep or break the pledges to which the British Government stands irrevocably committed.

"Were these the basic reasons for the rejection of the Declaration? I suggest not. Behind this facade lie deep-rooted forces—on the one hand, the refusal of the Congress to compromise on any solution which does not leave it in entire command of the destinies of India, without qualification or reserve; on the other, with the minorities, the tremendous but intangible influence of fear. The great body of Moslems, with the Scheduled Castes, the Hindu Mahasabha and the Sikhs, fear that their political, social and economic rights will be insecure under a government entirely dominated by Congress or, in other words, caste-Hindus. When we speak of minorities let us be clear what we mean. During the Second Round Table Conference figures were produced, and not challenged, showing that the "minorities" represent fifty-two per cent. of the Indian people. Until there is some abatement of Congress pretensions, and a genuine appeasement of minority fears, no final settlement is possible."

For one thing the demand for cabinet responsibility was not an eleventh hour demand, but the demand for the written implementation of a verbal promise that Sir Stafford had been throughout the negotiations making. That the Cabinet, if it had been created, was not to be a Congress Cabinet but a mixed one, every one knew. And that the proposals would have no meaning without a genuine cabinet is conceded even by Edward Thompson:

"The break clearly came over the matter of cabinet government. Most people will agree that the division of defence functions finally offered covered all that could be fairly asked in war-time—if the Government had been a genuine Cabinet."

The reference to the Second Round Table Conference and the "Minorities" Pact is mischievous in the extreme. The statement that the clever figures were not challenged is an astonishing statement. Sir Stanley knows very well indeed that the 'minorities' do not represent fifty-two per cent. of the Indian people, and that the Congress is not synonymous with caste-Hindus. But having backed the Muslims, they must adopt their argument, however absurd it may be.

But we simply refuse to enter into this controversy now. The Congress demand for the withdrawal of the British rule is the rebellion of an anguished people against the diabolical game of divide and rule, and the refusal to allow the Britisher any longer to arbitrate between different sections of Indians. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru would weigh his words fifty times before he uttered them, and when he said he would not reconcile himself to "dictator Amery's" dictation, he meant more than he said. The expanded Council wherewith an attempt is being made to bamboozle America—all the British papers make no secret of the fact that the Cripps proposals were made in order to appease America—is neither national nor Indian. What India wants is not a Council nominated by Britain but by a Free India after the British have made their exit from the Indian stage.

A Dictatorship

That today it is a dictatorship—whether it is of Lord Linlithgow or Mr. Amery makes not the slightest difference—is not denied even by the Britishers themselves. Sir Lionel Haworth, writing in a British journal, thus describes the limitless powers of the Viceroy:—

"While in fact the Viceroy works through the established system in India, he can at any time assume powers which equal, if they do not exceed, the powers which are held by the President of the United States of America.

"These powers are in hereditary descent from Clive and Warren Hastings, limited only by the necessary changes which have come from the march of time.

"Let us take a few concrete examples. Could the Viceroy introduce conscription into India? The answer is 'yes', . . .

"Could he take over factories and devote them to Government work as we have done in England? Again the answer is yes. But all factories are already working overtime in Government work. In both circumstances he has only to promulgate an ordinance signed by himself and his order would become law.

"He can take over land that is necessary for defence, under powers which are already in existence. He can build new forts and take any other defence measures that are necessary. He can build aerodromes or he can improve ports and harbours. He can move troops and evacuate civilians, as indeed has already been done at Madras. . . .

"Thus it will be seen that there is no limit to what the Viceroy can and may do, and a refusal of the Congress to take part has little effect on the actual war-work."

It is from this dictatorship that the nation wants to get free and would not hesitate to launch a struggle for it.

An Englishman's Analysis

That it is impossible to fool all people at all times is apparent from a largely attended meeting of the Richmond Labour Party which was addressed by George Phippen. Having referred to Britain's broken promises after the last war, he traced the history of the nationalist movement and analysed the causes of Sir Stafford Cripps' failure. The Thames Valley Times gives a long report of his speech from which I take the following extract:

"Sir Stafford Cripps' mission had failed because the Indian leadership was not satisfied that the Government set up during the war would be truly national, representing free India; that the suggestions meant an extension of the power of the Viceroy or his council, and did not give India sufficient initiative to win the war. According to his statement his own view did not differ widely from that expressed by Amery that India could get her freedom only to the extent that she was completely united. Only Fascist countries could get near that because they were able to smash opposition. We were united to wage war, but we knew that the moment war ended, there would be a good deal of disagreement in Great Britain. So with India. South Africa had only shown a bare majority for entering the war, but no one suggested taking away self-government from South Africa. One was driven to the conclusion that Indians had not received freedom because they had not been prepared to fight for it.

"Reasons advanced for the British control of India were the same as those advanced by Japan for the control of China—that it was a big country, full of internal dissensions, backward economically and politically, and that it was our duty to take charge.

"Indian people would eventually get their freedom, and it was very much better if they got it, as the result of a decent deal between the two countries than as the result of a violent quarrel; we saw legacies of bitterness in Ireland, where we could not use the naval bases in the west.

"In answer to questions, the speaker said that the Soviet Union had created harmony in 20 years, in spite of differences of race, language and standards of living. It seemed marvellous that the Indians had not exploited the present situation to the extent they might have; the British Government had exploited the fact that they were anti-Fascist and did not want to hinder the war.

"Asked if there would be civil war if we cleared out, the speaker said the implication was that they were a violent people; this came from Christendom, which was at war for the second time in 20 years."

FOR MUSLIM FRIENDS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I have read with attention Quaid-e-Azam's reply to my article in Harijan. "Pakistan" according to him "in a nutshell" "is a demand for carving out of India a portion to be wholly treated as an independent and Sovereign State." This Sovereign State can conceivably go to war against the one of which it was but yesterday a part. It can also equally conceivably make treaties with other States. All this can certainly be had, but surely not by the willing consent of the rest.

But it seems he does not want it by consent. For he says, "Pakistan is an article of faith with Muslim India and we depend upon nobody except ourselves for the achievement of our goal." How is one to offer one's service in these circumstances?

But later he gives me hope, for he says: "Show your sincerity and frankness for an honourable settlement." In order to show both, I wrote the article to which the Quaid-e-Azam has objected. How else is one to show sincerity and frankness except through one's action and speech or pen?

Let me state my limitations. I cannot speak as a mere Hindu, for my Hinduism includes all religions. I can speak only as an Indian. If Pakistan as defined above is an article of faith with him, indivisible India is equally an article of faith with me. Hence there is a stalemate.

But today there is neither Pakistan nor Hindustan. It is Englistan. So I say to all India, let us first convert it into the original Hindustan and then adjust all rival claims. This is surely clear. After the restoration of India to the nation, there will be no Central Government. The representatives will have to construct it. It may be one Hindustan or many Pakistans.

If the Quaid-e-Azam really wants a settlement, I am more than willing and so is the Congress. He will forgive me for suggesting that his reply leaves on one the impression that he does not want a settlement. If he wants one, why not accept the Congress President's offer that Congress and League representatives should put their heads together and never part until they have reached a settlement. Is there any flaw or want of sincerity in this offer?

TO MY CRITICS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The critics who impute motives to the Working Committee or to me harm the cause they profess to serve. The members of the Working Committee are all seasoned servants of the nation with full sense of their responsibility. It is no use damning me as a dictator like Herr Hitler. He does not argue with his coworkers if he may be said to have any. He merely issues orders which can only be disobeyed on pain of death or worse. I argue with my friends for days. I argued at the last meeting for eight days. The members agreed when their reason was satisfied. My sanction with my friends as well as self-styled enemies has ever been reason and love. It is a travesty of truth therefore to compare me with Hitler or to call me a dictator in any current sense of the term. It is an equal travesty of truth to abuse the Congress by calling it a Hindu or communal organisation. It is national in the fullest sense of the term. It is a purely political organisation with which can undoubtedly be compared the Liberal Party which is without the slightest communal taint. Unfortunately today although it has politicians who have a record of distinguished service, it has admittedly little or no following in the country by reason of its members holding unpopular views. Thus the Congress remains the sole representative national organisation in India with a mass following. Its gains belong not merely to itself but to the whole nation, irrespective of caste or creed or race. It is mischievous and misleading to discredit this organisation in America and Great Britain as a communal or pro-Axis or a purely Hindu organisation. If it was a pro-Axis organisation, it has courage and influence enough to make a public declaration to that effect in disregard of the consequences that might overtake it. It is not, and has never been, a secret or a violent organisation. If it had been either, it would have been suppressed long ago.

So much about some manifest misrepresentations.

Now about suppression of relevant Congress position.

Nobody has contended that the demand for withdrawal of British Power is not an inherent right of the nation, irrespective of the demand to the contrary by those who by centuries of habit have lost the sense of freedom. It is said that it is wrong not intrinsically, but because of the Congress declaration of non-embarrassment to ask for such withdrawal at this moment.

The critics conveniently omit to mention the fact that in order to prove its bona fides and to prevent the Japanese attack the Congress has agreed that, in spite of the withdrawal of the British, the Allied troops should remain in India, naturally under a treaty with the Free India Government to be. So long as that Government, provisional or otherwise, has not come into being, there will be no authority to check their operations save their honour. For by declaring India free they will have absolved themselves from consulting anybody formally as they have to consult today members of their nomination. In this sense the declaration of Independence leaves them freer to adopt the military measures they may consider necessary. I know that this is an anomalous position for a free country to be in. But honesty dictates the course. As I have said and repeat here the Congress demand is fool-proof. Critics who are anxious to serve the Allies would do well to examine the Congress position and point out flaws, if there are any. Let me inform them that those who have come to me to understand my demand and who had serious misgivings went away convinced that it was wholly just and that if justice was not done the Congress would be right in taking action to vindicate its position.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Village Swaraj

Q. In view of the situation that may arise at any moment in India, would you give an outline or skeleton of a Village Swaraj Committee, which could function in all village matters in the absence of, and without relying upon an over-head Government or other organisation? In particular, how would you ensure that the Committee should be fully representative and that it would act impartially, efficiently and without favour or fear? What should be the scope of authority and the machinery to enforce its commands? And what should be the manner in which a committee or an individual member of it could be removed for corruption, inefficiency or other unfitness?

A. My idea of village Swaraj is that it is a complete republic, independent of its neighbours for its own vital wants, and yet interdependent for many others in which dependence is a necessity. Thus every village's first concern will be to grow its own food crops and cotton for its cloth. It should have a reserve for its cattle, recreation and playground for adults and children. Then if there is more land available, it will grow useful money crops, thus excluding ganja, tobacco, opium and the like. The village will maintain a village theatre, school and public hall. It will have its own waterworks ensuring clean water supply. This can be done through controlled wells or tanks. Education will be compulsory up to the final basic course. As far as possible every activity will be conducted on the cooperative basis. There will be no castes such as we have today with their graded untouchability. Non-violence with its technique of Satyagraha and non-cooperation will be the sanction of the village community. There will be a compulsory service of village guards who will be selected by rotation from the register maintained by the village. The Government of the village will be conducted by the Panchayat of five persons annually elected by the adult villagers, male and female, possessing minimum prescribed qualifications. These will have all the authority and jurisdiction required. Since there will be no system of punishments in the accepted sense, this Panchayat will be the legislature, judiciary and executive combined to operate for its year of office. Any village can become such a republic today without much interference, even from the present Government whose sole effective connection with the villages is the exaction of the village revenue. I have not examined here the question of relations with the neighbouring villages and the centre if any. My purpose is to present an outline of village government. Here there is perfect democracy based upon individual freedom. The individual is the architect of his own government. The law of non-violence rules him and his government. He and his village are able to defy the might of a world. For the law governing every villager is that he will suffer death in the defence of his and his village's honour.

The reader may well ask me, as I am asking myself while penning these lines, as to why I have not been able to model Sevagram after the picture here drawn. My answer is, I am making the attempt. I can see dim traces of success though I can show nothing visible. But there is nothing inherently impossible in the picture drawn here. To model such a village may be the work of a lifetime. Any lover of true democracy and village life can take up a village, treat it as his world and sole work, and he will find good results. He begins by being the village scavenger, spinner, watchman, medicine man and school-master all at once. If nobody comes near him, he will be satisfied with scavenging and spinning.

Honourable Means of Dying

Q. Will you please explain more fully your dictum that "a person who would die rather than go through inhuman tortures would find honourable means of dying"? Do you endorse suicide in such cases? Or do you suggest that mere intense will to die will result in death?

A. I would not rule out suicide in such cases as a means of escape from torture—not for the pain of it, but for showing the tyrant that his torture would not bend the suicide. Tyrants have prevented suicide for the purpose of the pleasure tortures give them. But I do not regard suicide as necessarily an honourable means of dying. Of course, the most honourable means would be the intense longing to die, so intense as to induce death for the mere will. But this is given to one in a billion. What I had in mind when I wrote the paragraph was a variety of struggles of the prisoners with the warders in which resistance though non-violent must end in death. Thus supposing that A compels B to crawl on his belly, resistance can be carried to the breaking point. Every form of such resistance unto death I would count as honourable. This resistance can be offered by the weakest as well as the strongest—by the weakest perhaps more effectively, certainly more expeditiously. The indispensable condition is the possession of a stout heart and an iron will. I am not writing theory. My opinion is based on personal experience and that of others who have been under my observation. A very weak woman could not be bent under the cruel will of her imperious husband. Youngsters frail in body have successfully defied the orders of hard schoolmasters or heartless parents. The crux of the question is whether there is real readiness, nay will to die. The will will most assuredly point the way.

Ineffective Sympathy

Q. Why should not the Congress declare that as long as India is herself in bondage, she can be neither a friend nor an enemy of any country? What is the value of her sympathies with China, Russia etc., when she has no freedom to assist them in her own way? Has Russia thought of India?

A. You are right. India's sympathy can give no effective help as her enmity can do no harm to any person or nation so long as India is herself not free. Nevertheless Pandit Jawaharlal with his international outlook and generosity has accustomed us to express our sympathy to nations in distress without expectation of like return. We lose nothing by expressing sympathy even though we realise that it can cut no ice. If Russia has no thought of India today, in the long run she is bound to recognise the utterly unselfish character of our sympathy. It should not be forgotten that sympathy without ability to render effective help has its own moral value. We receive with appreciation sympathy from those who we know are unable to render us effective help in our struggle.

Your question is itself an additional justification for our demand for the immediate withdrawal of the British power. Having learnt to show sympathy to nations in distress the knowledge of our helplessness and the knowledge that if we are free we can render much effective help makes us or should make us specially anxious and oblige us to realise our ambition even during the war.

HARIJANS AND SAVARNAS

I have received several letters regarding my note in the Harijan with respect to the Vile Parle Crematorium, correcting one or two of my statements and asking me to state Gandhiji's views on two or three concrete questions. I do so without delay.

The crematorium is being used for several years by Harijans, and the exclusion of Harijans from the use thereof by locking it by a certain individual was wrong.

My note would leave no one in doubt about the indefeasible right of the Harijans to use the crematorium, and the Harijan and Congress workers who are helping them to use it are simply fulfilling a sacred duty. No Satyagraha is involved in this, for the simple reason that there is no order or law that is being disobeyed. That there is a case pending in this connection is beside the point. Therefore no office-bearer of the Harijan Sevak Sangh or of the Congress Committees concerned may shirk his duty in this behalf on the ground that there is no resolution of the Congress or the Harijan Sevak Sangh in this behalf. A resolution for starting Satyagraha would be necessary when the Magistrate gives a decision in favour of the complainant.

I have therefore no hesitation in saying that Gandhiji would regard indifference or neglect in this behalf by Hindu office-bearers of the Congress Committees and by the office-bearers of the Harijan Sevak Sangh concerned as a dereliction of duty. I know that individual workers are helping the Harijans and thus fulfilling an obvious duty that Savarnas owe to the Harijans. But those responsible must not stay aside.

* * *

There is no limit to the mercilessness to which irreligion masking as religion will go. The Civil Surgeon here was telling me of a pathetic case he noticed when he was on tour last week. There is cholera in this district, and he found during his inspection that in a Harijan's house five members had already died of cholera. They were all drinking contaminated water from the river, because the Savarnas would not let them use the village well which had been disinfected. The Civil Surgeon, who is a Hindu, with another responsible official, took the heartless Savarnas to task, and invited the Harijans to go and draw water from the well in their presence. This they did and it is hoped that the Harijans will now be allowed to use the well without let or hindrance. But one is painfully astonished that people who can be so heartless have the hardihood to call themselves Hindus.

TO EVERY JAPANESE

I must confess at the outset that though I have no ill will against you, I intensely dislike your attack upon China. From your lofty height you have descended to imperial ambition. You will fail to realise that ambition and may become the authors of the dismemberment of Asia, thus unwittingly preventing World Federation and brotherhood without which there can be no hope for humanity.

Ever since I was a lad of eighteen studying in London over fifty years ago, I learnt, through the writings of the late Sir Edwin Arnold, to prize the many excellent qualities of your nation. I was thrilled when in South Africa I learnt of your brilliant victory over Russian arms. After my return to India from South Africa in 1915, I came in close touch with Japanese monks who lived as members of our Ashram from time to time. One of them became a valuable member of the Ashram in Sevagram, and his application to duty, his dignified bearing, his unfailing devotion to daily worship, affability, unruffledness under varying circumstances, and his natural smile which, was positive evidence of his inner peace had endeared him to all of us. And now that owing to your declaration of war against Great Britain he has been taken away from us, we miss him as a dear co-worker. He has left behind him as a memory his daily prayer and his little drum, to the accompaniment of which we open our morning and evening prayers.

In the background of these pleasant recollections I grieve deeply as I contemplate what appears to me to be your unprovoked attack against China and, if reports are to be believed, your merciless devastation of that great and ancient land.

It was a worthy ambition of yours to take equal rank with the great Powers of the world. Your aggression against China and your alliance with the Axis Powers was surely an unwarranted excess of that ambition.

I should have thought that you would be proud of the fact that that great and ancient people, whose old classical literature you have adopted as your own, are your neighbours. Your understanding of one another's history, tradition, literature should bind you as friends rather than make you the enemies you are today.

If I was a free man, and if you allowed me to come to your country, frail though I am, I would not mind risking my health, may be my life, to come to your country to plead with you to desist from the wrong you are doing to China and the world and therefore to yourself.

But I enjoy no such freedom. And we are in the unique position of having to resist an imperialism that we detest no less than yours and Nazism. Our resistance to it does not mean harm to the British people. We seek to convert them. Ours is an unarmed revolt against British rule. An important party in the country is engaged in a deadly but friendly quarrel with the foreign rulers.

But in this they need no aid from foreign Powers. You have been gravely misinformed, as I know you are, that we have chosen this particular moment to embarrass the Allies when your attack against India is imminent. If we wanted to turn Britain's difficulty into our opportunity we should have done it as soon as the War broke out nearly three years ago.

Our movement demanding the withdrawal of the British Power from India should in no way be misunderstood. In fact if we are to believe your reported anxiety for the Independence of India, a recognition of that Independence by Britain, should leave you no excuse for any attack on India. Moreover the reported profession sorts ill with your ruthless aggression against China.

I would ask you to make no mistake about the fact that you will be sadly disillusioned if you believe that you will receive a willing welcome from India. The end and aim of the movement for British withdrawal is to prepare India, by making her free for resisting all militarist and imperialist ambition, whether it is called British Imperialism, German Nazism, or your pattern. If we do not, we shall have been ignoble spectators of the militarisation of the world in spite of our belief that in non-violence we have the only solvent of the militarist spirit and ambition. Personally I fear that without declaring the Independence of India the Allied Powers will not be able to beat the Axis combination which has raised violence to the dignity of a religion. The Allies cannot beat you and your partners unless they beat you in your ruthless and skilled warfare. If they copy it their declaration that they will save the world for democracy and individual freedom must come to naught. I feel that they can only gain strength to avoid copying your ruthlessness by declaring and recognising now the freedom of India, and turning sullen India's forced cooperation into freed India's voluntary cooperation.

To Britain and the Allies we have appealed in the name of justice, in proof of their professions, and in their own self-interest. To you I appeal in the name of humanity. It is a marvel to me that you do not see that ruthless warfare is nobody's monopoly. If not the Allies some other Power will certainly improve upon your method and beat you with your own weapon. Even if you win you will leave no legacy to your people of which they would feel proud. They cannot take pride in a recital of cruel deeds however skillfully achieved.

Even if you win it will not prove that you were in the right, it will only prove that your power of destruction was greater. This applies obviously to the Allies too, unless they perform now the just and righteous act of freeing India as an earnest and promise of similarly freeing all other subject peoples in Asia and Africa.

Our appeal to Britain is coupled with the offer of Free India's willingness to let the Allies retain their troops in India. The offer is made in order to prove that we do not in any way mean to harm the Allied cause, and in order to prevent you from being misled into feeling that you have but to step into the country that Britain has vacated. Needless to repeat that if you cherish any such idea and will carry it out, we will not fail in resisting you with all the might that our country can muster. I address this appeal to you in the hope that our movement may even influence you and your partners in the right direction and deflect you and them from the course which is bound to end in your moral ruin and the reduction of human beings to robots.

The hope of your response to my appeal is much fainter than that of response from Britain. I know that the British are not devoid of a sense of justice and they know me. I do not know you enough to be able to judge. All I have read tells me that you listen to no appeal but to the sword. How I wish that you are cruelly misrepresented and that I shall touch the right chord in your heart! Any way I have an undying faith in the responsiveness of human nature. On the strength of that faith I have conceived the impending movement in India, and it is that faith which has prompted this appeal to you. Sevagram, 18-7-'42

I am

Your friend and well-wisher
M. K. Gandhi

WITH THREE PRESS CORRESPONDENTS

Three press correspondents stayed after the Working Committee in order to have a leisurely interview with Gandhiji for a full clarification of certain questions. They had already been present at the general press interview the day before, but they thought their countries would be specially interested in certain questions, and they tried to represent the mind of the average man in their respective countries. Mr. Steele represented the Chicago Daily News, Mr. Stuart Emeny the News Chronicle, and Mr. Richard Jen the Central News Agency of China.

The Programme

Mr. Emeny was full of doubts and fears—at any rate he represented the doubts and fear of the average Englishman. "Could you give me an idea of the plans of your movement? Would it include breach of the Salt Laws, calling out Government servants and labour?"

Gandhiji made a full reply to the question: "As I said yesterday the programme covers every activity of a strictly non-violent character included in a mass movement. Therefore undoubtedly the things you have mentioned are included. But it is not my intention to undertake at once any over-whelming programme. I want to watch and see, because whatever may be said to the contrary, even in conducting the movement I want to guard against a sudden outburst of anarchy or a state of things which may be calculated to invite Japanese aggression. I believe that India's demand is fundamental, it is indispensable for national existence as I conceive it to be. Therefore I shall take every precaution I can to handle the movement gently, but I would not hesitate to go to the extremest limit, if I find that no impression is produced on the British Government or the Allied Powers. I hold it to be legitimate to make the Allied Powers responsible for all that may happen in India, because it is open to them in the interests of the common cause to prevent the happening of anything that might disturb the even course of the war. I think I have sufficiently answered your very pertinent question. I am unable to give you a more detailed answer, not because I want to suppress or shirk it, but I am not ready with a planned programme as yet."

"It will be your biggest movement?"

"Yes, my biggest movement."

Time Limit?

"But if there is no response," asked Mr. Emeny, "what time limit would you set before launching your campaign?"

"Assuming that the A. I. C. C. confirms the resolution, there will be some time—but not very long—taken. As far as I can see just now it may be a week or two."

"But you will give time?"

"Of course—as I have always done before launching on every struggle."

"If the Viceroy asks you to go to Delhi, will you accept his invitation?"

"Oh, yes. And then you forget that the Viceroy and I have become personal friends, if a public man and a Viceroy may be so called."

Knowing what the Government has always done Mr. Emeny put a plain blunt question: "Will your campaign collapse if Government sent you and thousands of your followers to jail?"

"I hope not," said Gandhiji laughing heartily, "on the contrary it should gain strength if it has any vitality."

Why not a Truce?

And now Mr. Emeny pleaded, "With the enemy at the gates, what is your objection to calling a truce?"

"This struggle has been conceived", said Gandhiji, "in order to avert a catastrophe. At the critical moment an un-free India is likely to become a hindrance rather than a help. The Congress resolution itself hints at the possibility of a large number of Indians going over to the Japanese side—if they effected a landing on the Indian shores—as we now know happened in Burma, Malay and for aught I know Singapore too. I am of the opinion that this might have been prevented at least so far as Burma is concerned, if she had been made independent. But it was not done. We know the result. We are determined so far as it is humanly possible to secure our Independence, so that no Indian worth the name would then think of going over to the Japanese side. It would then become as much India's interest, as the Allies' interest, to resist Japanese aggression with all her might."

Moral Duty

"But with time so short don't you think you have a moral duty to stand beside the Russians and the Chinese?" was Mr. Emeny's next question. If Gandhiji was keen on winning a dialectical advantage over his questioner, he might simply have said, "whose moral duty is greater — that of the Allies to make India Free or that of an un-free India to help the Allies?" But, no. He calmly replied: "Don't you see if it was a purely personal question, what you say would have been perfectly possible. But even with the combined influence of every member of the Working Committee, it would have been impossible to enthuse the masses in favour of the Allied cause, which they do not understand, cannot understand."

"But," said Mr. Emeny. "I have the feeling myself that you could, if you would, with your tremendous authority with the masses, do anything. They are sure to listen to you."

"You credit me with an influence which I wish I had, but I assure you, I do not possess. And in proof of this I shall give you two solid facts. If I had that influence you will agree that we would already have won our Independence without causing any trouble to anybody. But, as you know, I have no influence, nor has the Working Committee with the Muslim League and the Princes. That is one solid fact. Then, there is another thing. During the last war as you perhaps know, I had thrown myself heart and soul into it. I had become a voluntary recruiting agent for the British. And I began my agency in the district in which I had just been leading a campaign for agricultural relief with fair success. I should have made great headway there. But I tell you I did not do so. I used to walk miles in the hot burning sun in order to collect recruits and to make an impression on the people about the urgency of it. But I could not. You will see, therefore, that my influence great as it may appear to outsiders, is strictly limited. I may have considerable influence to conduct a campaign for redress of popular grievances because people are ready and need a helper. But I have no influence to direct people's energy in a channel in which they have no interest."

"Then, what part of the people, you think, will believe in your movement?" put in Mr. Steele.

"I wish I could tell you definitely. It is all problematical. I simply trade on the absolute purity of the cause and the equal purity of the means which are non-violent."

American Opinion May Be Antagonised

"Are you not apprehensive," added Mr. Steele, "that the Working Committee's resolution will antagonise American opinion?"

"Of course it may. But I have never embarked upon any campaign in the belief that I would have world sympathy at my back. On the contrary, the odds, almost in every case, have been against me. And in the very first Satyagraha struggle which started in South Africa, every outward element was hostile to me. I had stated then, — though I had no experience of the working of Satyagraha that I have now — that a handful though we were in the midst of millions who had no sympathy for us, we had to rely upon our own inner strength and the absolute justice of our cause. And that sustained us through the long-drawn-out agony lasting eight years. I do not know why I should lose the sympathy of the American people, or the British people, for that matter. And why should they fight shy of a just demand for absolute freedom?"

"Speaking as an American," said Mr. Steele, "I can say that the reaction of many Americans would be that a movement for freedom may be unwise at this moment for it would lead to complications in India which may be prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war."

"This belief is born of ignorance," replied Gandhiji. "What possible internal complication can take place if the British Government declare to-day that India is absolutely independent? It would be in my opinion the least risk the Allies could take on behalf of the war effort. I am open to conviction. If anybody could convince me that in the midst of war, the British Government cannot declare India free without jeopardizing the war effort, I should like to hear the argument. I have not as yet heard any cogent one."

Open to Conviction

"If you were convinced, would you call off the campaign?"

"Of course. My complaint is that all these good critics talk at me, swear at me, but never condescend to talk to me."

China

The Chinese friend now took his turn. He said, "You have implicit faith in non-violence. But we have seen that armed resistance alone can succeed against the Japanese?"

"China never tried any experiment in non-violence. That the Chinese remained passive for some time is no proof that it was a non-violent attitude. For the first time in history non-violence instead of being confined to individuals, religious enthusiasts and mystics, has been brought down to the political field and been experimented on by vast masses of mankind. Just imagine, that instead of a few Indians, or even a million or so, all 400,000,000 Indians were non-violent, would Japan make any headway in India, unless they were intent upon exterminating all the four hundred million?"

"If India were made of four hundred million Gandhis —" interrupted Mr. Steele.

"Here," said Gandhiji, "we come to brass tacks. That means India is not sufficiently non-violent. If we had been, there would have been no parties, and there would be no Japanese attack. I know non-violence is limited in both numbers and quality, but deficient as it is in both these respects, it has made a great impression and infused life into the people which was absent before. The awakening that showed itself on April 6, 1919, was a matter of surprise to every Indian. I cannot today account for the response we then had from every nook and corner of the country where no public worker had ever been. We had not then gone among the masses, we did not know we could go and speak to them."

"What can Free India do for China?" was Mr. Jen's question.

"If India were to listen to me, she would give non-violent help to China. But I know that will not be. Free India would want to be militarist. She will then get all the materials and men she needs—although it appears that China with her vast populations will not need men. Today unfree India cannot send a single person to China. I go further—Free India can even plead with Japan and Japan will have to listen."

Provisional Government

"Can you give me an idea who would take the lead in forming a Provisional Government—you, Congress, or the Muslim League?"

"The Muslim League certainly can; the Congress can. If everything went right, it would be a combined leadership. No one party would take the lead."

"Would it be within the present constitutional structure?"

"The constitution will be dead" said Gandhiji. "The Government of India Act of 1935 is dead. The I. C. S. would have to go and it might be anarchy but there need be no anarchy, if the British withdraw with goodwill. Free India Government would set up a constitution suited to Indian genius, evolved without dictation from outside. But whether India would be cut up into autonomous provinces or not, I do not know. The permanent structure may take time—all the time the war may require. But the Provisional Government may continue to function. It may be somewhat after the pattern of the present government, but with great modifications. The two communities will certainly work in hearty combination. It would be a combination not superimposed, but brought about by internal effort. The dictating factor will not be an outside one, but wisdom. And I believe there will be abundant wisdom among us."

"Would the Viceroy cease to exist as such?"

"We shall be friends even then, but on a par, and I have no doubt that Lord Linlithgow will welcome the day when he will be one of the people."

Why Not Today?

"Why can't all this be done today, without the British withdrawal," said Mr. Emèny returning to the charge.

"The answer is simple. Why can't a prisoner do a thing which a free man can do? You may not have been behind prison bars, but I have been and I know. Imprisonment means civil death, and I suggest to you that the whole of India is civilly dead. The very breath is controlled by British power. Then there is another experience that you lack. You have not been a member of a nation that has been under subjection for several centuries. Our habit has been that we can never be free. You know the case of Shri Subhas Bose, a man of great self-sacrifice who might have had a distinguished career in the Indian Civil Service, but who is now an exile because he cannot possibly tolerate this helpless condition and feels that he must seek the help of Germany and Japan."

"You have said there is no more room for negotiation. Does it mean that you would ignore any conciliatory gesture if it was made?" was the final question put on behalf of all the three.

Negotiations?

"So far as we are concerned, we have closed our hearts. As we have said in our resolution all hopes have been dashed to pieces. The burden is shifted. But it is open to America, to Britain, to China and even to Russia to plead for India which is pining for freedom. And if an acceptable proposal is made, it would certainly be open to the Congress or any other party to entertain and accept it. It would be churlish on our part if we said 'we don't want to talk to anybody and we will by our own strong hearts expel the British.' Then the Congress Committee won't be meeting; there would be no resolutions; and I should not be seeing press representatives."

THE MILLSTONE

Some time ago Sir Stafford Cripps wrote that it was not possible for him to read the history of the British Empire without a sense of shame. But Mr. Amery has declared that the British have "every right to be proud of what we have done in India. We have every right to be even more proud of what we are attempting to do in India." (Foreword to the volume of his speeches.)

Mr. Edgar Snow in his latest book The Battle for Asia has casually examined this claim, in trying to show what a losing political battle the so-called democracies are fighting. India he calls "an enormous millstone round the neck of oriental emancipation and the progress of the whole world," and says:

"Americans may not realise that British India is a generation older than the United States. After 180 years of British rule, 93 per cent of the Indian population is still illiterate. In 40 years of American rule in the Philippines illiteracy was cut down from 98 per cent to 45 per cent, while in 20 years the Soviet Union reduced illiteracy from 78 per cent to 8 per cent. In the Soviet Union in a single year (1937) there were 45,900 graduates of industrial and agricultural schools. In India, with twice Russia's population, 960 engineers were graduated. India has generous reserves of coal, but produces only about one-sixth as much as Russia and even less than China. Although India has the third largest iron reserves in the world (surpassed only by the United States and France) her production of steel increased in ten years only to 879,000 tons where it stood in 1935. In the same period in the Soviet Union steel production rose from a million and a half tons to 16 million tons. Little Japan, one-seventh the size of India and with extremely meagre iron resources, produced seven times as much steel. India's water-power resources are second only to those of the United States, yet she has developed only 3 per cent of them as against the latter's roughly 40 per cent. Russia increased her electric power output in 20 years from 1900 million kilowatt hours to 36,500 million in 1937, when India's output stood at 2500 million hours."

"...India suffers from the double incubus of British imperialism buttressed by a string of 563 feudal princes fastened upon masses of men who live in a social darkness unimaginable to a western mind. The princes' territories covering a third of the nation's 1,800,000 square miles, constitute the social waste lands of the East, the regions of "permanent decay". Purely parasitic the princes contribute nothing to Indian society but oppression for the people and glamour for the tourist, while they exact astounding tributes for their personal amusement and luxury. The King of England receives from Parliament a bounty of about one in 1600 from the taxation of his subjects. Some of the Indian princes collect as high as one in two; the least backward (the Maharani of Travancore) gets one in 17. The Prince of Bikaner retained from his annual budget 2,24,000 rupees or more than he spent on education for all his subjects. The royal family, the royal weddings, the royal palaces and the royal retainers absorbed two-thirds of Bikaner's entire budget. Contrasts between the vast wealth and plunder of the richest princes and the British officials and merchants with the poverty and degradation of the Indian people is the measure of the inadequacy of 180 years of rule by the British Raj."

This is a bare statement of non-controversial facts, not made with a view to a study of India, but in order to demonstrate "Britain's political weakness in India", "otherwise there should be no necessity for American aid to hold her position in Asia. India is a nation of nearly 400 millions, with a war potential far richer than Japan and China combined. If the British are unable to defend India and its frontiers at Singapore and Burma without American help it is a significant commentary."

The book was written before America's entry into war, and so then the author wrote, "It is not America's business to decide the destiny of India or any other British colonies." But he added, "It may become inescapably our business if we identify our own fate with that of the British colonial empire." But he was not oblivious of the fact that "democracy in England in particular needs to reinforce itself with something no less than a new charter of human liberty, a new declaration of the rights of man. . . . Britain and the Dominions need to proclaim a programme of emancipation of the colonies as the basis of a world commonwealth of democracies. . . . It will be suggested that the emancipation of India would mean the end of British 'unity'. It may be the only way in fact to create it. The strongest allies democratic England has today are Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and without the help of a certain former colony south of Canada she might not survive at all. A free India could become as valuable an asset to England as a free America. As a matter of fact India is so crucial in the whole imperialist structure that once it were liberated the rest of Britain's colonial problem would be simple to solve."

Mr. Snow proceeds further to point out that it is easy for Britain to throw away this millstone round her neck:

"India's population constitutes four-fifths of the overseas population of the Empire, and nearly nine-tenths of Britain's subject colonial population. Two-thirds of the British capital investment in the colonies, or 438 million pounds, is in India; but on the other hand this is only 12 per cent of the total British capital invested abroad. The colonial empire means little to the British people as a whole. What does it mean to the British investors? The whole thing brings them an income of about 38 million pounds a year, which is less than one-fifth of the total overseas investment income, and less than one-hundredth of Britain's total national income. India's importance in Britain's trade is also often exaggerated. Nine-tenths of Britain's production is sold at home and more than half of the tenth which goes abroad is sold outside the Empire. India takes only about two per cent. Jobs? All the imperial colonies combined employ at most less than half of one per cent of the British population and nearly all belong to the upper-bracket income group which constitute but five per cent of Britain's people. Thus if Britain lost India altogether it would mean the sacrifice of only about four pounds per capita in her national investment income and a two per cent reduction in her total market. The loss in income would in fact be felt by a small group of Britain's monopoly capitalists. Such an item is infinitesimal compared to the terrific levy now being exacted by war and what is yet to be paid in the future."

As against that slight material loss, put the tremendous moral and political gain. Mr. Snow does not use the terms "justice" and "equity". He simply says: "A dynamic strategy is the first political necessity." The Axis powers are making capital of the present anomaly. Britain is fighting, they say, in order to keep her ill-gotten gains, and America is bolstering her up. But when the democracies, says Mr. Snow, "have divested themselves of hypocrisy, they would have seized the initiative in vitalizing men's minds with a new promise and hope, in its period unassailable from any new quarter. The democracies would win not only the war but the peace." "Britain offers her allies behind enemy lines little to fight for, and in this transitional world, it is not enough to have something to fight against."

All this, as I said, was written before America threw herself on the side of Britain. It is all the more imperative now for America to help herself and Britain to throw off the hypocrisy. "The world is today divided between 'ruler' peoples fighting each other for control of subject peoples", sums up Mr. Snow, "and there is no peace until subject peoples become free." Slave India is a millstone dragging Britain down, and may make victory impossible. Free India means the emancipation of all, including Britain. There cannot be a better case for the immediate emancipation of India.

American Propaganda

The New York Sun informed America that the latest expansion of the Viceroy's Council had a hearty reception in India, and a sobering effect on the extremists, Gandhiji having even agreed to the stationing of the Allied troops! Well, Gandhiji had expressed his view about the stationing of the Allied troops at least two weeks before the announcement of the expansion.

Now comes the American Life, said to have a circulation of three million, giving numerous photographs of the Generalissimo's meeting with Gandhiji, with mischievous comments under them. "Chiang Kai Shek", it says "is the fighting leader of Free China. Mohandas Gandhi is the talking leader of subject India." How wretchedly unimportant from the point of view of war purposes India is, Life proceeds to point out in this picturesque way: "Actually India ceased being productive of important order and the efficient prosecution of War."

"With a view to prevent the said Dwarkanath Kachru from so acting, the Government of Jodhpur, in exercise of its powers conferred by Rule 26 (1) (a) of the Defence of India Rules as applied to the Jodhpur State territory is pleased to order that the said Dwarkanath Kachru shall remove himself from Marwar in railway train 1 up of 6-7-42 (manner) which leaves Jodhpur at 7-15 a. m. (via Marwar Junction) and further that the said Dwarkanath Kachru shall not return to Marwar for a period of one year from the date of this order."

"The Inspector General of Police, Jodhpur, is hereby directed to see that the above order is promptly carried out."

The important question arising is how long will the States regard people from outside their jurisdiction as foreigners and deal with them summarily as the Jodhpur authorities have done? And how long must they allow themselves to be treated as such? The Congress has exercised the greatest self-restraint in this matter. Its men deserve a better treatment. If the authorities have justification for their order, they should publicly state it. It is not a matter that can be forgotten. Pundit Kachru ought to be able to return unless satisfactory explanation is offered for his externment.

Since the foregoing was written, much is reported to have happened in Jodhpur. Fortunately the fast has satisfactorily ended. But repression is said to be going on merrily. I refrain from giving the details. I understand that the State has made a generous use of my last note for it contains certain statements crediting them with what appeared to be praiseworthy. Now I have angry letters repudiating principally the admission made by Shri Sriprakash that Balmukund Bisa's death was not due to any ill-treatment by the State. My correspondents say that Shri Sriprakash having not had much time was misled. I have asked the correspondents for proofs and if I get them I hope to submit them to the authorities, instead of publishing a man willing to do business with anybody", and a parting kick at Gandhiji, where Birla's money is described as coming from the manufactured cotton goods that Gandhi crusades against."

But that is American 'Life'!

Unworthy of Their Salt

How some ex-satraps, who are still enjoying fat pensions from India's treasury for "services" rendered to India, are continuing to do those "services" may be judged from pronouncements by two of these. In a lecture on conditions in Orissa delivered before the East India Association in London, Sir John Hubback, is reported (Times of India, July 13) to have said that "the unrest which had resulted in the outrage"—Major Bazalgette's murder—"had without question been organised by the Congress party's 'High Command,' as part of their campaign to compel the Rulers of all States to agree to the election of State representatives to the Federal Legislature with a view to securing we an ~~in~~ <sup>ination</sup> at the centre." Apart from referred to above, but the disposal the huge sterling balances which are steadily mounting up, and also the effect on India of the Lease-Lend Agreement with the United States.

Now without entering into the details of the intricacies of these problems, it should be obvious to the meanest understanding that these questions cannot be discussed in the interests of India by one who in no way represents India. We know the scandalous way in which India has been made to take over the millions of pounds of debts incurred by the East India Company for the conquest of India, and we can well imagine how a Britisher who must always think in terms of British interests will help in making the various deals in the interest of Britain and Britain alone. The object of the Military Financial settlement was to "limit India's financial liability in connection with the war to such measures as are within her financial capacity and have clearly been or will be taken for the local defence of India." But the term "local defence of India" can be made to cover a multitude of sins, according to the sweet will of the Finance Member who owes no responsibility to India. He is equally incompetent to determine the way in which the utilisation of the sterling resources will be made for the economic and financial benefit of India.

The Federation of the Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry have lodged its emphatic protest against the manner in which these problems are being dealt with. But theirs is bound to be a cry in the wilderness, while the British Government can bomboozle an ignorant world into believing that the Government of India executive is predominantly Indian, and while these "Indian" members will not be able to move their little finger in protest against a procedure which is wholly detrimental to the interests of the country they are professing to serve. But the procedure adds strength to the Congress demand.

M. D.

in my book entitled 'The Turn of the Tide', describing the worsening of the Hindu-Muslim situation, followed by Gandhiji's 21 days' fast, the Unity Conference in Delhi and so on. Then these two paragraphs follow:

"But neither the fast nor the resolutions of the Unity Conference solved the problem of Hindu-Muslim Unity. The Conference was attended by most of the prominent leaders, but they had not come as representatives of their communities, and none had the strength to get the warring groups to listen to them or act upon the resolutions. Almost immediately after the Fast riots broke out in Jubbulpore and Allahabad. In 1925 the sad tale was repeated at various places in the country, so much so that in May of that year Gandhiji had to declare at a public meeting in sheer exasperation and almost in desperation:

"I have admitted my incompetence. I have admitted that I have been found wanting as a physician prescribing a cure for this malady. I do not find that either Hindus or Muslims are ready to accept my cure two-thirds of Britain's entire budget. Contrasts between the vast wealth and plunder of the richest princes and the British officials and merchants with the poverty and degradation of the Indian people is the measure of the inadequacy of 180 years of rule by the British Raj."

This is a bare statement of non-controversial facts, not made with a view to a study of India, but in order to demonstrate "Britain's political weakness in India", "otherwise there should be no necessity for American aid to hold her position in Asia. India is a nation of nearly 400 millions, with a war potential far richer than Japan and China combined. If the British are unable to defend India and its frontiers at Singapore and Burma without American help it is a significant commentary."

The book was written before America's entry into war, and so then the author wrote, "It is not America's business to decide the destiny of India or any other British colonies." But he added, "It may become inescapably our business if we identify our own fate with that of the British colonial empire." But he was not oblivious of the fact that "democracy in England in particular needs to reinforce itself with something no less than a new charter of human liberty, a new declaration of the rights of man. . . . Britain and the Dominions need to proclaim a programme of emancipation of the colonies as the basis of a world commonwealth of democracies. . . . It will be suggested that the emancipation of India would mean the end of British 'unity'. It may be the only way in fact to create it. The strongest allies democratic England has today are Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and without the help of a certain former colony south of Canada she might not survive at all. A free India could become as valuable an asset to England as a free America. As a matter of fact India is so crucial in the whole imperialist structure that once it were liberated the rest of Britain's colonial problem would be simple to solve."

Press said about Sir Stafford Cripps' visit to India. It hoped—alas vainly—"that Cripps, a personal friend of the Indian people's leaders, will offer them nothing less than complete equality with Britain," but wisely added,

"Whatever her status, it is obvious that India does not want to be invaded, nor is it likely that even pacifist Gandhi's followers would want to talk "peace" with Japan.

"As a nation with its own rulers, India could fight on the same terms as any other of our allies.

"Like any other country, she could form a war-time alliance for strategic reasons without the slightest reference to the internal politics of either ally.

"Well, to conquer nearly 400,000,000 people is not easy. And if only a proportion carried out Gandhi's non-cooperation ideas, it would be virtually impossible."

What India wants today is to be "a nation with its own rulers", and yet as the paper rightly says "whatever her status India does not want to be invaded."

outside "Negligible takes" per cent. Jobs? All the imperial colonies combined employ at most less than half of one per cent of the British population and nearly all belong to the upper-bracket income group which constitute but five per cent of Britain's people. Thus if Britain lost India altogether it would mean the sacrifice of only about four pounds per capita in her national investment income and a two per cent reduction in her total market. The loss in income would in fact be felt by a small group of Britain's monopoly capitalists. Such an item is infinitesimal compared to the terrific levy now being exacted by war and what is yet to be paid in the future."

PUNDIT KACHRU EXTERNEED

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Pundit Kachru is a well known public worker attached to the States People Conference. When Shri Jainarayan Vyas went on hunger strike at Jodhpur, he was deputed by the President Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru to proceed to Jodhpur and watch events and report to me. For reasons known to the authorities and unknown to Pundit Kachru he was served with an externment order on the 5th inst., at 11.40 p. m., to depart from Jodhpur the next morning by 7-15 a. m., train. He telephoned to me for instructions and Mahadev Desai who answered the phone advised him in the first instance to obey the order and report. He is now in Wardha trying to finish his report to the point he was able to reach in Jodhpur.

Here is the order:

"From information received the Government of Jodhpur is satisfied that Dwarkanath Kachru (name) is acting in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of War.

"With a view to prevent the said Dwarkanath Kachru from so acting, the Government of Jodhpur, in exercise of its powers conferred by Rule 26 (1) (a) of the Defence of India Rules as applied to the Jodhpur State territory is pleased to order that the said Dwarkanath Kachru shall remove himself from Marwar in railway train 1 up of 6-7-42 (manner) which leaves Jodhpur at 7-15 a. m. (via Marwar Junction) and further that the said Dwarkanath Kachru shall not return to Marwar for a period of one year from the date of this order.

REPUDIATION

One wonders if the good men who ask us to wait for Independence which, as the Manchester Guardian says, "will in any case be India's within a few years," realise that that Independence will not be worth having whilst fresh commitments are being made and fresh burdens are being imposed every day on India. Sir Jeremy Raisman is now on his way to England to discuss with the War Office on the allocation, of the war expenditure incurred in India, or on behalf of India, as between India and England. All kinds of conjectures are being made as regards the questions which will form the subject-matter of the discussion. These we are told may include not only the allocation referred to above, but the disposal of the huge sterling balances which are steadily mounting up, and also the effect on India of the Lease-Lend Agreement with the United States.

Now without entering into the details of the intricacies of these problems, it should be obvious to the meanest understanding that these questions cannot be discussed in the interests of India by one who in no way represents India. ## FASTING IN NON-VIOLENT ACTION

(By M. K. Gandhi)

If the struggle which we are seeking to avoid with all our might has to come, and if it is to remain non-violent as it must in order to succeed, fasting is likely to play an important part in it. It has its place in the tussle with authority and with our own people in the event of wanton acts of violence and obstinate riots for instance.

There is a natural prejudice against it as part of a political struggle. It has a recognised place in religious practice. But it is considered a vulgar interpolation in politics by the ordinary politician though it has always been resorted to by prisoners in a haphazard way with more or less success. By fasting however, they have always succeeded in drawing public attention and disturbing the peace of jail authorities.

My own fasts have always, as I hold, been strictly according to the law of Satyagraha. Fellow Satyagrahis too in South Africa fasted partially or wholly. My fasts have been varied. There was the Hindu-Muslim Unity fast of 21 days in 1924 started under the late Maulana Mahomed Ali's roof in Delhi. The indeterminate fast against the MacDonald Award was taken in the Yerawada Prison in 1932. The 21 days' purificatory fast was begun in the Yerawada Prison and was finished at Lady Thackersey's, as the Government would not take the burden of my being in the Prison in that condition. Then followed another fast in the Yerawada Prison in 1933 against the Government refusal to let me carry on anti-untouchability work through Harijan (issued from prison) on the same basis as facilities had been allowed me four months before. They would not yield, but they discharged me when their medical advisers thought I could not live many days if the fast was not given up. Then followed the illfated Rajkot fast in 1939. A false step taken by me thoughtlessly during that fast thwarted the brilliant result that would otherwise certainly have been achieved. In spite of all these fasts, fasting has not been accepted as a recognised part of Satyagraha. It has only been tolerated by the politicians. I have however been driven to the conclusion that fasting unto death is an integral part of Satyagraha programme, and it is the greatest and most effective weapon in its armoury under given circumstances. Not every one is qualified for undertaking it without a proper course of training.

I may not burden this note with an examination of the circumstances under which fasting may be resorted to and the training required for it. Non-violence in its positive aspect as benevolence (I do not use the word love as it has fallen into disrepute.) is the greatest force because of the limitless scope it affords for self-suffering without causing or intending any physical or material injury to the wrong-doer. The object always is to evoke the best in him. Self-suffering is an appeal to his better nature, as retaliation is to his baser. Fasting under proper circumstances is such an appeal par excellence. If the politician does not perceive its propriety in political matters, it is because it is a novel use of this very fine weapon.

To practise non-violence in mundane matters is to know its true value. It is to bring heaven upon earth. There is no such thing as the other world. All worlds are one. There is no 'here' and no 'there'. As Jeans has demonstrated, the whole universe including the most distant stars, invisible even through the most powerful telescope in the world, is compressed in an atom. I hold it therefore to be wrong to limit the use of non-violence to cave dwellers and for acquiring merit for a favoured position in the other world. All virtue ceases to have use if it serves no purpose in every walk of life. I would therefore plead with the purely political-minded people to study non-violence and fasting as its extreme manifestation with sympathy and understanding.

If Japanese Come?

The British United Press has cabled the following questions for Gandhiji's reply. They are couched in evidently angry language. But Gandhiji had no hesitation in sending straight replies to them.

Q. 1. Whether Gandhiji is willing to see British go while Japanese on the Frontier.

A. This question should not occur to anybody who has read my writings for they contemplate Allied arms operating in India during war.

Q. 2. Whether he would urge non-cooperation with Japanese after Japanese occupation.

A. Japanese occupation is inconceivable while Allied arms are operating on the Indian soil. If Japanese inflict defeat on Allied arms and succeed in occupying India I would most decidedly advise full non-cooperation.

Q. 3. Whether he would persist in urging (non-cooperation) if Japs shot non-cooperators;

Q. 4. Whether he would rather be shot than cooperate himself.

A. to 3. & 4. Non-cooperation worth the name must invite shooting. In any case I would rather be shot than submit to Japanese or any other Power.

CURIOUS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

On my return journey from Palni someone gave me at one of the halts a letter reviling Shri Rajaji and Shri Gopalswami and informing me that they would not allow any one against them to come near me. Now I know to the contrary. No one who wanted to say anything worthwhile could be prevented from seeing me or writing to me. The delivery of the very letter disproves the allegation. Shri Kamaraj Nadar was with me on the same special. He was with me in the temple on the Palni Hill. But there is no doubt that both Rajaji and Gopalswami were closest to me during the journey. They had arranged it. Rajaji is one of my oldest friends and was known to be the best exponent in word and deed of all I stand for. That in 1942 he differed from me I know. All honour for the boldness with which he publicly avowed the difference. He is a great social reformer, never afraid to act according to his belief. His political wisdom and integrity are beyond question. I was therefore pained to find a clique against him. It is a clique that evidently counts in the official Congress in Madras. But the masses are devoted to Rajaji. I am neither vain nor foolish enough to feel that I could have had the huge public demonstrations all along the route of the pilgrimage if he had no influence with the masses in Tamil Nad. Congressmen in the South will act as they think best. But I would be less than loyal to the organization if I did not warn them against losing the valuable services which no one can shoulder as Rajaji can at the present moment.

En route to Wardha, 5-2-'46

The foregoing was written before Bezwada was reached at 5-30 in the morning. At Bezwada a note in Hindustani from Shri A. Subrahmanyam was delivered, the gist of which is given below:

"There is a belief spread in Andhradesh that you have come to Madras with a view to make Rajaji premier. Several Congressmen have been carrying on such propaganda. Taking up the theme, some Telugu newspapers have been writing even against Hindustani. Please give your opinion on this."

I felt bound, therefore, to give my reply. I said that my journey was purely for the purpose of celebrating the Silver Jubilee of the Dakshin Bharat Hindi Prachar Sabha — now Hindustani Prachar Sabha — and incidentally for Madura and Palni temples. The visit was conceived soon after my premature discharge and before the Congress resumption of Parliamentary work was even conceived. My visit has nothing to do with Rajaji being the Premier. My life had no secrecy about it. If I wanted to give an opinion, I was in the habit of giving it openly. But I had rejected the advances of friends to guide them for I was not interested in elections and offices. But since I was challenged I had no hesitation in saying that Rajaji was by far the best man for the purpose in the Southern Presidency and if I had the disposal in my hands I would call Rajaji to office, if I did not give it to myself. But the disposal was with the Provincial Congress Committee and finally with the Working Committee. My opinion was only that of an individual, to be taken for what it was worth.

A POINTER FOR THE FUTURE

"How is the cutting of telegraphic wires contrary to the principle of Ahimsa," a friend asked Gandhiji some time back.

The question is typical of many that have been put to Gandhiji since his release. Another friend who saw him some time after he left the Aga Khan Palace posed to him the problem thus: "There are two schools of thought amongst our youth today. One school holds and openly says that as a programme of action Ahimsa is played out. It has done its work which was to awaken the masses and has set the stage for the final struggle for independence. In this struggle force of arms cannot be excluded. The other school while professing belief in Ahimsa says that there is room for modification and further elaboration in its technique. They aver that the next phase of our struggle would be characterized by organized sabotage on an extensive scale." Gandhiji questioned the statement that sabotage could be part of the non-violent programme or that it was derivable from the principle of Ahimsa as he understood it. The friend however persisted that sabotage had come to stay whether one liked it or not. "Irresponsible prophesying leads to nowhere," cut short Gandhiji. "The real question is where we stand, what our attitude towards it is going to be."

The friend put before Gandhiji some of his doubts. Was destruction of Government property violence? "You say that nobody has a right to destroy any property not his own. If so, is not Government property mine? I hold it is mine and I may destroy it."

"There is a double fallacy involved in your argument," replied Gandhiji. In the first place, conceding that Government property is national property—which today it is not—I may not destroy it because I am dissatisfied with the Government. But even a national Government will be unable to carry on for a day if everybody claimed the right to destroy bridges, communications, roads, etc., because he disapproved of some of its activities. Moreover, the evil resides not in bridges, roads, etc., which are inanimate objects but in men. It is the latter who need to be tackled. The destruction of bridges, etc., by means of explosives does not touch this evil but only provokes a worse evil in the place of the one it seeks to end. "I agree," rejoined the friend, "that the evil is within ourselves, not in the bridge which can be used for a good purpose as well as an evil one. I also agree that its blowing up provokes counter violence of a worse type. But it may be necessary from a strategic point of view for the success of the movement and in order to prevent demoralization."

"It is an old argument," replied Gandhiji. "One used to hear it in old days in defence of terrorism. Sabotage is a form of violence. People have realized the futility of physical violence but some people apparently think that it may be successfully practised in its modified form as sabotage. It is my conviction that the whole mass of people would not have risen to the height of courage and fearlessness that they have but for the working of full non-violence. How it works we do not yet fully know. But the fact remains that under non-violence we have progressed from strength to strength even through our apparent failures and setbacks. On the other hand terrorism resulted in demoralization. Haste leads to waste."

"We have found," rejoined the friend, "that a person who has had a schooling in violent activity comes nearer to true non-violence than one who has had no such experience."

"That can be true only in the sense that having tried violence again and again he has realized its futility. That is all. Would you maintain also that a person who has had a taste of vice is nearer to virtue than the one who had none? For, that is what your argument amounts to."

The discussion then turned upon secrecy. The friend in question argued that whilst individual secrecy created a fear complex and was therefore an evil, organized secrecy might be useful. "It is no secrecy if the person concerned is boldly prepared to face the consequences of his action. He resorts to secrecy in order to achieve his object. He can refuse to take any part in subsequent interrogations during his trial. He need not make a false statement."

But Gandhiji was adamant. "No secret organization, however big, could do any good. "Secrecy aims at building a wall of protection round you. Ahimsa disdains all such protection. It functions in the open and in the face of odds, the heaviest conceivable. We have to organize for action a vast people that have been crushed under the heel of unspeakable tyranny for centuries. They cannot be organized by any other than open truthful means. I have grown up from youth to 76 years in abhorrence of secrecy. There must be no watering down of the ideal. Unless we cling to the formula in its fulness, we shall not make any headway."

"I know we have not always lived up to our ideal. There have been grave lapses. Had our instruments been less imperfect, we would have been nearer our goal. But in spite of our temporizing with our ideal, non-violence has worked like a silent leaven among the dumb millions. That does not mean that we can afford to go on like this for ever. We cannot remain static. We must move forward or we shall slide back."

"Are you of opinion then," asked the friend, "that the August revolution caused a setback in the struggle for independence; that all the heroism and courage which our people showed in the course of it was useless?"

"No," replied Gandhiji. "I do not say that. In the historical process, the country will be found to have advanced towards freedom through every form of struggle, even through the August upheaval. All that I have said is that the progress would have been much greater if we had shown the non-violent bravery of my conception. In this sense the sabotage activity has retarded the country's freedom. I have the highest admiration for the courage, patriotism and spirit of self-sacrifice of people, say, like Jaiprakash Narain. But Jaiprakash cannot be my ideal. If I had to give a medal for heroism, it would go not to him but to his wife who, though simple and unlearned in politics, typifies in her person the power of Satyagraha in its purest form before which even Jaiprakash has to bow. What I have said about the August upheaval is not by way of judgment upon the past—I have consistently refused to condemn it—but as a guidance for the future."

"Our people," said the friend finally, "have faith in non-violence but they do not know how to make it dynamic. What is the reason for this failure?"

"By hammering away at it through painful years," replied Gandhiji, "people have begun to see that there is a potency in non-violence, but they have not seen it in all its fulness and beauty. If they had responded to all the steps that had to be taken for the effective organization of non-violence and carried out in their fulness the various items of the eighteen-fold constructive programme, our movement would have taken us to our goal. But today our minds are confused because our faith in constructive work is so weak. I know, one must push forth undaunted by difficulties."

Constructive Programme

Its Meaning and Place

HARIJAN TITBITS

(By A. V. Thakkar)

1. True to tradition and policy the Harijan Sevak Sangh has, in spite of requests from friends, steadily refused to have any hand in recommending candidates to the Congress Parliamentary Board for seats reserved for the Scheduled Castes. The Sangh feels that by dabbling in politics it would only add to the existing caste rivalry. Constructive work including educational progress and the removal of all social disabilities is the Sangh's sole concern.

2. The wholly unjustifiable prejudice against allowing Harijans of Garhwal to carry their brides and bridegrooms on public roads in "Dola-Palki" still exists. It is gratifying, however, to note that recently magistrates have punished Caste Hindus for looting a Harijan marriage party by sentencing them in one case to six to eight months' R. I. and fine and in another to a fine of Rs. 61/- each.

When cholera breaks out in Kathiawad villages, sweepers are often accused of causing it by using evil 'mantras' and roughly handled. Sometimes they have even to migrate to other villages until the epidemic subsides.

In contrast to the above cruelty came the heartening news from there of interdining between Harijans and non-Harijans on the last Gandhi Jayanti.

4. It is a pity that sweepers even in large towns are unorganized as a class and, therefore, exploited by the corporations. Going on strike is the only way by which they can get improvement in wages. It was only recently after a good deal of trouble in Calcutta that the pay of the sweepers was raised to Rs. 15/- p. m. In small towns and municipalities the wages are miserable: only Rs. 7/- in some places with a dearness allowance of from Rs. 2/- to Rs. 5/- p. m. As for housing conditions, even in towns like Calcutta and Madras, 'disgraceful' is not a strong enough word. Inasmuch as a city deserves a contented army of sanitary workers, the proper and rent-free housing of its servants should be the first charge on municipal finances, just as drainage.

5. The Baghelkhand States are a part of India that is very little known. They are far from any railway line and inhabited by very backward sections of the people. It was not until a year ago that any work of Harijan uplift was begun there by Professor R. K. Yarday of Indore with the help of Sjt. Avadh Bihari of Rewa. The Rulers of Nagand Mihir and Ajai Ghad have thrown open State temples to the Harijans and earmarked funds for uplift work among them. This is a welcome move in these backward areas.

6. The education of Harijan girls being of primary importance, the starting of girls' hostels everywhere is very necessary. Such exist in Dhulia (Maharashtra), Sabarmati (Gujarat), Madura and two other places in Tamil Nad, Davakottai and Trichy, Allahabad, Delhi, Bazwada, Ellore and Guntur (Andhra), Calicut (Malabar) and in a few other places. All these get grants-in-aid from the centre. One such is being run by a Harijan girl herself in Guntur against heavy odds. In order to make both ends meet this brave girl even sold a part of her own land. She needs the help of friends in Guntur in her endeavour.

ARE WE GOING DOWN?

(By M. K. Gandhi)

"Personal likes and dislikes, ambitions and jealousies should have no place in our organization. What therefore distresses me greatly is that dislike, hatred and vindictiveness in private life and even public speeches are becoming common among Congressmen and consequently indiscipline and hooliganism are increasing." This extract is taken from a long letter from a friend. She even quotes instances and elaborates her thesis. But I have reproduced sufficient for my purpose. I wholeheartedly endorse every word of what she says. Though I do not read newspapers diligently, I feel that there is truth in her experience. Now that it seems that we are coming into our own, the evils complained of ought to go and calmness, rigid discipline, co-operation and goodwill must take the place of passion, indiscipline and jealousies, public and private. Or else Swaraj machinery will crack and go to pieces and our future state may very well become worse than the present, bad and insufferable as it is. As I said in Mahishadal, the glow of Swaraj in action must be felt by the illiterate millions of India. They must feel the vital difference between the present autocratic and ordinance regime and the orderly democratic non-violent regime under Swaraj. I hug the hope that when real responsibility comes to the people and the dead weight of a foreign army of occupation is removed, we shall be natural, dignified and restrained. We are living just now in a state that is highly artificial and unnatural. The sooner we get out of it the better for us, the ruling power and the world. I can therefore only suggest to my friends and those who think like her, that they should rigidly carry out in practice what they think even though they be a handful.

TO SUBSCRIBERS AND AGENTS

Drafts and postal orders should be drawn in favour of The Manager, Harijan, and not of any individual, and postal orders should be made payable at the Ahmedabad Post Office.

No individual or organization or agent, except our own branches in Bombay (130, Princess Street), in Poona (299, Sadashiv Peth), in Surat (Kanpith Bazar) and in Rajkot (Sir Lakhajiraj Road) have been authorized to receive subscriptions on our behalf.

Agents will please note that it is not open to them to charge more than the published price for copies of Harijan, and a breach of the rule will lead to the cancellation of their agency. Purchasers are requested to co-operate by refusing to pay more than the published price, and to report to us if extra price is asked for.

A specimen copy will be supplied on receipt of postal stamps worth three annas. MANAGER

ITS IMPLICATIONS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The vast meeting at Palni under the shadow of the Temple was perfectly silent; there were no noises. I seized the occasion to give the audience the implications of removal of untouchability. It began with touch but it would be a wooden thing, if it merely ended there. A Brahmin may be a depraved man in spite of his learning. It would be preposterous to call him one. A Brahmin is he who knows Brahma. It is character, not occupation, that determines the man. The Bhangi is or should be on a par with the Brahmin in all social relations. There is no reason why he should not, other things being equal, occupy the chair which Maulana Abul Kalam Azad occupies with distinction. I would be happy to see the day when a Bhangi, working as such, is in the Presidential chair.

The ulcer of untouchability has gone so deep down that it seems to pervade our life. Hence the unreal differences: Brahmin and Non-Brahmin, provinces and provinces, religion and religion. Why should there be all this poison smelling of untouchability? Why should we not all be children of one Indian family and, further, of one human family? Are we not like branches of the same tree?

When untouchability is rooted out, these distinctions will vanish and no one will consider himself superior to any other. Naturally, exploitation too will cease and co-operation will be the order of the day.

Having dealt with untouchability, I turned to the pilgrimage. There was fear of my being unable to negotiate the flight of over six hundred steps on a chair, if crowds of people insisted on accompanying me up the hill which was too small to accommodate them. I would be satisfied with doing darshan at the foot of the hill. Let not the people, however, think that I was guided by any belief in the potency of images of clay or precious metal. Idols became what the devotees made of or imputed to them. For me they had no potency whilst Harijans were prohibited from entering temples. I had passed by the famous Minakshi Temple in Madura more than once before and never cared to go inside it whilst the prohibition against the Harijans lasted. How could I, who claim to be a Bhangi, care to enter such temples? Then, I was sure that the God of India was God living in the plains where the millions lived. How many could reach the Himalayas? Many have gone and more could certainly go to Palni, but the crores could not. I would be, as I am, one of them.

I was sure too that my prayer at the foot of the hill would be heard more than that of some devotees in the temple itself. God knew and cared for the hearts of men. Outward appearance was nothing to Him if it was not an expression of the inner. It was enough for me that the Harijans were as free as any other Hindu to enter the Palni temple for the purpose of worship.

Nevertheless the millions who were assured that I would have darshan of the image itself would not understand this message and might feel that some calamity would descend upon the country, if I could not go up the hill. Their silence at the meeting encouraged the hope that I might be able to go through the advertised programme.

The speech was delivered at nearly 6 p. m.. But at 8 p. m. I found that I was able to negotiate the hill, and though there was a large crowd at the entrance none insisted on joining while Rajaji and I were being taken up the hill in chairs. Thus happily did the pilgrimage come to a successful end.

One swallow does not make summer. No legitimate inference can be drawn from this incident. However, I cannot help cherishing the fond hope that it augurs well for India under Swaraj, Home Rule or Independence, by whatever name one may choose to call the thing.

Perhaps this article is the proper place for recording my thanks to the South Indian Railway and the staff for their considering no trouble too great for making the journey as little tiresome as it was possible for it to be under the circumstances.

HOMAGE

"Oh! for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still."

I can well understand how hard it will be for readers of "Harijan" to reconcile themselves to the absence of columns penned weekly by its late beloved Editor. But to those of us who had seen at close quarters with what single-eyed devotion he served his master's cause, the absence of M. D., always keenly felt, is today a most poignant grief.

My close contact with him began when circumstances at long last permitted me to throw in my lot with Bapu. The memory of work with him, of lessons learnt from him and the firm friendship formed will ever be a priceless treasure. Noble of mien, noble in bearing and nobler still in character is the bare truth about Mahadev. A man of irresistible charm, with a highly sensitive nature he was quick to respond to affection, full of sympathy and understanding and of superb generosity. But what drew one to him and elicited one's admiration even more than his lovable nature and outstanding ability was his utter humility. No wonder that early in life a man of his calibre was drawn to lay his all at the feet of one whom he served with unflinching loyalty to the end.

May we, who try to help Bapu, be granted, in however small measure, the deep understanding and unerring interpretation of his way of life that was Mahadev's priceless possession and which added so much to the world-wide appreciation of and love for 'Harijan'.

HINDUSTANI

(By M. K. Gandhi)

How can any Indian really be averse to Hindustani? Lovers of Sanskritised Hindi are, however, afraid that Hindustani will hurt Hindi and likewise lovers of Persianised Urdu fear hurt to Urdu. These fears are futile. No language can spread through mere propaganda. If it had been so "Esperanto" would have found a place amongst the populace in the West. They failed because in such a matter the enthusiasm of only a few cannot succeed. The language of a people who produce hard workers, literary experts, businessmen and enterprising persons spreads and is enriched. It is ours to make the effort in that direction.

Only that language which the people of a country will themselves adopt can become national. However virile the English language may be, it can never become the language of the masses of India. If the British regime were to be permanent it would continue to be the official language of their Indian officials and because education would be in their hands provincial languages would suffer. The late Lokamanya once said that the British had done a service to the provincial languages. This is true to some extent. But it was not their business to encourage them nor could they in reality do so. That work belongs to the people and their leaders. If the English-educated neglect as they have done and even now continue, as some do, to be ignorant of their mother tongue, linguistic starvation will abide.

We are today certain that the British Raj cannot remain for ever. They say and we believe that it will go even this year. Then there can be no national language for us other than Hindustani. Today there are two forms of this language, Hindi and Urdu, the former written in Nagari and the latter in Urdu script. One is fed by Sanskrit, the other by Persian and Arabic. Today, therefore, both must remain. But Hindustani will be a mixture of these. What shape it will take in the future none can say nor need we know. Twenty three crores out of thirty speak Hindustani. This number must have increased pari passu with the population. Obviously in this lies the national language.

There ought to be no quarrel between the two sisters Hindi and Urdu. The rivalry is with English. This struggle itself means much labour. The rise of Hindustani will also give an impetus to the provincial languages because it is the language of the masses, not of a handful of officials.

It was for the propaganda of the national language that I went recently to the South. The name Hindi used there up-till-now has been changed to Hindustani. During the last few months several persons have been learning both the scripts and have obtained certificates. In the South too the difficulty is not about the two scripts but in regard to English. We may not blame the official world for this. The fault lies in us. It is we who are infatuated with English. I found this disease even in Hindustani Nagar. But I hope that the illusion will now disappear. A good deal has been done in the South but much still remains if we have to reach the desired goal.

THE LESSON OF MADURA

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The crowd in Madura could not have been less than five lacs and may have been even six. Human faces were to be seen as far as the horizon. It was a veritable sea of human faces. The long route to the race course was lined by people who were all to swell the crowd in the prayer ground. They must push on as much as they could. I doubt if the people on the fringe could even see me, much less hear me or any one else, even though loud speaker arrangements were good and the rostrum high enough. The volunteers were not used to manage such vast crowds. People had come from distant villages where the Congressmen had not worked habitually, if at all. Such being the case the din and noise and jostle were unavoidable. And then the crowd had to deal with a Satyagrahi in me. But my Satyagraha for the first time failed. The people's was bound to fail. They showed the greatest forbearance whilst I was passive. The vast multitude in front of me and on either side sat noiseless and motionless, inspite of the pressure from behind. But the jostling and noise from behind the rostrum continued unabated. I therefore cleared the dais and asked the women members of my party to go. Only Rajaji, Kanu Gandhi and Ramkrishna Bajaj remained. The latter said the way was clear, but as I appeared the people became restive. I addressed the people in front and at the sides and pleaded with them to go away as I did not propose to speak. They remained silent but would not leave. So I thought I would rest where I was for the night till the crowd had either dispersed or made a way for me. Kanu Gandhi the tempter came again and said the people would make a passage and let me go. The car would wait for me at a distance from the crowd. In a weak moment I yielded. I went down the few steps of the improvised strong ladder only to meet the same pressing and noisy crowd as before, though considerably thinned. It was not a safe passage through a noiseless, disciplined crowd for which I was pleading and waiting. It was neither a mischievous crowd. Making noise and pressing forward towards the idol was the only way of expressing their love towards it. Here was a living idol made of the same clay as they. And this idol could not and would not appreciate their loud demonstration. But I proved an impatient and inefficient teacher. Had I waited, I believe this particular crowd would have learnt the value of silent and knowing love, probably of discipline requisite for Swaraj. I shall know much better next time if such ever comes. Any way it is legitimate to ask whether the exemplary behaviour at Palni was a result of the imperfect lesson of the previous night at Madura. In any case, no blame attaches to anybody in the drama and nobody has any cause for shame.

GANDHIJI'S IDEAL OF A PRIVATE SECRETARY

I

The term 'Private Secretary' in connection with Gandhiji is somewhat of a misnomer as he has nothing private nor secret from which indeed the word 'Secretary' is derived. Private Secretaryship under him is, in a sense, sui generis. In the popular imagination 'Private Secretary', especially in its political association, carries with it a glamour, a suggestion of prestige and influence. Permanent under-secretaries of departments, for instance, are known to wield power which makes them a force to be reckoned with, while secretaryship to powerful political chiefs is often coveted as a stepping stone to a public career and office, maybe in succession to the Chief himself. In the case of Gandhiji, however, all this is reversed. His ideal secretary must have no interest save how best to serve his master's ideals. He must turn his back on name and fame and all those glittering prizes of life which the average man covets. He must efface himself completely, merge himself in the master without, however, losing his personality. He must become, in short, his alter ego—autonomous but in perfect unison with him. This is the central requirement; all others flow from it as corollaries.

During the Second Round Table Conference in London a young secretary in India Office, who had come very close to us, once assured us in a confiding mood of his good offices with the then Under Secretary of State Lord Peel whenever necessary. "You know the influence private secretaries wield," he added with a wink. We told him that we were an exception, we were only hammals (coolies). "I am another", he quickly parried, and we all had a hearty laugh.

Gandhiji has variously described himself as a scavenger, spinner, weaver and agriculturist. His secretary has therefore to be an understudy in all these. Gandhiji claims to be only the first servant of the nation. He expects his secretary to consider himself to be the servant of the least. Mere intellectual brilliance counts for very little in his eyes, but passion for truth, rectitude and a sincere striving for the ideals for which he stands means everything to him. Work of any kind under him is a discipline and apprenticeship in life and secretaryship is no exception. His secretary must be ready to perform the meanest task that may come his way with as much willingness, diligence, concentration and care as the biggest. The tasks may range from cooking, washing of clothes, cleaning of latrines or tending the sick to running a big daily newspaper, answering awkward questions from none too friendly and persistent correspondents, reproducing from memory notes of an important conversation or interview or negotiating an interview with the Viceroy or his officials. The late Shri Desai acquitted himself equally creditably in each and all of them. But it was in the former that his apprenticeship with Gandhiji really began and Gandhiji used often to remark in later years that his brilliant success in the latter was due to his schooling in the former.

The first thing that a secretary of Gandhiji has to learn is the importance of being punctilious and exact in little things. Nothing must be done in a slipshod or slovenly manner, be it ever so insignificant. Even in a hastily scribbled note all the t's must be crossed and i's dotted. To post even an ordinary postcard without revision he regards as inexcusable. To try to excuse yourself on the score of pressure of work or lack of time is only to accuse yourself, and heaven help the unfortunate who lands himself in that unenviable position! He insists upon thoroughness and precision in everything. Even a short reply to a casual correspondent must show a close study and grasp of the matter dealt with.

His secretary must not await instructions, he must be able to anticipate them. In other words, he must be able to think and act independently of him, and in a measure to replace him. In 1921, the late Pt. Motilal Nehru asked Gandhiji to send some one, preferably Shri Desai, to take charge of the 'Independent' after the late Shri George Joseph whose arrest was expected. It was a great wrench for Shri Desai to be away from Gandhiji. "Why can't you send P.?", he pleaded. "Don't you see, I can't deprive Lalaji (Lala Lajpatrai) of P.'s services? He is his right hand man", replied Gandhiji. "And I?", protested Shri Desai. "You, I want to cultivate as my brain", rejoined Gandhiji and worthily did Shri Desai answer that expectation.

Assisting in correspondence or other desk work, as I have already remarked, occupies a very small space in Gandhiji's conception of secretarial work. His secretary must be able to interpret him and propagate his ideals and this demands that he should have realized those ideals in his own person. Take, for instance, the multitude of activities which Gandhiji is conducting e. g. Khadi, Village Industries, Harijan service, basic education, cow service and, last but not the least, the Ashram. In order to be of real help to him, his secretary must not only have theoretical knowledge of all these but must in a measure identify himself with these in practice. Thus, the late Shri Mahadev Desai had a passion for spinning, particularly spinning on takli and the stamp of his interest could be seen in the columns of 'Young India' and 'Harijan'. Those who saw him issue forth at the head of the bucket-and-broom brigade from Maganwadi, day after day and week after week, in the midst of heavy pressure of work, could understand his passionate advocacy of the cause of Harijans and Village uplift in Gandhiji's weeklies. Not only did it enable him to present Gandhiji's ideas on these subjects with force and conviction through his writings, but his personal example fired workers with a passion for these branches of Gandhiji's activities.

Gandhiji is a very exacting task-master. "Therein fail not" is his motto. Whenever he has assigned a task to you, difficulties in the way are never accepted as an excuse for failing to perform it. You have to foresee and be prepared for all emergencies.

Thus, the late Shri Desai often carried candles with him during railway journeys to enable him to work at night in case there were no lights in the compartment (as at times it happened in those early days in Bihar), or the lights failed. Once he actually had to do the writing for 'Young India' by getting into the lavatory of Gandhiji's second class compartment. Lights in Gandhiji's compartment had to be put out at bed time to enable Gandhiji to go to sleep and the balance of the matter had to be made up and posted by a particular time. When Gandhiji visited the lavatory in the middle of the night, he was surprised to find the two of us already in possession — our papers spread out on the floor. We got a scolding but the writing was finished and posted at the right station so as to reach Ahmedabad in time for the next weekly issue of 'Young India'. During the twentythree years that he was associated with Gandhiji, in conducting his various weeklies (and this included visits to Burma, Ceylon, and England), I do not remember a single occasion when the publication of any of them was held up or delayed owing to late arrival of matter.

A Model

[Shri Thakkar Bapa sends the following account of Dr. Gurubatham's work in Shantipuram, Chittur District. P.]

"Dr. Gurubatham is a medical man who has specialized in eye diseases. Up till a few months ago he was practising in Coimbatore and Vellore and has a reputation for cataract operations. He has, however, given up his lucrative practice and decided to settle down in a rural area. His estate of 60 acres is on the banks of the Palar river and he is now popularly known as the "Palar Doctor". He and his family are Christians in the best sense of the term. The eldest son is a graduate in agriculture. In spite of being a landlord, he tills the soil and works in the fields with the labourers. The doctor too has taken to farming. In addition he is a carpenter and blacksmith. He has sheep and poultry as well as a good dairy. In fact there is no aspect of village life in which he does not take interest.

He has built a simple home for himself and his wife. There is a guest-house too which is, at the moment, being used for in-patients. In addition to dispensing medicines he performs urgent operations. But his main object is to serve the villagers in every way. Both his second son and daughter are studying medicine and Dr. Gurubatham hopes they will step into his shoes. He has a school where 30 children are receiving instruction. He is anxious to turn this into a basic school. He is fighting against untouchability. He will not allow his date palms to be tapped in the sure hope that when the new government comes there will be prohibition and the trees will yield 'gur' instead of toddy. Labourers and artisans are being paid a higher wage by him than the 3 or 4 annas which they usually earn.

Dr. Gurubatham has been working in villages off and on for six years. He has found it an uphill task but is certain of success. He hopes to make Shantipuram the Sevagram of the South where workers may be trained to build up village life in his province."

NON-VIOLENCE AND MOLESTATION OF WOMEN

On the night of 29th December 1945, Gandhiji met about 200 men and women of Mahishadal and the nearabout villages. They included local workers and victims of police and military atrocities during the 1942 upheaval. Gandhiji invited questions. The first question was whether they were expected to remain non-violent even in the face of their women being dishonoured. They believed in suffering for Swaraj. They believed that any departure from non-violence would delay the coming of Swaraj. Then, what could they do in cases of molestation of their womenfolk?

Gandhiji replied that he had been asked the same question in 1920 and 1921 and he could only repeat the reply which he gave then. The question betrayed ignorance of non-violence and also of Swaraj of his conception. He did not want Swaraj at the cost of women's honour. If what passed as non-violence did not enable them to protect the honour of women or if it did not enable the women to protect their own honour, it was not non-violence. "Believe me, it is something quite different," and he described what he had written in "Hind Swaraj" in 1909. The reader should read the argument on pages 44 to 51 of the Navajivan Press edition. Gandhiji observed that experience had added force to the argument. "After all who protected Sita from Ravan? The Poet tells us that her purity was such that Ravan dared not compass his end without her consent."

He warned them in the end that if anybody came to him with the plea that they could not protect the honour of their womenfolk because they had taken the vow of non-violence, he would give them no quarter. Non-violence should never be used as a shield for cowardice. It was a weapon of the brave. He would rather they died fighting violently than became helpless witnesses to such atrocities. A truly non-violent man would never live to tell the tale of such atrocities. He would have laid down his life on the spot in non-violent resistance.

In this connection I am reminded of Gandhiji's Frontier tour where the Khudai Khidmatgars had asked him the same question. "What if the miscreant does not kill you but ties you up instead and gags you so that you are forced to be a silent witness of his misdeed," they had asked after hearing his reply which was practically the same as he gave to the people at Mahishadal. "I will struggle," he had replied, "so that I will either break the bonds or break myself in the effort. In no case will I remain a helpless witness. When that intensity of feeling is there God will come to your aid, and somehow or other spare you the agony of being a living witness to such a deed."

'Harijan' Revived

Why is "Harijan" revived? This question may have occurred to many as it has to me. I may tell the reader that no special effort was made for its revival. An application for the removal of the ban was made on 3-12-'45 and the ban was removed on 10-1-'46. Many readers, including English and American, had all along felt a void and they began to feel it more after the defeat of the Fascist Powers. The reason for the feeling was obvious. They wanted my reaction, in terms of Truth and Non-violence, to the various events happening in India, if not in the world. I wished to satisfy this desire.

There have been cataclysmic changes in the world. Do I still adhere to my faith in truth and non-violence? Has not the atom bomb exploded that faith? Not only has it not done so but it has clearly demonstrated to me that the twins constitute the mightiest force in the world. Before it the atom bomb is of no effect. The two opposing forces are wholly different in kind, the one moral and spiritual, the other physical and material. The one is infinitely superior to the other which by its very nature has an end. The force of the spirit is ever progressive and endless. Its full expression makes it unconquerable in the world. In saying this I know that I have said nothing new. I merely bear witness to the fact. What is more, that force resides in everybody, man, woman and child, irrespective of the colour of the skin. Only in many it lies dormant, but it is capable of being awakened by judicious training.

It is further to be observed that without the recognition of this truth and due effort to realize it, there is no escape from self-destruction. The remedy lies in every individual training himself for self-expression in every walk of life, irrespective of response by the neighbours. "Harijan" will attempt from week to week to stand up for this truth and illustrate it.

Nature Cure Clinic

Readers are aware that I have become co-trustees with Shree Jehangir Patel and with Dr. Dinshah Mehta in his clinic at Poona. A condition of the trust is that from January 1st. this year the clinic should become a clinic for the poor instead of for the rich. The conception was mine but owing to my absence on tour the condition has not been wholly fulfilled. I am hoping to go to Poona this month, however, and trust I shall be able to do some work in this connection. My fervent hope is that rich patients will, if they come, pay to their fullest capacity and yet live in the same wards as the poor. I believe that by doing so they will derive more benefit from henceforth. Those unwilling to abide by this condition need not trouble to go to the clinic. This rule is necessary.

In addition to treatment for their ailments, poor patients will also be taught how to live healthy lives. It is a common belief today that nature cure is expensive, more so than Ayurvedic or allopathic. If this is proved to be true I shall have to admit failure. But I believe that the opposite is true and my experience also bears out the belief. It is the duty of a nature cure doctor not only to look after the body but also pay attention to and prescribe for the soul of a patient. The best prescription for the soul is of course Ramanama (God's name). I cannot today go into the meaning of and method of applying Ramanama. I will only say that the poor do not stand in need of much medicine. They die uncared for as it is. Their ignorance makes them blind to what nature teaches us. If the Poona experiment succeeds, Dr. Dinshah Mehta's dream of a nature cure university will come true.

Help of India's true nature cure doctors is needed in this great work for the country. There can be no question of making money in it. The need is for those who are filled with the spirit of service to the poor and only with a sufficient number of such doctors can the work progress. The mere title of a doctor is no criterion; a real doctor is he who is a true servant. Those who have experience and knowledge and are anxious to serve may write with a list of their qualifications. No replies will be given to those whose qualifications are not upto standard.

Readers will please note that work has increased with the revival of 'Harijan'. There will, therefore, be very little scope for replying to individual letters.

On train to Wardha,

SOME LABOUR QUESTIONS

(By M. K. Gandhi) —

During the pilgrimage to Madras and Palni the following document signed by 259 persons was handed to me at a tremendously large meeting of labourers at Golden Rock:

"We the workers of the S. I. Ry. beg to place before you some of our major problems with a view to get your support.

"Nearly 264,000 workers are going to be retrenched all over the Railways. In S. I. Ry. alone 10,000 will be retrenched and till now more than 2,000 have been discharged. The Government contemplate absorption of ex-service men in place of Railwaymen, thus putting us against the ex-soldiers.

"We have been demanding a minimum living wage of Rs. 30/- per mensem. At present the lowest wage is Rs. 8/- to Rs. 15/- and a majority of us receive less than Rs. 18/- per mensem.

"Out of 42,000 Railway employees only 8,000 are provided with quarters, of which the majority are infested with insanitary conditions, and are without proper ventilation.

"You may be aware of the decision of the All India Railwaymen's Federation demanding adjudication or a court of enquiry if they refuse to redress our grievances and accept the suggestions. The suggestions were intended for improvements in the Railway system and the condition of the employees. For your reference we are giving below the sixteen suggestions forwarded to the Railway Board and the Government by the Federation.

1. Reduction of work to 40 hours per week as a first step and further to 40 hours per week for all the staff including running staff without fall in wages.

2. Introduction of weekly calendar days off for all the Railwaymen.

3. Leave reserves to be increased to 25%.

4. Reduction of rail length for Engineering gangmen.

5. Extension of leave facilities to daily rated and inferior service staff on a par with subordinates.

6. All the work now done through contract labour should be taken over departmentally.

7. Reduction of mileage for overhaul of locomotives, wagons and carriages.

8. Expansion of workshop production namely construction of boilers, engine parts etc..

9. Manufacture of locomotives, carriages and wagons in the Indian Railway workshops.

10. Rebuilding of third class carriages so as to provide better facilities for passengers such as bath rooms, fans, and sleeping accommodation for long distance travel etc..

11. Reopening all the lines that were closed and the restoration of all the trains stopped during the 'period' of war and further expansion of services to meet the needs of the public.

12. A programme of house building with a view to provide decent houses for all Railwaymen.

13. Construction of new lines to suit the needs of the country.

14. Laying down of double tracks wherever necessary.

15. Introduction of Rail Motor transport to the distant towns and villages where railways cannot reach.

16. R. A. F. workshops now controlled by Railways to be maintained and extended to serve the needs of aviation.

"In the demand of ours for full work, living wages, proper housing facilities etc., we request you to support us and give a lead in the matter to the country and force the Railway Board to accept the same and save thousands of Railwaymen and others from unemployment, misery and poverty."

If the workers are to be retrenched in order to make room, as alleged in the letter, for ex-soldiers, it is, in my opinion, doubly wrong. Wrong for the ex-soldiers in that they will be favoured and a soldier who accepts favoured treatment is no soldier. The second wrong will be to the men to be retrenched who, for no fault of their own, will be thrown out of employment. It will not do to say they were temporary hands. The State has to find work for all unemployed persons.

Coming to the Railwaymen's demands, items Nos. 1-9 and No. 12 fall, in my opinion, within the sphere of labour, but whether they are reasonable or not cannot be said without hearing the Railway Authorities' side. They should be referred to arbitration. They cannot be made a subject of strike before the process of arbitration has been gone through. Any lightning strike is a form of dictation which is dangerous.

Items Nos. 10, 11 and 13-16 cannot legitimately be demanded by labourers. They are passengers' grievances and passengers, i. e. the public, can take them up.

Item No. 10, I would consider quite extravagant. By far the largest number of passengers belong to the 3rd class and I have no doubt they deserve progressively better treatment, not the 1st and 2nd class. Railway cars of the not distant future will have no classes. Classless society is the ideal; not merely to be aimed at but to be worked for and, in such society, there is no room for classes or communities. Until that time is arrived at, 1st and 2nd class comforts should be standardized and lowered where necessary and all attention bestowed upon 3rd class passengers. But I cannot visualize a time when 3rd class carriages, no matter how distant the journey may be, can carry bathing accommodation for tens of thousands of travellers. What is required is proper bathing arrangements for 3rd class passengers at railway stations. 3rd class passengers are the most neglected in India. Railway cars and railway stations should be utilized for proper education of the public in sanitation and cleanliness. This is not the case today. And the quicker Hindu and Mohammedan tea or water distinctions disappear the better. Why should the State recognize these unnatural and irreligious distinctions? Those who consider themselves defiled by service rendered by persons not belonging to their own persuasion may well be left to their own resources.

The Association for Railway Passengers' relief should certainly ventilate grievances before the authorities. Their main work should be to conduct sustained education among the passengers as to their own duty towards one another and about observing laws of cleanliness and hygiene.

AND SO IT CAME OUT

Despatching of matter for the 'Harijan' weeklies always used to be a bit of an exciting adventure when Gandhiji used to be constantly on the move. It involved pouring over railway maps and endless columns of Bradshaw and the Indian Post and Telegraph Guide, checking up of train timings and train connections, not to mention the exigencies of late arrivals and erratic habits of certain trains. It made some of Gandhiji's staff fair experts in the arcana of Indian postal lore. For instance, Gandhiji could tell with exact precision the time the post would take to be delivered at a particular place by the various alternative routes. Once in the course of Gandhi-Irwin negotiations a question arose as to whether a particular letter which Lord Irwin had addressed to Gandhiji had been despatched in time. Lord Irwin maintained that it must have been. "Then it ought to have reached me before I left Bardoli," replied Gandhiji. "You better make an inquiry in your office. There is bound to have been some despatching delay." And so in the end it proved to be.

But all his precision availed nothing this time before the vagaries of the 'special' which brought us to Wardha from Madras. It was the European member from Madras, I think, who once, in the course of a debate in the Central Assembly, compared the "speed and steadiness" of the 'Grand Trunk Express' to that of a "drunken caterpillar in the final stages of inebriety". Well, Gandhiji's special train outdid the record of Mr. F. E. James' Grand Express. It was scheduled to reach Wardha at 5 p. m.

The Bombay Mail left Wardha at 6.10 p. m.. From Madras to Madura and Palni and back was a giddy whirl of distractions for Gandhiji and he did the bulk of his writing during the train journey to Wardha. We had counted upon posting part of the copy from Wardha. All of a sudden on the morning of the 5th Gandhiji called me. "Are we running to time?", he asked. "There was an unnecessary forty minutes' delay at Bezwada and another at Kazipet."

"It is true," I said. "We are already two hours behind time. The delay I am told was owing to the difficulty in clearing the crowds at the stations named."

"Let me have a list of train stoppages at once," he remarked. "Let us see whether we cannot eliminate some of them to make up for the lost time." I ran to the guard and explained to him the situation.

"Sorry," he replied. "Only two more stoppages. One is the reversing station, the other the watering station."

"Then speed up till the boiler bursts," I said laughing rather ruefully.

"Track restrictions within the Nizam's Dominions don't permit it," he replied.

All the same when he came to report to Gandhiji a few minutes later he solemnly promised to 'try' to take the train to Wardha in time. It was however clear that his offer was to be taken only in the Pickwickian sense. There were 238 miles yet to be covered and even at the rate of 40 m. p. h. and without any stoppage it would need six hours. By that time it would be 8 p. m.. So we gave up all further striving. Apparently the train staff took the cue from us and, what with the "watering requirements" of the everthirsty engine and with other causes too abstruse for a layman to follow, the train arrived at Wardha at 11.45 at night.

What was to be done? Get the matter sent by air from Bombay? But the plane takes off from Bombay before the arrival of the Bombay Mail these days. "Let us send copies of all the articles to Bombay and get the first issue of the 'Harijan' weeklies printed there," Gandhiji suggested. "I once did like that in Phoenix in the case of 'Indian Opinion'."

"But what about despatch? We have not got the subscribers' registers." So that was that.

"Let us try to send all articles including Hindustani and Gujarati by wire," I suggested.

"Then put the Hindustani and Gujarati articles in Roman script."

I spent the whole of the morning at this thankless task. (When will our news agencies begin to transmit press messages in Rashtrabhasha over the wires?) But, in the meantime Kanu Gandhi had a brainwave. "Send English articles by wire and the rest by a special messenger. He will reach there one day late but if the Harijan work begins earlier, the press will be able to catch up with the rest. And so a special messenger was sent and the first issue of the three weeklies was once more brought out in time after all the misadventures.

GANDEHIJI'S STATEMENT

Gandhiji has issued the following statement to the press:

The food situation brought the Private Secretary to H. E. the Viceroy to me. I had many meetings and appointments up to a fairly long time. These I could not disregard and I do not know how to fly and hope I may never have to do so. Therefore, in reply to an imperative invitation from His Excellency, I asked that he should send me someone who could speak for him and so the P. S. V. came yesterday. Food situation alone brought him to me. Could I say something in order to lift the question out of the political arena and out of the general distrust of Government intentions and policy? As the matter brooks no delay I give here the purport of what I said. So far as the Congress policy is concerned His Excellency should invite Maulana Sahib and if he cannot come ask him to name his deputy. I personally feel that the present irresponsible executive should be immediately replaced by a responsible one chosen from the elected members of the Central Legislature. I also personally feel that this responsibility should be shouldered by the elected members of the Central Legislature irrespective of parties, for famine of cloth and food is common to the millions of India. Whether the Government can accept the suggestion and whether the different political parties that compose the Central Legislature consider it practicable or not is more than I can say. But this much I can say without fear of contradiction. I have little doubt that if the mercantile community and the official world become honest, if only in face of the impending calamity, we are such a vast country that we can just tide over the difficulty even if no help comes from the outside world, which is itself groaning. Grain and cloth dealers must not hoard, must not speculate. Food should be grown on all cultivable areas wherever water is or is made available. Flower gardens should be used for growing food crops. This has been done during the period of war. The present is, in some respects, worse than the war period. Before we have eaten up the grain we have in stock we must economize like misers. All ceremonial functions should be stopped. Women can play the highest part in the alleviation of the present distress by economizing in their households. In nine tenths of our activity we can manage our daily affairs without the aid of the Government, whatever its colour may be, if only it will refrain from interfering with the people. Panic must be avoided at all costs. We must refuse to die before death actually takes toll and think of the skeletons of India and the least little thing we may do to help, and all will be well with India. Let us not hypnotize ourselves into the belief that because we can indulge ourselves, our next-door neighbour can do likewise. Cloth famine, I know, is a mockery for, if only the Government and millowners will act honestly and intelligently, no one need go naked for want of cloth. We have cotton enough and idle hands enough and skill enough to make in our villages all the cloth we need.

Note: Readers will realize that as it was Gandhiji's silence day his replies could only be given in writing.

PRESERVATION OF CATTLE

(By M. K. Gandhi)

The Goseva Sangh which has its headquarters in Wardha was the late Shri Jamnalalji's last creation. He served the public cause in a variety of ways. For years money-making had ceased to be his main occupation. If he cared for money it was only with the object of financing public activities. Eleventh day of February was the fifth anniversary of his death, and his followers and comrades decided to celebrate this anniversary by holding a meeting of friends and workers of the Goseva Sangh.

An hour before he died he was working for this cause. Gopuri where the meeting took place is his creation. His ashes rest there and the first meeting of the Sangh was also held there. The name Goseva was chosen after careful thought. The sense of patronage contained in Goraksha was eliminated by the substitution of the word Seva. The Hindu believes in the cow as mother and indeed she is so. An American has described her as the "Mother of Prosperity" and the description is correct. It is another matter that they eat beef in the West. They believe, at the same time, that the cow occupies the highest place amongst those animals which contribute to man's comfort and happiness. It is difficult, if not impossible, for an Indian to think of man as being able to live without cow's milk.

Preservation of cattle is a vital part of Goseva. It is a vital question for India. And it is a tragedy that the country which worships the cow pays scant attention to her and her progeny. While we may not kill the cow we definitely torture her. Matters have reached such a sorry pass that today cattle seem to have become a burden and people talk of killing them off in order to lighten this load. What could one Jamnalalji do to battle against such odds? And now, even he is not among us.

Speeches are not going to solve the problem. There is urgent need for deep study and the spirit of sacrifice. To amass money and dole out charity does not connote real business capacity. To know how to preserve cattle, to impart this knowledge to the millions, to live up to the ideal oneself and to spend money on this endeavour is real business. Today the opposite obtains. The rich amass wealth somehow and salve their consciences by giving a paltry sum out of it towards the upkeep of Goshalas by untrained persons and fancy that they have acquired merit. Jamnalalji was well aware of these shortcomings and was working out a scheme to overcome them. In the meanwhile, death claimed him. Perhaps even greater capacity is needed to solve this immensely difficult problem than to obtain Swaraj.

FAMINE OF GRAIN AND CLOTH

(By M. K. Gandhi)

During my wanderings in Bengal, Assam and Madras I heard tales of distress due to shortage of food and cloth. Reports come to me from other parts of India. They support the same tale. Dr. Rajendraprasad tells me that the Government report expressing fear of shortage of food immediately doubled the market price. This is a bad sign. Such speculation should be a thing of the past. The merchantile community should be competent to curb such greed. Let them not add to the distress caused by the Government mistakes or incompetence. There are merchantile associations and chambers. If they act patriotically, they can help most to prevent panic and speculation.

It is the fashion to blame nature for famine. Scarcity of rain is by no means a monopoly of India. In other countries, though people welcome rains they have made themselves fairly independent of rainfall during a season or two. Here, Government have used themselves and the public to the idea that famines come when there is shortage of water-fall. Had the mind been framed otherwise, they would have made adequate provision for shortfalls. They only tinkered with the problem and naturally so. For, the official world was taught to think no better. Originality there could be none in a close monopoly organization like the Government of India. It is the largest autocracy the world has known. Democracy has been reserved only for Great Britain. And when it rules and exploits millions belonging to other races, it becomes an unmitigated evil. It corrupts the whole island with the idea that such exploitation is the best thing for an enlightened democracy to do. It would be well to remember this fundamental fact, if I have correctly estimated it. If we recognize this, while dealing with the immediate problem we shall be patient with the present actors. There is no call here for patience with the evil. The distinction will enable us the better to deal with the evil.

We must then first put our own house in order as far as may be, and at the same time demand from the foreign Government that since they mean what they say, let them at once replace the irresponsible executive with elected and responsible members from the Central Legislature, however archaic and based only on a limited franchise it may be. There is nothing to prevent the Viceroy from doing this today. I do not propose to answer the difficulties in anticipation. "Where there's a will, there's a way." This one act will restore confidence and allay panic.

"Grow more food" was not a bad cry during the war. It is a greater necessity now. This can be best done only by a national executive. Even its mistakes will not loom so large as those of a nominated executive, however able the latter may be. As it is, even their ability and integrity are in question—rightly so or wrongly is beside the point in this connection. Everything possible should be done to draw water from the bowels of the earth. There is talent enough in this country for the purpose. Provincial selfishness should give place to the national want.

In addition to, not in the place of these measures, grain should be imported from wherever it can be had.

Cloth famine can and ought to be averted by telling the millions to spin and weave in their own villages, the State supplying them with cotton where it is not grown or available and with the simple instruments of production on hire or long-term purchase. The A. I. S. A. with its seasoned workers should be summoned to render assistance and guidance. This will take a few months, if the work is taken up in earnest. Indigenous mills will be called upon to assist this national process by a wise distribution of their cloth in cities and villages while the transition process is going on. Argumentation on the capacity of mills to supply all the cloth required should cease in face of the calamity which is existent and daily growing in intensity. Mills cannot find employment for the millions of unemployed villagers. The educative value of the charkha is not to be surpassed. But for the spell of hypnotism which rules our minds today, we shall all realize this obvious truth, set ourselves working out the concrete proposition and thereby restore confidence to the millions and may be even to the world which has neither enough food nor cloth.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Q. While in conversation or doing "brain work" or when one is suddenly worried, can one recite Ramnam (the name of God) in one's heart? Do people do so at such times and, if so, how?

A. Experience shows that man can do so at any time, even in sleep, provided Ramnam is enshrined in his heart. If the taking of the name has become a habit, its recitation through the heart becomes as natural as the heart beat. Otherwise, Ramnam is a mere mechanical performance or at best has touched the heart only on the surface. When Ramnam has established its dominion over the heart, the question of vocal recitation does not arise. Because then it transcends speech. But it may well be held that persons who have attained this state are few and far between.

There is no doubt whatsoever that Ramnam contains all the power that is attributed to it. No one can, by mere wishing, enshrine Ramnam in his heart. Untiring effort is required as also patience. What an amount of labour and patience have been lavished by men to acquire the non-existent philosopher's stone? Surely, God's name is of infinitely richer value and always existent.

Q. Is it necessary for the mind to go through different stages of progress (including collapse) before it attains absolute calm? Why is it that even when one is awake and quite calm one's mind is often disturbed as in a dream? Why do such things as one has neither felt nor seen in real life intrude into one's conscious or sub-conscious mind?

A. Before attaining perfect calm it is essential for almost everyone to go through stages of progress. I use the word "almost" advisedly. It excludes those who have made consistent effort in a previous existence but without complete success and who will not, therefore, have to pass through purgatory in this life. When the apparently calm mind is disturbed as if by dreams it means that the calm is outward and not inward. What does not appear to have any relation to one's life's experience and yet disturbs shows, in my opinion, that there are many things which have associations but of which one has no recollection.

Q. Is it harmful if, owing to stress or exigencies of work, one is unable to carry out daily devotions in the prescribed manner? Which of the two should be given preference? Service or the rosary?

A. Whatever the exigencies of service or adverse circumstances may be, Ramnam must not cease. The outward form will vary according to the occasion. The absence of the rosary does not interrupt Ramnam which has found an abiding place in the heart. Sevagram, 9-2-'46

THE LURE OF LEGISLATURES

(By M. K. Gandhi)

I believe that some Congressmen ought to seek election in the legislatures or other elected bodies. In the past I did not hold this view. I had hoped that the boycott of legislatures would be complete. That was not to be. Moreover, times have changed. Swaraj seems to be near. Under the circumstances it is necessary that Congress should contest every seat in the legislatures. The attraction should never be the honour that a seat in a legislature is said to give. The desire and opportunity for service can be the only incentive for a Congressman. Congress should have, and has, such prestige that a Congress candidate is irresistible even where a particular seat is contested. Moreover, those that are not selected by the Board should not feel hurt. On the contrary they should feel happy that they are left free to render more useful service. But the painful fact is that those who are not selected by the Board do feel hurt.

The Congress should not have to spend money on the elections. Nominees of a popular organization should be elected without any effort on the latter's part. Conveyance arrangements for poor voters should be made by their well-to-do neighbours. For instance, if the voters from X have to go to Y, the railway fare from X to Y for the poor voters should be paid by the well-to-do people of X. That is the distinguishing feature of a well organized, non-violent, popular organization. An organization which looks to money for everything can never serve the masses. If money could bring success in a popular contest, the British Government which can and does spend most lavishly should be the most popular body in India. The facts are that even Government servants drawing fat salaries do not, in their heart of hearts, want the British Government.

Let us examine the utility value of legislatures. The legislatures can expose the Government, but that is the least service. He who can tell the people why they become victims of the Government in spite of knowing its faults and can teach them how to stand up against Government wrongs renders a real service. The members cannot do this essential service, for their business is to make people look to them for the redress of wrongs.

The other use of legislatures is to prevent undesirable legislation and bring in laws which are useful for the public, so that as much help as possible can be given to the constructive programme.

Legislatures are supposed to carry out the popular will. For the moment eloquence may be of some use in these bodies. Ultimately that will not be the need. Experts with practical knowledge and those who can give to these few their support will be required. In an organization which exists for the sake of service and which has boycotted titles and other such paltry things, the sentiment that to be selected as candidates for the legislatures is a mark of honour is harmful. If such a sentiment takes root, it will bring down the name of the Congress and finally prove its ruin.

If Congressmen are to be reduced to such degradation, who will put flesh and blood into India's millions of skeletons? On whom will India and the world rely? (From the Gujarati)

NON-VIOLENT TECHNIQUE AND PARALLEL GOVERNMENT

Midnapore has always been in the forefront of the freedom struggle. The men and women of Mahishadal made history during the Salt Satyagraha of 1930. In the 1931 Satyagraha struggle it again bore the brunt of Government's repression when there was a mass flight of the inhabitants of the villages in Tamluk before the route marches of the military, characterized by such features as forcible salutation of the regimental colours, plunder and worse. The Mahisha community which inhabits the southern portion of this district around and about Mahishadal sub-division is a sturdy cultivator race. Struggle against nature through the centuries has taught them combination and co-operation. Agriculture depends upon proper drainage of the soil and successfully keeping the sea water out of cultivable land by means of dykes. Their sturdiness and social organization are thus a product of their natural environment.

Perhaps no part of India has passed through such fire of suffering as Midnapore during the August upheaval in 1942, when man's brutality completed the work of nature's wrath. Their suffering had chastened them but did not subdue their spirit. The chastening effect was visible in the perfect discipline and pin-drop silence that marked Gandhiji's prayer gatherings which were sometimes attended by over a lakh of people.

The question of non-violence and Jatiya Sarkar naturally constituted the core of the discussions which the Congress workers of Midnapore had with Gandhiji during his visit to Mahishadal. Jatiya Sarkar was set up in the thanas of Sutahata, Nandigram, Mahishadal and Tamluk in Midnapore Dist. on 17-12-1942 and 16-1-1943 and was formally dissolved on August 8, 1944, as a result of the publication of Gandhiji's statement on secrecy and underground work after his release from detention. By September 1944, about 150 workers connected with it had come out into the open and surrendered themselves to the authorities. In a comprehensive report which the workers of Midnapore submitted to Gandhiji during his visit to Mahishadal they described in graphic detail how during the August upheaval the people had captured thanas, burnt down kutcheries, paralyzed communications, organized a parallel police service, intelligence branch and law courts where delinquents and those engaged in anti-social activities were brought to book and dealt with "according to law". They had scrupulously avoided taking of life, they claimed, and had therefore acted non-violently.

Later on they discussed the whole question of parallel government and sabotage with Gandhiji. "I cannot say," remarked Gandhiji "that all that has been done has been well done or ought to have been done. On the contrary, much of it ought not to have been done. That the people did not remain inert is a matter of satisfaction, but the fact that after all these years they should not have known what the Congress stood for is a matter for sorrow. What they did was thoughtless. By its very nature it could not be sustained.

"You have graphically put in your reports how you blew up a railway track, put a road out of use, burnt a kutchery, seized a thana, set up a parallel government and so on. This is not the technique of non-violent action. People committed the mistake of thinking that all that did not involve killing was non-violence. Sometimes killing is the cleanest part of violence. If you kill the mischief-maker outright, there is an end to it as far as he is concerned, but harassment is worse. It did not put out mischief. On the contrary, it brought the mischief on our own heads. The authorities became vindictive. Perhaps you will say that they would have been vindictive anyhow, but that is not what we should desire or aim at. It does not pay us to let them go into a panic.

"In August 1942, the authorities became panicky. We gave them that excuse. But they are a people who do not know what defeat is; their cowardice is not fundamental. So, they let such things as thanas, kutcheries, panchayat courts etc., remain in your hands for a short while as toys but as soon as they had completed their dispositions they turned the full blast of their machinery of retaliation against us. It is not in this way that India will attain her independence. We cannot afford to repeat it.

"Today you have to reckon not with Britain alone but the Big Three. You cannot successfully fight them with their own weapons. After all you cannot go beyond the atom bomb. Unless we can have a new way of fighting imperialism of all brands in the place of the outworn one of a violent rising, there is no hope for the oppressed races of the earth.

"Let nobody be misled by the Russian parallel," he continued. "Our tradition is wholly different from Russia's. The historical setting too is different. In Russia the whole population was under arms; Indian masses won't take to arms even if they could be given the necessary training. But it is useless to think that our rulers will let us give them that training when they have at a stroke disarmed a first-rate military state like Japan. Today Japan lies prostrate at the conqueror's feet. But non-violence knows no defeat. It must however be true non-violence, not a make-believe. I would not shed a single tear if I alone were left to represent such non-violence."

"After all that we have done and suffered," observed the friends, "we have begun to doubt whether our energies have flown in the right channel, whether the mass awakening was not misdirected. But, is not non-violent rebellion, a programme of seizure of power?" they asked.

"Therein lies the fallacy," replied Gandhiji. "A non-violent revolution is not a programme of 'seizure of power'. It is a programme of transformation of relationships ending in a peaceful transfer of power. If the people had fully carried out the five steps outlined by me in my 8th of August speech in the A. I. C. C. in Bombay, and had there been a perfect atmosphere of non-violence, the Government's power of repression would have been sterilized and it would have been compelled to yield to the national demand.

"If under the impact of foreign invasion or some such cause the ruling power abdicates and a vacuum is created, the people's organization will naturally take over its functions but such Jatiya Sarkar would have no other sanction except that of non-violence and service of the people to enforce its fiats. It will never use coercion. Even those who might hold contrary views will receive a full measure of security under it."

As an instance of the infinitely greater efficacy of the non-violent technique as compared to the technique of coercion, he mentioned the case of Bardoli. In Midnapore whilst they succeeded in capturing a few symbols of power in the initial stages, they could not retain the fruits of their success. But in Bardoli the Satyagrahis were able fully to retain the gains of their struggle. "Moreover, you have seen," resumed Gandhiji, "that all your bravery could not prevent the violation of women. Now that is intolerable. No one should be able to cast an evil eye upon them. This requires inculcation of a higher form of bravery, i. e. that of non-violence which can hurl defiance at death and against which the power of the aggressor cannot prevail. This is what I am trying to do. It may take time. It takes a long time to infuse this kind of higher courage among the millions. Whether this kind of non-violence will ever come into play or not I do not know. But you, who have had training in non-violence for all these years, ought to realize that in your hands non-violence should show all the brilliance that is inherent in it."

They next wanted to know as to how they could start on the right lines. Gandhiji in reply prescribed to them the spinning wheel as "the symbol and central sun of the 18-fold constructive programme." It was the best way of achieving social solidarity and non-violent organization. The technique of non-violent action consisted in isolating and sterilizing the instruments of evil. Jatiya Sarkar based on non-violence would not put Government servants under duress but would effectively isolate them so that they would either have to align themselves with the people or be reduced to the necessity of carrying out the foreign Governments' writ through undiluted barbarism of which they would soon sicken and tire. Even their relations and dear ones would desert them. "This presupposes that no section among the people is labouring under a sense of injustice and wrong at the hands of the others. Untouchability, exploitation and communal rancour can have no place under a Jatiya Sarkar, or it will be like a house divided against itself which must fall."

Criminal if True

A letter from Karnatak contains the following information:

"On 1-2-'46 at about 10 a. m. when the Karnatak Provincial Congress Parliamentary Board was conducting its business in its office in Hubli, 20 to 25 persons effected an entrance into the meeting hall without first obtaining permission of the President.

"The Board had met to discuss some important matters. Some of the persons above mentioned asked for time to make certain representations. The President told them that sufficient time for this purpose had been given to them on the previous day. The Board was now engaged in serious deliberations—but would see them again during the afternoon. In reply they said they had further important matters to represent and insisted on doing so then and there. The President opined that their attitude was quite inconsistent with due decorum and discipline but they continued to insist, whereupon the President said that he would be obliged to leave the hall. As he stood up in order to go away one member of the party tried forcibly to hold him down. Another snatched the office files from his hands and was going to take them away. Yet another hit Shri Divakar on the head with his umbrella. Persons in the hall finally came to the rescue and restored order."

If such be the case the Congress organization will go to pieces. Indeed, no organization can successfully work under a system of terror. I do not go into the merits. That work will be done by the Congress Working Committee. What is reported to have taken place is not only against decency and all the rules of the game but is manifestly against non-violence. Moreover, there seems to be an indecent longing for getting into the legislatures. This indecency shows that the deciding reason for contesting elections is being lost sight of.

Flags And Schools

I have two typical letters about flags in schools and colleges. Some boys hoist the Congress flag, therefore others hoist the League flag. Both are wrong. My correspondents report that the mischief commenced by the hoisting of the Congress flag. Probably nothing would have happened for the time being, if both the flags had been tolerated. The right thing was and is that boys must not take the initiative in such cases. The buildings belong to the authorities and they must decide whether or not to fly, which, if any, flag over their buildings. If boys take the law into their own hands, the result must be chaos and confusion plus breaking of heads. This would be sheer vulgarity and doing no good to anybody. Schools and colleges should be institutions for healing communal breaches, not for promoting differences. If boys and girls do not learn discipline in their schooldays, money and time spent on their education is so much national loss. The one bright thing that emerges from the Lahore episode is that Maulana Saheb Abul Kalam Azad promptly intervened and ruled that the boys who had hoisted the Congress flag were in the wrong.

'Harijan' Without M. D.

'Harijan' has been revived after more than three years, years crowded with events of such magnitude that they seem like an age. The sorrow and suffering that the people have borne with undaunted courage fills one with hope and admiration. No wonder Gandhiji and all our leaders are saying freedom is very near. Freedom is near, but many of those who helped to bring it near are gone. Such a one was Shri Mahadev Desai. All such sacrifices, we have been taught, hasten the day of India's deliverance, and this faith has enabled friends and relatives bravely to bear the loss.

Mahadevbhai often told me thrilling stories of his early experiences with Gandhiji, when he was the only personal assistant that Gandhiji had. At the time of the inception of 'Harijan' also he happened to be the only assistant. They were in Yeravda Prison at that time and Mahadevbhai told me how he had recalled from memory more than a thousand addresses and despatched the copies of the paper to them single-handed. Although Gandhiji was the editor of 'Harijan' in the beginning, from its very inception in 1933 right to the end in August 1942, I do not think one ever picked up 'Harijan' without finding in it something rich and beautiful from M. D.'s pen. Even from the sick-bed his contributions came regularly. He had such a facile pen that Gandhiji could write as much or as little as he wanted to. M. D. was always ready to do the rest. And he did not do so anyhow. Gandhiji and the public had come to realize how faithful his interpretation was. His word had come to have almost the authority of the word of his master. That is why when Gandhiji had a breakdown in 1935 he transferred the editorship of 'Harijan' to Mahadevbhai.

To most of us 'Harijan' had for years become associated with Mahadevbhai's pen as much as Gandhiji's. I remember how once Mahadevbhai left a pair of sandals in front of Gandhiji's hut with 'M. D.' inscribed on them. Sardar in his inimitable humour twitted him, "Mahadev, don't have your sandals there. Some visitor might mistake them for a new type of 'Harijan'! 'M. D.' had become a symbol for 'Harijan'."

Mahadevbhai was a voracious reader. He had the bad habit of never going to sleep without reading in bed. But he had so lost himself in work that whatever he read he read with a view to finding good material for 'Harijan'. The book that was last in his hands, almost up to half an hour before his death, 'The Art of Living' by Andre Maurois bears testimony to this. It has many marginal notes and marked paragraphs by him.

His loss has been irreparable. With the revival of 'Harijan' it is felt more than ever.

WOMEN'S CORNER

Gauhati is the gateway to Assam. We put up in an Ashram, newly started, in a small village named Sarania, a few miles out of the city. The Ashram is located on a slight elevation overlooking the tiny village. The surroundings are charming. Trees offer shade and what ought, in time, to be a good garden, goes up in terraces. A new hut of bamboo matting had been put up for Gandhiji. This temporary structure will be made permanent. One simple pukka building with a kitchen and verandah is already up. Amalprabhadevi, daughter of Dr. Das in Gauhati, has decided to dedicate her life to the service of the villagers. She has refused to marry and her father, unlike most parents, has not only not discouraged her desire to serve but is giving her all the help he can. She has three village girls at the moment whom she is training. She has a doctor sister who helps her when needed. While we were there this sister was in charge of the food which was simple and cleanly served on what looked like white marble slabs but were in reality pieces from the bark of the banana tree, neatly sliced and washed. Excellent milk was procured from two nearby villages and a perfect diet of simply prepared vegetables, rice or bread, lettuce, tomatoes, raw onions and oranges was provided. There was no waste and no superfluity as so often happens with guests. During our stay the place was alive with crowds of visitors but ordinarily it is a peaceful spot with plenty of inspiration to be had from the natural beauty of the wooded surroundings and the view of hills in the distance. More young women with the courage and spirit of service of Amalprabhadevi are needed for the service of women and children in villages.

Durgabai, an indefatigable worker, has lately managed to get land and put up a building in the city of Madras; which is to serve as a hostel for girls. We all know the crying need for such shelters for girl students whether they be from the cities or the neighbouring villages. Of course, this hostel will admit girls of all classes and creeds. Common institutions like this are one great means of removing agelong prejudices as also the canker of untouchability.

In spite of advancing years and failing eyesight, Dr. Muthulakshmi carries on her life-long work of rescuing destitute girls and boys, generally children of women dedicated to evil lives. Now her home in Adyar also contains several Burma evacuees, mostly Tamil Harijans. The children are fortunate to have found a mother in her. Her cry is for girl workers who will lighten the burden but alas! such are not easily forthcoming in spite of the tremendous need.

Dr. Sunderam Ramachandran's Maternity and Child Welfare Health Centre close by to Dr.

Muthulakshmi's home is worth emulation. Numbers of poor women and children come and obtain free attention and medicines. There is room for in-patients too. As is usual with all voluntary endeavour, most things have to be improvised, more room, more medicines, more of everything is needed. Had we our own Government, such institutions would not lack anything. As it is, every endeavour from the national side continues to be regarded with suspicion and, if not actively opposed, is generally left to fend for itself.

Just as in Assam the lovely 'sal' and bamboo forests, the mighty Brahmaputra with wooded hills on either side, the inexpressible beauty of the rising and setting sun on the calmly flowing waters of this river took one's mind away for some time from the poverty, dirt and squalor in which our people live, so did the colourful crowds of the women of Tamil Nad enthral one. I have never seen such crowds as those which greeted Gandhiji everywhere during his recent tour and certainly never as many women as were content to stand the heat of the sun or the cold of a winter night without a murmur. Rajaji with humour particularly his own said one day to Gandhiji: "What have you done to make these women risk their lives in these terrific crowds?", and both had a hearty laugh! There is no doubt that there is an awakening among women. This tide we, who are in a position to do so, should try to take at the flood so that we may direct it into right channels.

The mass of colour displayed in the women's section of the crowd was wonderful. Sitting in the sun they looked like a field of flowers of every hue. I do not think I have seen men in any other part of India wearing brightly coloured 'dhoties' either. All this colour is surely a legacy of the gaiety and laughter that was once ours. The dreary drab of village life of today has to be made colourful once again in every sphere by unabated effort on our part.

One of the most pathetic sights was to have young boys running along by the side of Gandhiji sitting near the window of the train when it was slowly steaming out of a station and pointing to their hungry mouths and empty stomachs. Let us hope we shall not be faced with another catastrophe like that of Bengal.

AHMEDABAD — SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1946

[ TWO ANNAS

WEEKLY LETTER THE GRIM SPECTRE

The grim spectre of the impending famine filled Gandhiji's mind during the brief interval that he was at Sevagram after his return from Madras. He had premonitions of the coming danger whilst he was in Bengal itself and what he learnt about the condition in Bihar and Madras disturbed him even more. He took the opportunity to discuss the question with the Governor of Madras in the course of his meeting with him but did not come away from the talk reassured. The situation called for the co-operation of all concerned and I am betraying no secret when I say that Mr. Abell was agreeably surprised to find when he flew to Sevagram on the 11th inst. that Gandhiji had anticipated his proposals in an article on food and cloth shortage which has since appeared in 'Harijan'.

Gandhiji is not in the habit of allowing the grass to grow under his feet. He addressed the Ashram people after the evening prayer on the same day to emphasize the supreme necessity of conserving and economizing food and increasing its supply by laying under contribution every available inch of space that could be used for growing food. He took up the question with Dr. Zakir Hussain and some other members of the Talimi Sangh who came to him for a talk on the afternoon of the 16th inst.. Since Nayee Talim meant a living co-relationship with the actual conditions of life, it ought to respond to every change in the latter. "It would not, therefore, do for you to say in the present crisis that you are occupied with your educational activity whilst the people are threatened with death due to starvation. Nayee Talim must react to the present situation by converting itself into an instrument for increasing our food supply and teaching people how to meet the danger of food shortage. If the students under Nayee Talim can produce even a part of their food requirement they will to that extent release food for others, besides teaching them self-help by their personal example." Someone had complained that the land at the disposal of the Sevagram Talimi Sangh was of a poor quality and hardly fit for agriculture. Gandhiji brushed aside the objection. "You do not know the kind of land we had to begin with in South Africa. Who would give good land to 'coolies', as we were called there. But by dint of application we were able to convert it into a fruit orchard.

"If I were in your place I would not use the plough to begin with. I would arm our children with the hoe and teach them to use it effectively. It is an art. Bullock power can come later. Similarly, I would not like you to be deterred by the poor quality of the soil. A thin top layer of loam or compost can enable us to grow many a useful vegetable and pot herb. A beginning can be made at once by converting nightsoil into manure by the shallow trenching system. The conversion does not need more than a fortnight. Every pint of water whether from bathing and ablutions or from the kitchen should be turned into the backyard vegetable beds. Not a drop of water should be allowed to be wasted. Greens can be grown in earthen pots and even discarded old tins. No opportunity should be neglected, however trifling. The cumulative result, then, if the practice is on a nation-wide scale, will be colossal."

AT RUNGTA HOUSE

Gandhiji took advantage of his one day stay in Bombay on his way to Poona by delivering his message to the people of Bombay on two vital issues of which his mind is full these days, viz. the discipline of prayer and the food crisis. The public prayer was held as usual at Rungta House on the evening of the 18th. The special feature of the prayer-gathering was the mass singing of Ram Dhun to the accompaniment of tal for the first time in Bombay after the manner that has become familiar since Gandhiji's recent visit to Bengal, Assam and Madras. The meaning and significance of the practice will be found explained elsewhere in these columns. Some among the gathering at Rungta House could not keep correct time in the beating of the accompaniment. It evoked from Gandhiji a gentle rebuke. Bombay had the reputation of being musically minded. It had ample facilities for the teaching of music. Gandhiji had expected them to give a better account of themselves. Instead he found confusion in the meeting and the beating of tal out of tune. "There is a time for laughing and shouting and a time for observing silence and being serious," he remarked chidingly. "I have often said that a people who want to be free should learn to mount to the gallows with a smile upon the face. But laughter becomes an offence against decorum if it is out of season. Similarly, shouting out of season is an exhibition of bad manners. It becomes a man to remember his Maker all the twentyfour hours. If that cannot be done we should at least congregate at prayer time to renew our covenant with God. Whether we are Hindus or Mussalmans, Parsis, Christians or Sikhs, we all worship the same God.

Congregational prayer is a means for establishing the essential human unity through common worship. Mass singing of Ram Dhun and the beating of tal are its outward expression. If they are not a mechanical performance but are an echo of the inner unison, as they should be, they generate a power and an atmosphere of sweetness and fragrance which has only to be seen to be realized.

"In the Police and the Army," continued Gandhiji, "physical drill and training in the use of arms are regarded as an essential part of discipline. Military training includes marching in step and executing of movements to order in the mass noiselessly and harmoniously too. The mass singing of Ram Dhun and the accompaniment of tal are as much a part of discipline in non-violence as physical drill and training in the use of arms are that of military discipline." He, however, warned them that his advice must appeal to their hearts, not merely to their heads, if it was to bear fruit. Dry intellect would not take them far.

SERVANTS OR MASTERS ?

Turning next to the food crisis, he said it presented a grim prospect. They could criticize the Government as much as they liked for its share in it. He himself had not been sparing in his criticism of the Government in the past and he would do so again when the occasion demanded it even though he stood alone. He stood by what he had said in 1942. If the British had stayed in India as the servants of the people, not their masters, and purely to defeat the Axis powers, he would have had nothing to say. Instead they had in their arrogance cast to the winds the warnings and protests of the people's representatives and denuded India of her vital resources, though perhaps not deliberately, with the result that they all knew.

SHED INERTIA AND PREJUDICE

Nevertheless he could understand the food shortage. But cloth shortage he could not understand at all. India could grow any amount of cotton. "In this land of ours, fabulously rich in natural resources, there is the lofty Himalayas with its everlasting snows where, they say, dwells the Lord of the Universe. It has mighty rivers like the Ganges. But owing to our neglect and folly, the year's rains are allowed to run down into the Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Sea. If all this water was trapped and harnessed to irrigational purposes by the construction of dams and tanks, there should be no famine or food shortage in India. Similarly, cloth shortage can immediately be remedied by planting a miniature mill in every home in the form of a spinning wheel or a takli. That would give us all the cloth that we need almost for nothing. I have cried myself hoarse in pressing this solution on the Government. It is immediately feasible and it is my claim that not a single person need go naked if necessary steps are taken to put it into operation. The only obstacles in the way are the inertia and prejudice in high places.

"In regard to the food shortage I admit that Government alone has adequate resources to cope with it. But even so we need not apathetically resign ourselves to fate, fixing our gaze at the skies for the rains to come. There is an inexhaustible reservoir of water in the bowels of the earth. It should be tapped, even though we may have to dig two thousand feet deep for it, and used for growing food. We may not blame fate before we have exhausted all available means for combating a threatening calamity.

"Today there is a lot of wastage in food going on in big cities like Bombay in the form of feasts and ceremonies. It is the sacred duty of every man, woman and child to conserve every grain of food and every drop of oil and ghee in this crisis. One should eat no more than necessary to keep the body in health and fitness when millions are faced with the prospect of death through starvation. The foodstuffs thus saved can be distributed among the needy poor — not as alms but as remuneration for honest labour."

Proceeding Gandhiji diagnosed the present helplessness of the country to the double slavery — slavery under the foreign yoke and slavery to our own inertia and sloth. As an instance of the latter he mentioned the fitful and inadequate response to the offer under the new khadi plan of the Bombay Kalbadevi Khadi Bhandar to provide instruments of and instruction in spinning and carding and the allied processes to all those who cared. If we were not under the hypnotic spell of inertia and laziness, the people of Bombay should flock to the Khadi Bhandar in an unending stream day and night and make in no time the shortage of cloth a thing of the past.

A PLEA FOR CLEAR THINKING

The political slavery, they all hoped and he shared that hope, would soon end. But the removal of the foreign yoke won't necessarily bring freedom to the people in the real sense of the term. The Congress President had only the other day denounced the recent happenings in Calcutta as being unworthy of a people who aspired to be free. He hoped that they would never disgrace themselves again like that. They were greatly deceiving themselves if they thought that by indulging in hooliganism they would be able to make the British quit India. They would belie their creed and demean themselves in the eyes of the world if after pledging themselves to truth and non-violence as their only means for the attainment of Swaraj, they exhibited their impotent wrath by indulging in looting, stone throwing, arson and abuse. He repeated what he had previously said that if 40 crores of Indians resolved unanimously and whole-heartedly that they would have Swaraj through truth and non-violence alone, it would be theirs for the asking. But if they lacked that faith, it was open to them to repudiate non-violence openly and after due deliberation. People like him might question their wisdom but nobody would charge them with falsehood and cowardice. He was afraid, they could not escape that charge today. He reminded them of Capt. Shah Nawaz's declaration that Netaji Bose had told them that on their return to India they would be expected to serve their country not by means of the sword but through non-violence. "Granted that India produced sufficient arms and ammunition and men who knew the art of war, what part or lot will those who cannot bear arms have in the attainment of Swaraj? I want Swaraj in the winning of which even women and children would contribute an equal share with physically the strongest. That can be under ahimsa only. I would, therefore, stand for ahimsa as the only means for obtaining India's freedom even if I were alone."

WARNING SIGNALS

If there is even a modicum of truth in some of the reports that are coming in, it shows a pretty alarming state of affairs. It was only the other day that Shri M. L. Khemka, President of the Marwari Chamber of Commerce, stated before the Editors' Conference at Allahabad that whereas the Secretary, Food Department of the Government of India, had stated that all export of grains had ceased since August 1943, the export list issued by the Calcutta Customs House showed that only during the months of August and September, one single non-Indian firm had exported from the port of Calcutta to foreign countries no less than 22,504 tons of rice valued at over Rs. 94 lakhs. Shri Khemka added that "a closer examination of the export list of Calcutta alone would disclose further export of rice from Bengal". A correspondent writes from Bombay on behalf of the Manager of an Indian Shipping Company:

"Our line was established in 1917. Since then our cargo vessels have been plying between Hong Kong and other Chinese ports besides the various ports in India. Two of our boats were lost during the war to the Japanese. Our new boat arrived only last month. In her very first voyage to a foreign country last week on 14-2-'46, she carried an export cargo of 2,951 bags of moong dal."

In a supplementary note he adds:

"Last month also the steamers 'Begum' and 'Jalajyoti' have carried about 35,000 bags of pulses and moong to Colombo; 26,053 bags of Lang dal, 3,011 bags of tur dal and 1,612 bags of moong was exported in 'Begum'. I further understand that about the same quantity is exported every month within the knowledge of the authorities."

Equally alarming is the report sent by the President, North Bengal Rice Mills Association, Dinajpur. The following is its gist:

"The Government of Bengal suddenly reduced the rate of rice from Rs. 11-8-0 to Rs. 9-8-0 per maund in 1945, and when protest was made by the Rice Millers against drastic and sudden reduction, the stock of rice including the entire stock of raw materials of boiled, half-boiled, moist and raw paddy in the possession of Rice Mills was forcibly requisitioned under the garb of D. I. Rules, in order to deprive the Millers of subsequent increase of rate to Rs. 10-8-0 per maund."

"In 1944, the Government of Bengal procured half a crore of maunds of rice from Dinajpur

District at Rs. 13 3-0 to Rs. 11-3-0 per maund and sold the same rice in deficit and rationed areas at Rs. 16-0-0 per maund. The Government thus made a net profit of more than one crore of rupees from the procurement of one district alone. With the reduction of rates of rice in rationed area it became the policy of the Government to impose heavy discount or Batta up to Rs. 2/- per maund on rice supplied by the Rice Mills. The Government procured 35 lac maunds of rice in 1945 from the District of Dinajpur alone at the rate of Rs. 9-8-0 to Rs. 10/- per maund and sold the same at Rs. 14/- to Rs. 15/- per maund. It may be noted that the rice on which Government was deducting Batta up to Rs. 2/- per maund was also being sold at the same rate of Rs. 14/- to Rs. 15/- per maund. Thus the Government made a profit of not less than fifteen million rupees. Discount or 'Batta' on rice is being imposed on various flimsy and vague grounds, viz., undermilling, off-colour, under-polishing, over-boiled, under-boiled, and many more new categories are being invented every week by the ardent and aspiring high officials who get quick promotion by helping the Government to profiteer at the expense of the over-burdened consumers. Government purchases medium rice even at a lower rate than coarse rice on assessment of Batta, but exports the same in rationed areas as medium rice.

"In 1945, the Rice Mills were compelled to separate Brokens (Khudi) from rice which were being used as part and parcel of rice up to 1944. . . . Huge stocks of broken rice have accumulated and in spite of repeated reminders, and representations no arrangement has been made for their disposal. . . .

"There are innumerable instances where Government neither purchased rice offered by Rice Millers on the ground that rice is bad, nor granted export permit, with the result that the stock has been wasted or used as cattle fodder."

"If the Millers would have been allowed to export the refused rice even within the Province it would have compared far superior to the notoriously deteriorated rice supplied from the Government Stores. Thus the Government is practically depriving many people from getting the minimum quantity of meal which they badly require in these hard days of scarcity."

"Rice Millers have been compelled to supply cent per cent polished rice, and if any grain of rice is found to be of red tinge the rice is declared under-polished and heavy Batta is imposed. In polishing rice beyond normal practice there is wastage of one seer per maund and it yields more 'brokens' besides reducing the vitamin contents of rice. Thus the Government is wasting lacs of maunds of rice which can be easily saved."

The insistence on the Rice Millers supplying cent per cent polished rice and the wastage involved in the separation of 'brokens' from rice are nothing short of criminal, if true. An immediate searching inquiry and action are necessary if the tragedy of 1943 is not to be repeated on a vaster scale.

NOT LONELY

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A friend wrote to me the other day how lonely he felt in the midst of company. This remark was prompted by my telling him that I distrusted the word of the official world. He did not, and had thought that I might share his trust. Behold his disappointment when he found me wanting. It may be that was not what he meant by his cryptic letter. Anyway that was my interpretation and I replied that as a man of God he must never feel lonely. For, God was ever with him. Why should he care even if the whole world deserted him? Let him trust in spite of me, as long as the trust came from his heart and not his head.

I feel differently. Mutual trust and mutual love are no trust and no love. The real love is to love them that hate you, to love your neighbour even though you distrust him. I have sound reasons for distrusting the English official world. If my love is sincere, I must love the Englishman in spite of my distrust. Of what avail is my love, if it be only so long as I trust my friend? Even thieves do that. They become enemies immediately the trust is gone.

See what is happening in Bombay — the Bombay where I have passed so much time, which has given the public causes so much money and which I had thought had fairly imbibed something of ahimsa. Will it prove the burial ground of ahimsa?

I am unable to think that the incendiarism, the looting and the insults heaped upon Englishmen are or were acts of hooligans. Who are hooligans? Will there be none when English rule is no more? The fashion of blaming the hooligan ought to be given up. We are the makers of the brand. They respond to the air about them.

Imagine the senselessness of looting grainshops. The looters did not help themselves. Even if they did, they were not starving. The grain was meant for the starving. If it was being misused, looting could not prevent that misuse. Usurpers will always replace the looted grain while there is any to usurp. Between the two sets of looters the starving will be more starved than before.

They who incited the mutineers did not know what they were doing. The latter were bound to submit ultimately. Or, was it meant as a lesson in violence? That is not the way to understand history.

I ask myself, and perhaps others are asking, why I am not repeating what I did after Chauri Chaura. I have no call in that direction. When or if it comes, nothing in the world will prevent me, ill or well. Let me reaffirm the truth that I love the Englishman as well as the Indian. Both are humans. Yet I want the rule of and for the masses of India. Lokamanya has taught us that Home Rule or Swaraj is their birthright. That Swaraj is not to be obtained by what is going on now in Bombay, Calcutta and Karachi.

Let every Congressman, whether four anna member or not, think for himself where Congress should stand. Let us not deceive ourselves and the world.

Poona, 24-2-'46

TWO REQUESTS

(By M. K. Gandhi)

A friend suggests that I should resume writing my 'autobiography' from the point where I left off and, further, that I should write a treatise on the science of ahimsa.

I never really wrote an 'autobiography'. What I did write was a series of articles narrating my experiments with truth which were later published in book form. More than twenty years have elapsed since then. What I have done or pondered during this interval has not been recorded in chronological order. I would love to do so but have I the leisure? I have resumed the publication of 'Harijan' in the present trying times as a matter of duty. It is with difficulty that I can cope with this work. How can I find time to bring the remainder of my experiments with truth up to date? But if it is God's will that I should write them, He will surely make my way clear.

To write a treatise on the science of ahimsa is beyond my powers. I am not built for academic writings. Action is my domain. What I understand, according to my lights, to be my duty and what comes my way I do. All my action is actuated by the spirit of service. Let any one who can systematize ahimsa, into a science do so — if indeed it lends itself to such treatment. In the event of my inability the correspondent has suggested three names in order of preference for this task: Shri Vinoba, Shri Kishorlal Mashruwala, Shri Kaka Kalelkar. The first named could do so but I know he will not. Every hour of his is scheduled for his work and he would regard it as sacrilege to take a single moment therefrom for writing a shastra. I would agree with him. The world does not hunger for shastras. What it craves and will always crave is sincere action. He who can appease this hunger will not occupy his time in elaborating a shastra.

Shri Kishorlal has already written an independent treatise. If his health permits I know he would like to write further. It may not be correct to call his work a shastra but it may be said to be very near to one. In his present state of health, however, I do not think he can shoulder the burden and I would be the last person to lay it on him. Like Shri Vinoba he too does not allow a moment of his time to be wasted. Much of it is given to help solve the personal problems of a large circle of friends. The end of the day leaves him utterly exhausted.

Shri Kakasaheb like Shri Thakkar is an incorrigible nomad. Just now he has made the propagation and development of the national and provincial languages his special concern. Even if he wanted to divert a moment of his time to the writing of a shastra I would try to prevent him from doing so.

From the above it may be concluded that there is no need at present for the treatise in question. Any such during my lifetime would necessarily be incomplete. If at all, it could only be written after my death. And even so let me give the warning that it would fail to give a complete exposition of ahimsa. No man has ever been able to describe God fully. The same holds true of ahimsa. I can give no guarantee that I will do or believe tomorrow what I do or hold to be true today. God alone is omniscient. Man in the flesh is essentially imperfect. He may be described as being made in the image of God but he is far from being God. God is invisible, beyond the reach of the human eye. All that we can do, therefore, is to try to understand the words and actions of those whom we regard as men of God. Let them soak into our being and let us endeavour to translate them into action but only so far as they appeal to the heart. Could any scientific treatise do more for us?

COERCIVE FAST

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Telegrams and letters condemning my remarks about Rajaji have been received. Some of them say that all the praise bestowed on Rajaji is well deserved. They admit his integrity, self-sacrifice, great ability and administrative capacity. But they hold his so-called apostasy in 1942 to be unforgivable and add that his scheming to be Premier of Madras is insufferable. For me there is no offence or apostasy in resigning from the Congress and maintaining one's views. If he is scheming to get the Premiership, it is undoubtedly worthy of condemnation and would be a sad discovery for me.

But my purpose in reverting to the subject is not for the sake of defending him. My opinion carries no authority save moral which can be rejected at will. What I want is to reprehend the threat of fasting or the fast itself if I do not withdraw the epithet 'clique' in respect of those who are opposing him. I have given my meaning of the word. And I adhere to its use according to that meaning. Nobody should be coerced into changing his belief. There would be an end to all decency and reason if such fasting became effective. As the author of fasting as a weapon in Satyagraha I must state that I cannot give up an opinion honestly held even if the whole world fasts against me. I might as well give up my belief in God because a body of atheists fasted against such belief. The rule of conduct stated by me is of universal applicability. Incidentally, I may mention that the fasts reported of prisoners in some U. P. jails and now of persons aggrieved by the decision of the Parliamentary Board elsewhere fall under the same category though for different and sound reasons.

THE DISCIPLINE OF PRAYER

Gandhiji accepted no public engagements during his stay in Madras. The only exception was in connection with the Harijan Industrial School at Kodambakam. Congregational prayers took the place of public engagements. If railway journey provided Gandhiji an opportunity to study crowd behaviour, the public prayer gatherings provided an opportunity for imparting discipline to them. Whether India gains her Swaraj violently or non-violently, discipline is equally necessary in either case, perhaps in the latter even more than in the former. In the case of an army, he explained to them, the discipline consists in learning the use of arms for the purpose of killing the enemy. In the case of non-violence it has to be in the inculcation of the art of dying, without killing or retaliation even in the face of the gravest provocations and in selfless service of society. If 400 millions of India could speak with one voice, move together and act together as one man, freedom would be theirs for the asking. Prayer is the greatest binding force, making for the solidarity and oneness of the human family. If a person realizes his unity with God through prayer he will look upon everybody as himself. There will be no high, no low, no narrow provincialisms or petty rivalries in the matter of language between an Andhra and a Tamilian, a Kanarese and a Malayalee. There will be no invidious distinction between a touchable and untouchable, a Hindu and a Mussalman, a Parsi, a Christian or a Sikh. Similarly there would be no scramble for personal gain or power between various groups or between different members within a group.

The outer must reflect the inner. If we are in tune with God, no matter how big a gathering, perfect quiet and order would prevail and even the weakest would enjoy perfect protection. Above all, realization of God must mean freedom from all earthly fear. Political slavery, he has always affirmed, is incompatible with acceptance of the yoke of God; salvation is not for the slave.

In the beginning the gatherings were apt to be noisy which necessitated the omission of the recitation of the Sanskrit shlokas and the other texts from the Quran and the Zend Avesta. But towards the close of our stay in Madras a distinct improvement was noticeable in the observance of silence and discipline which, again, confirmed Gandhiji's experience that no matter how indisciplined a crowd is, it is sure to respond to the higher appeal provided you are sufficiently in earnest, persistent and yet patient.

STEPPING OFF THE LAST RUNG

We are faced with the prospects of famine. For millions of villagers this means descending just one more rung on the ladder leading to starvation—the one last rung which will bring them to the bottom.

Let me describe a visit I paid some days ago to a little Harijan village near here.

I have to ride over there to make some investigations regarding the inroads of a river. It is a frosty morning, and I put on a thick coat and tie up my head in a woollen scarf. A mile and a half across the fields, and here are the little mud and grass huts. The cattle are standing in front. The cows and bullocks are hardly bigger than the Ashram year-old calves, the bones are all standing out on their bodies, and they regard me with dull and weary eyes. The first impulse is to say "How cruel, why don't you feed your animals properly?" But look at the human beings. Are they much better? The same lustreless eyes, the same bones sticking out. In a way they are even worse off than the animals, for Nature has not provided them with a coat of hair and their clothes are in rags. The women are cooking the morning meal. "Will you show me what you are cooking?" I ask. A woman brings out a thin maize roti and a little mustard leaf-vegetable which she has collected from the field. "And the dal (pulse)," I enquire, "where is that?" "Do you think I should not hide my shame with a decent petticoat if I could buy dal?" she exclaims, pointing to her torn and tattered garment, unsuccessfully stitched all over with coarse thread. "Do you mean to say you don't get any dal?" I reply. "It is like this," chimes in a man nearby. "If there are special guests, or some festival, we manage to scrape together a little dal by selling a goat or a calf or something." "I see. Then what about milk?" "None of course." "And ghee?" "None either! Then you must be taking oil." Not even oil!! Then I ask about condiments. "Salt?" They reply, "Yes, we cut wheat grass we can find in the hedgerows and on the common lands and that we exchange in the neighbouring village markets for salt, and if we have enough grass for sale we may sometimes get some chillies."

If such people's food supply will be reduced, it must mean the end. There is no stock in the house, and no stamina in the body. Most of them are landless peasants and all of them are illiterate. Millions of their like are spread throughout India.

In drawing this little picture I am showing nothing new. Theoretically, this state of things is known to everybody. Yet the vividness of their realization is not sustained in well-to-do people's minds. If it were, it would not be humanly possible for the well-to-do to eat and dress and live as they do.

When the pinch of famine begins, the city population will make itself heard, but the landless peasantry will suffer silently in the unseen back-of-beyond.

May those who are to organize the famine measures remember these dumb millions, before it is too late!

When responsible government comes at last, their first duty will be to salvage this stratum of society, and set it permanently on its feet.

GANDHIJI'S PRESS STATEMENTS

I

Among messages and letters condemning my remarks about Rajaji are some from persons threatening to fast if I do not withdraw the word 'clique'. As the author of fasting as a weapon in the armoury of Satyagraha, I must reprehend such use of fasts. No one should give up opinion honestly held even if the whole world were against him. I, therefore, advise against such fasts. Poona, 22-2-'46

II

I have followed the events now happening in India with painful interest. This mutiny in the Navy and what is following is not, in any sense of the term, non-violent action. Inasmuch as a single person is compelled to shout 'Jai Hind' or any popular slogan, a nail is driven into the coffin of Swaraj in terms of the dumb millions of India. Destruction of churches and the like is not the way to Swaraj as defined by the Congress. Burning of tramcars and other property, insulting and injuring Europeans, is not non-violence of the Congress type, much less mine, if and in so far as it may be different from the Congress. Let the known and unknown leaders of this thoughtless orgy of violence know what they are doing and then follow their bent. Let it not be said that India of the Congress spoke to the world of winning Swaraj through non-violent action and belied her word in action and that too at the critical period in her life. I have deliberately used the adjective "thoughtless". For, there is such a thing as thoughtful violent action. What I see happening now is not thoughtful. If the Indian members of the Navy know and appreciate non-violence, the way of non-violent resistance can be dignified, manly and wholly effective, if it is corporate. For the individual it always is. Why should they continue to serve if service is humiliating for them or India? Action like this I have called non-violent non-cooperation. As it is, they are setting a bad and unbecoming example for India.

A combination between Hindus and Muslims and others for the purpose of violent action is unholy and will lead to and probably is a preparation for mutual violence—bad for India and the world.

The rulers have declared their intention to 'quit' in favour of Indian rule. Let the action be not delayed by a moment because of the exhibition of distressful unrest which has been lying hidden in the breast. Their might is unquestioned. Its use beyond the bare requirement will be unworthy and even wicked if it is made to suppress the people or a portion of them. The people have been far too long under the foreign heel. Poona, 23-2-'46

III

I congratulate Shrimati Aruna Asaf Ali on her courageous refutation of my statement on the happenings in Bombay. Except for the fact that she represents not only herself but also a fairly large body of underground workers, I would not have noticed her refutation, if only because she is a daughter of mine—not less so because not born to me or because she is a rebel. I had the pleasure of meeting her on several occasions, while she was underground. I admired her bravery, resourcefulness and burning love of the country. But my admiration stopped there. I did not like her being underground. I do not appreciate any underground activity. I know that millions cannot go underground. Millions need not. A select few may fancy that they will bring Swaraj to the millions by secretly directing their activity. Will this not be spoon-feeding? Only open challenge and open activity is for all to follow. Real Swaraj must be felt by all—man, woman and child. To labour for that consummation is true revolution. India has become a pattern for all exploited races of the earth, because India's has been an open, unarmed effort which demands sacrifice from all without inflicting injury on the usurper. The millions in India would not have been awakened but for the open, unarmed struggle. Every deviation from the straight path has meant a temporary arrest of the evolutionary revolution.

I do not read the 1942 events as does the brave lady. It was good that the people rose spontaneously. It was bad that some or many resorted to violence. It makes no difference that Shri Kishorlal Mashruwala, Kakasaheb and other workers, in their impatient zeal for the moment, misinterpreted non-violence. That they did so, only shows how delicate an instrument non-violence is. My analogy is not meant to cast any reflection on any person. Everyone acted as he or she thought best. Supineness in the face of overwhelming organized violence would have meant cowardice. I would be weak and wrong if I failed to give my estimate of the doings of 1942.

Aruna would "rather unite Hindus and Muslims at the barricade than on the constitution front." Even in terms of violence, this is a misleading proposition. If the union at the barricade is honest, there must be union also at the constitutional front. Fighters do not always live at the barricade. They are too wise to commit suicide. The barricade life has always to be followed by the constitutional. That front is not taboo for ever.

Emphatically it betrays want of foresight to disbelieve British declarations and precipitate a quarrel in anticipation. Is the official deputation coming to deceive a great nation? It is neither manly nor womanly to think so. What would be lost by waiting? Let the official deputation prove for the last time that British declarations are unreliable. The nation will gain by trusting. The deceiver loses when there is correct response from the deceived.

Let us face facts. The coming mission is claimed to be a friendly mission, entertaining the hope that they will discover a constitutional method of delivery. The problem is knotty, probably the knottiest that has ever confronted statesmen. It is possible that the mission will put forth an insoluble conundrum. So much the worse for them. If they are intent upon finding an honest way out of the difficulties of their own creation, I have no doubt there is a way. But the nation too has to play the game. If it does, the barricade must be left aside, at least for the time being. I appeal to Aruna and her friends to make wise use of the power their bravery and sacrifice has given them.

It is a matter of great relief that the ratings have listened to Sardar Patel's advice to surrender. They have not surrendered their honour. So far as I can see, in resorting to mutiny they were badly advised. If it was for grievance, fancied or real, they should have waited for the guidance and intervention of political leaders of their choice. If they mutinied for the freedom of India they were doubly wrong. They could not do so without a call from a prepared revolutionary party. They were thoughtless and ignorant if they believed that by their might, they would deliver India from foreign domination.

Aruna is right when she says that the fighters this time showed grit as never before. But grit becomes foolhardiness when it is untimely and suicidal as this was.

She is entitled to say that the people "are not interested in the ethics of violence or non-violence", but the people are very much interested in knowing the way which will bring freedom to the masses—violence or non-violence. The people have, however imperfectly, hitherto gone the way of non-violence. Aruna and her comrades have to ask themselves every time whether the non-violent way has or has not raised India from her slumber of ages and created in them a yearning, very vague perhaps, for Swaraj. There is, in my opinion, only one answer.

There are other passages in Shrimati Aruna's statement which, as it appears to me, betray confusion of thought. But their treatment can wait.

Needless to say that I have dealt with the message believing it to represent her opinion. If it does not, I apologize to her in advance. My argument however, is not affected even if it is found that the reporter has not correctly interpreted her. For my argument is, after all, impersonal and directed only to the portions which are calculated to mislead the public, irrespective of their authorship.

Nature Cure Treatment

Nature Cure treatment means that treatment which befits man. By "man" is meant not merely man as animal but as a creature possessing, in addition to his body, both mind and soul. For such a being Ramnam is the truest nature cure treatment. It is an unfailing remedy. The expression ramban or infallible cure is derived from it. Nature too indicates that for man it is the worthy remedy. No matter what the ailment from which a man may be suffering, recitation of Ramnam from the heart is the sure cure., God has many names. Each person can choose the name that appeals most to him. Ishwar, Allah, Khuda, God mean the same. But the recitation must not be parrot-like, it must be born of faith of which endeavour will be some evidence. What should the endeavour consist of? Man should seek out and be content to confine the means of cure to the five elements of which the body is composed, i. e., earth, water, akash, sun and air. Of course, Ramnam must be the invariable accompaniment. If in spite of this, death supervenes, we may not mind. On the contrary, it should be welcomed. Science has not so far discovered any recipe for making the body immortal. Immortality is an attribute of the soul. That is certainly imperishable but it is man's duty to try to express its purity.

If we accept the above reasoning it will automatically limit the means permissible under nature cure. And man is thereby saved from all the paraphernalia of big hospitals and eminent doctors etc. The large majority of persons in the world can never afford these. Why then should the few desire what the many cannot have?

Commendable

The responsibility of feeding the delegates to the recent Silver Jubilee celebrations of the Dakshina Bharat Hindustani Prachar Sabha was undertaken by a few merchants of Madras. They did this work with efficiency from January 23rd to February 1st. To feed fifty thousand persons was no small task. The food was good and cleanly served. It was a great thing for an organization like the Sabha to have the burden of feeding the delegates completely taken from them.

The Madras friends deserve congratulations for having so willingly and efficiently carried out the difficult duty undertaken by them.

QUESTION BOX

(By M. K. Gandhi)

Q. You say that one of the contracting parties in a marriage should be a Harijan. I hope you do not call other marriages taboo.

A. This is a good question. I do not believe that all other marriages are taboo. I have pointed to the ideal, the practical attainment of which it is our duty to strive for as speedily as possible.

TO AGENTS

There is naturally an ever-increasing demand for copies of 'Harijan'. It is impossible to cope with it so long as the quota of paper sanctioned for it remains as at present. We are trying to get more paper and would in the meanwhile request subscribers and especially agents to be patient. Agents will readily realize that their demands can be attended to, only after the permanent subscribers have been provided for, and will, we hope, co-operate with us by setting a limit to their demands for the present. Fresh agents will kindly help by not applying at all for the present.

A Useful Pamphlet

A friend sends me a copy of a leaflet published by the Department of Agriculture, Bombay Province. It contains hints on small scale vegetable cultivation in compounds of bungalows etc. This was published in 1942 during war time in pursuance of a campaign for growing more food. What was then necessary is much more so now in view of the increasing shortage of food. It is a pity that the leaflet is printed in English. It may be, however, that only the English pamphlet has been sent to me and that it has been translated into the provincial languages. Be that as it may, the leaflet is certainly instructive and useful and I would suggest to the readers who are interested, as they should be, in the matter that they send for and study it with a view to making use of the suggestions, if they have a plot of land available for the purpose. Among the hints contained are the following chosen by me at random:

(a) Plots selected should be well-drained and not overshadowed by trees or buildings.

(b) Beds in which flowers have been successfully grown are usually suitable but portions of lawns may also be dug up and used for vegetable gardening.

(c) Waste water from bath-rooms or kitchen can be utilized for the purpose.

(d) It stresses the necessity of using organic manure such as cowdung and tells the reader what vegetables can be easily grown.

(e) A table is given at the end showing the quantity of particular seeds required, the depth at which they should be sown, the size of the beds and the distance between the rows of plants.

Helpful Suggestions

A correspondent writes:

"You are at present in Poona. I understand from the papers that H. H. the Aga Khan is your friend. He has plenty of land and water supply at his disposal in his palace in Poona. The same applies to the spacious grounds of Government House at Ganeshkhind. Could not both these places be utilized for growing food? Could you suggest it to him?"

"You believe in fasts. You have said that fasts are not merely for attaining religious merit but are also beneficial for health. Cannot you then recommend to the well-fed abstention from food either one day or for even one meal or more during the week? A great deal of foodstuffs could thus be made available to the poor.

"They say that even a small quantity of sprouted grain, if eaten raw, provides the requisite nourishment. Is this so?"

The above is condensed from a letter. All the three suggestions are sound and could easily be put into practice. The first is obviously for those who possess both land and water; the second for the well-to-do; the third applies to all. In essence it means that whatever can be eaten raw should be so eaten. By intelligently following this rule one can make a small quantity go a long way. I have little doubt that if people understood the laws of dietetics and acted accordingly, a tremendous economy in food could be effected.

Poona, 1-3-'46

(From Harijansevak)

Utilization of Available Power

Q. Flour grinding machines are turned by engines in thousands of villages in Gujarat. By removing them to the source these engines could easily be used for drawing water from rivers, tanks and wells for purposes of irrigation. Could not the Government be induced or the owners be persuaded to divert the engines for this useful work in addition to working the grinders?

A. I regard the existence of power wheels for the grinding of corn in thousands of villages as the limit of our helplessness. I suppose India does not produce all the engines or grinding machines. I fondly hope that the correspondent is incorrect and that the number of wheels and engines does not run into thousands even for the whole of India. But if true, it is indicative of the utter laziness into which our people have fallen. The planting of such machinery and engines on a large scale in villages is also a sign of greed. Is it proper to fill one's pockets in this manner at the expense of the poor? Every such machinery puts thousands of hand chakkis out of work and takes away employment from thousands of housewives and artisans who make these chakkis. Moreover, the process is infective and will spread to every village industry. The decay of the latter spells too the decay of art. If it meant replacement of old crafts by new ones, one might not have much to say against it. But this is not what is happening. In the thousands of villages where power machinery exists, one misses the sweet music in the early morning of the grinders at work.

But to come to the main point. Whilst I hold that these power engines are at present being put to wrong use, it would be some compensation if the engines, in addition to their present use, were also used to pump water out of rivers, tanks and wells for irrigation. My correspondent suggests Government aid for this. Must this be necessary? Will not the owners of their own free will turn their engines towards this useful and necessary work? Or have we been reduced to such a paralytic state that without Government compulsion we are unprepared to do anything? Be that as it may, it is my firm opinion that all necessary measures should be taken at once to utilize existing power in order to save the people from the terrible fate confronting them.

NON-VIOLENT INDIA AS WORLD POWER

We can obtain control over others by generating two kinds of forces—constructive or destructive. Love and service characterize the former, while hatred and fear distinguish the latter.

Today the world is under the power of fear and hatred. This is the result of our socio-economic order which is necessarily based on our possessing a control over our neighbour. Centralized industries which have their machinery and plants located at one place have to obtain their raw materials from distant places. They also have to find their markets and control them in their favour, may be at the other end of the world. Textile mills may be located at Manchester where no cotton grows. The needed cotton has to be grown in India—6000 miles away. After it is spun and woven into cloth it has to be sent back to India to be sold—another journey of 6000 miles. This makes it imperative for the lives of the cotton growers in India to be planned by the millowners of Manchester who will also want to control the Government of India so as to obtain favourable customs and excise duties so that their cloth may be sold. This is done by resorting to channelling science to produce atom bombs and teaching children to sing songs of hatred against the Japanese or the Germans, the successful competitors in the markets. The result is the slavery of India as a bye-product.

To achieve all this, violence has to be glorified and given a high status in society. Admirals and Generals have memorials erected to them in St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey. They are placed in juxtaposition to the Deity. Only then will people flock into the army, navy and the air force. This is a degradation of civilization into barbarism. The world is groaning under this system today. The Great Powers hold their sway by virtue of the atom bomb. The rest of the world is cowed down by fear of destruction. The world may have been gained but the soul has been destroyed.

What is the alternative? We have to raise different standards of value. The welfare of mills and machinery should make room for the interests of the people. Our lives should not be ordered by the needs of the material world. We need not artificially increase our wants and then strive to satisfy them. We have to set first things first. True life does not consist in the abundance of things we possess.
